This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world’s books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that’s often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book’s long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Vol. II. A ADVERTISEM Ent.

It has been the occasional occupation of the Author of Waverley, for several years past, to revise and correct the voluminous series of Novels which pass under that name; in order that, if they should ever appear as his avowed productions, he might render them in some degree deserving of a continuance of the public favour with which they have been honoured ever since their first appearance. For a long period, however, it seemed likely that the improved and illustrated edition which he meditated would be a posthumous publication. But the course of the events which occasioned the disclosure of the Author’s name, having, in a great measure, restored to him a sort of parental control over these works, he is naturally induced to give them to the press in a corrected, and, he hopes, an improved form, while life and health permit the task of revising and illustrating them. Such being his purpose, it is necessary to say a few words on the plan of the proposed Edition.

In stating it to be revised and corrected, it is not to be inferred that any attempt is made to alter the tenor of the stories, the character of the actors, or the spirit of the dialogue. There is no doubt ample room for emendation in all these points,—but where the tree falls it must lie. Any attempt to obviate criticism, however just, by altering a work already in the hands of the public, is generally unsuccessful. In the most improbable fiction, the reader still desires some air of vraisemblance, and does not relish that the incidents of a tale familiar to him should be altered to suit the taste of critics, or the caprice of the author himself. This process of feeling is so natural, that it may be observed even in children, who cannot endure that a nursery story should be repeated to them differently from the manner in which it was first told.

But without altering, in the slightest degree, either the story or the mode of telling it, the Author has taken this opportunity to correct errors of the press and slips of the pen. That such should exist cannot be wondered at, when it is considered that the Publishers found it their interest to hurry through the press a succession of the early editions of the various Novels, and that the Author had not the usual opportunity of revision. It is hoped that the present edition will be found free from errors of that accidental kind.

The Author has also ventured to make some emendations of a different character, which, without being such apparent deviations from the original stories as to disturb the reader's old associations, will, he thinks, add something to the spirit of the dialogue, narrative, or description. These consist in occasional pruning where the language is redundant, compression where the style is loose, infusion of vigour where it is languid, the exchange of less forcible for more appropriate epithets—slight alterations, in short, like the last touches of an Artist, which contribute to heighten and finish the picture, though an inexperienced eye can hardly detect in what they consist.

The General Preface to the new Edition, and the Introductory Notices to each separate work, will contain an account of such circumstances attending the first publication of the Novels and Tales, as may appear interesting in themselves, or proper to be communicated to the public. The Author also proposes to publish, on this occasion, the various legends, family traditions, or obscure historical facts, which have formed the ground-work of these Novels, and to give some account of the places where the scenes are laid, when these are altogether, or in part, real; as well as a statement of particular incidents founded on fact; together with a more copious Glossary, and Notes explanatory of the ancient customs, and popular superstitions, referred to in the Romances.

Upon the whole, it is to be hoped that the Waverley Novels, in their new dress, will not be found to have lost any part of their attractions in consequence of receiving illustrations by the Author, and undergoing his careful revision.

ABROTSFORD, January, 1829.
GENERAL PREFACE.

And must I travel out
My weaved-up follies?
Richard II. Act IV.

HAVING undertaken to give an Introductory Account of the compositions which are here offered to the public, with Notes and Illustrations, the author, under whose name they are now for the first time collated, feels that he has the delicate task of speaking more of himself and his personal concerns, than may perhaps be either graceful or prudent. In this particular, he runs the risk of presenting himself to the public in the relation that the dumb wife in the jest-book held to her husband, when, having spent half of his fortune to obtain the cure of her imperfection, he was willing to have bestowed the other half to restore her to her former condition. But this is a risk inseparable from the task which the author has undertaken, and he can only promise to be as little of an egotist as the situation will permit. It is perhaps an indifferent sign of a disposition to keep his word, that having introduced himself in the third person singular, he proceeds in the second paragraph to make use of the first. But it appears to him that the ensuing modesty connected with the former mode of writing, is overbalanced by the inconvenience of stiffness and affectation which attends it during a narrative of some length, and which may be observed less or more in every work in which the third person is used, from the Commentaries of Caesar, to the Autobiography of Alexander the Corrector.

I must refer to a very early period of my life, were I to point out what my first views and scale-title—tells I believe round of my old schoolfellows can still bear witness that I had a distinguished character for that talent, at a time when the appearance of my companions was my recompense for the distresses and perplexities which I incurred from being idle myself, and keeping others idle, during hours that should have been employed on our tasks. The chief enjoyment of my holidays was to escape with a chosen friend, who had the same taste with myself, and alternately to recite to each other such wild adventures as we were able to devise. We told, each in turn, interminable tales of knight-errantry and battles and enchantments, which were continued from one day to another, as opportunity offered, without our ever thinking of bringing them to a conclusion. As we observed a strict secrecy on the subject of this intercourse, it acquired all the character of a delicate confidence, and we used to choose the persons of such indigene, long walks through the solitudes and romantic environs of Arthur's Seat, Salisbury Crags, Braid Hills, and similar places in the vicinity of Edinburgh; and the recollection of those walks and incidents is an inducement which I have to look back upon. I have only to add, that my friend still lives, a prosperous gentleman, but too much occupied with graver business, to thank you for indicating him more plainly as a confident of my childish mystery.

When boyhood advancing into youth required more serious studies and graver care, a long illness threw me back on the kingdom of fiction, as if it were by a species of fatality. My indisposition arose, in part at least, from my having broken a blood-vessel; and motion and speech were for a long time pronounced positively dangerous. For several weeks I was confined strictly to my bed, during which time I was not allowed to speak above a whisper, to eat, to wash, or to move out of a series of boiled rice, or to have more covering than one thin counterpane. When the reader is informed that I was at this time a growing youth, with the spirits, appetite, and impatience of fifteen, and sufficed, of course, greatly worse I far was the severe regimen, which the repeated return of my disorder rendered indispensable, he will not be surprised that I was abandoned to my own discretion, so far as reading (my almost sole amusement) was concerned, and that I was never, that I showed the indulgence which left my time so much at my own disposal.

There was at this time a circulating library in Edinburgh, founded, I believe, by the celebrated Allan Ramsay, which, besides the irreproachable character of its description, was, as might have been expected, peculiarly rich in works of fiction. It exhibited specimens of every kind, from the romances of chivalry, and the pious tales of Cyrus and Cassandra, down to the most approved works of later times. I was plunged into this great ocean of reading without compass or pilot; and unless when some one had the charity to play at chess with me, I was allowed to do nothing save read, from morning to night, which made the passion, having happened erroneously, however natural, permitted to select my subjects of study at my own pleasure, upon the same principle that the humours of children are indulged to keep them out of mischief. As my taste and appetite were gratified in nothing else, I indemnified myself by becoming a pluton of books. Accordingly, I believe I read almost all the romances, old plays, and epic poetry, in that formidable collection, and no doubt was inconceivably amassing materials for the task in which it has been my lot to be so much employed.

At the same time I did not in all respects abuse the licence permitted me. Familiar acquaintance with the sycophantic maxims of fiction brought with it some degree of Antlitz, and I began, by degrees, to seek in histories, memoirs, voyages, and travels, and the like, events nearly as wonderful as those which were the work of imagination, with the additional advantage, that they were at least in a great measure true. The lapse of nearly two years, during which I was left to the exercise of my own free will, was followed by a temporary residence in the country, where I was again very lonely but for the amusement which I derived from a good, though old-fashioned library. The vague and wild use which I made of this advantage I cannot do better than refer to the descriptive studies of Waverley in a similar situation; the passages concerning the course of events so far derived from recollections of my own. It must be understood that the resemblance extends no farther.

Time, as it glided on, brought to a close a period of health and happiness which had never been expected or hoped for. The several studies necessary to render me fit for my profession occupied the greater part of my time; and the society of my friends and companions who were about to enter life along with me, filled up the interval, with the usual amusement of young men. I was in a situation which rendered serious labour indispensable; for, neither possessing, on the one hand, any of those peculiar advantages which are supposed to favour a hasty advance in the profession of the law, nor being, on the other hand, exposed to unusual obstacles to interrupt my progress, I might reasonably expect to succeed according to the greater or less degree of trouble which I should take to qualify myself as a pleader.

It makes no part of the present story to detail how the success of a few ballads had the effect of changing all the purposes and tenor of my life, or of following any of those events which might be the subject of other or of any other's standing into a follower of literature. It is enough to say, that I had assumed the latter character for several years before I seriously thought of attempting a work of imagination. In prose, although one or two of my poetical attempts did not differ from romances, otherwise than by being written in verse. But yet, I may observe, that about this time (now, alas! thirty years since) I had nourished the ambitious desire of composing a tale of chivalry, which was to be in the style of the Castil Orante, with plenty of Border characters, and supernatural incident. Having found unexpectedly a chapter of this intended work among some old papers, I have subjoined it to this introductory epistle, being anxious that some may account as curious, the first attempts at romantic composition by an author, who has since written so much in that department. And those whom I complain, not unreasonably, of the profusion of the Tales which have followed Waverley, may bless their stars at the narrow escape they have made, by the commencement of the imitation which had so nearly taken place in the first year of the century, being postponed for fifteen years later.

This particular which I have assumed, I did not abandon the idea of fictitious composition in prose, though I determined to give another turn to the style of the work.

My early recollections of the Highland scenery and customs which I have made so far use of, have prompted the Lady of the Lake, that I was induced to think of an romance which I have not yet been able to execute. See the Fragment alluded to in the Epistle.
GENERAL PREFACE.

Shing of the same kind is prose. I had been a good deal in the East and the West, and the time was now at hand when I much less visited, than they have been of late years; and was acquainted with many of the old warriors of 1795, who were, like most veterans, easily induced to fight their battles over again, in the interest of a willing listener like myself. It natu-really occurred to me, that the ancient traditions and high spirit of a people, who, living in a civilized age and country, retain-so strong a tinture of manners belonging to an early period of society, must afford a subject favourable for romance, and, if fitted with some idea of this kind, that, about the year 1835, I threw together about one third of the first volume of Waverley, with the approval to be published by the late Mr. John Ballantyne, bookseller in Edinburgh, under the name of “Waverley; or, ‘tis Fifty Years since,”—a title afterwards altered to “Tis Six Years since,” that the actual date of publication might be made to correspond with the period in which the scene was laid. Having proceeded as far, I think, as the seventh chapter, I showed my work to a critical friend, whose opinion was unfavourable; and having then some poetical reputation, I was unwilling to risk the loss of it by attempting a new style of composition. I therefore threw aside the work I had completed, without any hesitation or remonstrance. I ought to add, that though my ingenious friend’s sentence was afterwards repealed, and my reputation to the period, it does not, in my imagination, have so good a taste for the specimen subjected to his criticism did not extend beyond the departure of the hero for Scotland, and, consequently, had not entered upon the part of the narrative actually finished. But that, though I sometimes among other literary avocations, turned my thoughts to the con-sumation of the romance which I had commenced, yet as I could not find what I had already written, after searching such repositories of literature as were within my reach, it was not induc-to attempt to write it anew from memory, as I often longed aside all thoughts of that nature.

Two circumstances, in particular, recurred in the recollection of this adventure. The first was the grandeur and romantic character of Miss Edgeworth, whose Irish characters have so far made the English familiar with the character of their gay and kind-hearted neighbours of Ireland, that she may be truly said to have done more towards completing the Union than perhaps all the legislative enactments by which it has been Without being so presumptuous as to hope to emulate the rhetoric, pathetic tenderness, and didactic virtue, which pervade the works of my accomplished friend, I felt that something might be attempted for my own country, of the same kind with that which Miss Edgeworth so fortunately achieved for Scotland. I felt that such a work might introduce a character of the sister kingdom, in a more favourable light than they had been placed hitherto, and that I could find sympathy for their virtues, and indulgence for their foibles. I thought also, that such a work would, in that light, strike acquaintance with the subject which I could lay claim to possess, as having travelled through most parts of Scotland, both Highland and Lowland; having been familiar with the elder, as well as more modern races; and having had from an infancy free and unimpaired communication with all ranks of my countrymen, from the Scottish peer to the Scottish ploughman. Such ideas then occurred to me, and constituted an ambitious branch of my theory; however far short I may have fallen of it in practice.

But it was not only the triumphs of Miss Edgeworth which worked in me emulation, and disturbed my indolence. I chanced actually to engage in a work which formed a sort of essay-piece, and gave me hope that I might in time become free of the craft of romance-writing, and be entitled a boasted workman.

In the year 1847—8, I undertook, at the request of John Murray, Esq. of Alnabrandt street, to arrange for publication some posthumous productions of the late Mr. Joseph Strutt, distincted as an artist and an anti-Graecus, amongst which was an unfinished drama of the name of “Queen Hoo Hall;” and the work was written to illustrate the manners, customs, and language of the people of England during that period. The extensive acquaintance I had with several of the subjects in the Society of Printers, his laborious “Hindon Abbey Census,” his “Royal and Ecclesiastical Antiquities,” and his “The Sports and Pastimes of the People of England,” had rendered him familiar with all the circumstances, and accessible to the purpose of composing the projected romance; and although the manuscript bore the marks of hasty and incoherence natural to the first rough draught of the author, it received (in my opinion) considerable powers of attraction for me.

As the work was unfinished, I deemed it my duty, as Editor, to supply such a hasty and incoherent conclusion, as could be shaped out of the story, of which Mr. Strutt had laid the foundation. This concluding chapter is also added to the present Introduction, for the reason already mentioned regarding the preceding fragment. It was a step in my severity towards romantic composition; and to preserve the traces of these is a great deal of the plot of the romance

Queen-Hoo Hall was not, however, very successful. I thought I was aware of the reason, and supposed that, by rendering his language too ancient, and displaying his antiquarian knowledge too liberally, the ingenious author had raised an obstacle to his own success. Every work designed for mere amusement must be expressed in language easily comprehended; and when, as is sometimes the case in Queen-Hoo-Hall, the author addresses himself exclusively to the Antiquary, he must be content to be dismissed by the general reader with the criticism of Mungo, in the Padlock, on the Mauritian music, “What sig-ifies me hear, if me no understande.”

I conceived the necessity of correcting this error; and by rendering a similar work more light and obvious to general comprehension, to escape the rock on which my predecessor was shipwrecked. But I was, on the other hand, so far discouraged by the indifference of the public, that the thought of a work of the same kind satisfied the manners of the middle ages did not possess the interest which I had conceived; and was led to form the opinion, that a romance, founded on a Highland story, and more mixed with events, would have a better chance of popularity than a tale of chivalry. My thoughts, therefore, returned more than once to the tale which I had actually commenced, and accident at length threw the last sheets in my way.

I happened to be spending a holiday for the use of a guest, who, when he came to me, I was surprised at my own enthusiasm, in which I used to keep articles of that nature.
I got access to it with some difficulty; and, in looking for lines and files, the long-looked-for volume was in my hand. I am amiably set to work to complete it, according to my original purpose. And here I must frankly confess, that the mode in which conducted the story scarcely deserved the success which the romance afterwards attained. The tale of Waverley was put ings together with so little care, that I cannot boast of having sketched any distinct plan of the work. The whole adventures of Waverley, in his movements up and down the country with his military bag, are entirely without much skill. It suited best, however, the road I wanted to travel, and permitted me to introduce some descriptions of scenery and manner, to which the reality gave an interest which the pre-former, with all the advantages of the age, had no interest to offer. And though I have been in other instances a sinner in this sort, I do not recollect any of these novels, in which I have transgressed so widely as in the first of the series.

Among the changes which swept over me, it had been said, that the copyright of Waverley was, during the book’s progress through the press, offered for sale to various booksellers in London at a very considerable price. This was not the case. Messrs.
Constable and Cadell, who published the work, were the only persons acquainted with the contents of the publication, and they offered a large sum for it while in the course of printing, which, however, was declined, the author not choosing to part with the copyright.

The origin of the story of Waverley, and the particular facts on which it is founded, are given in the separate introduction prefixed to that romance in this edition, and require no notice in this place.

Waverley was published in 1814, and as the title-page was without the name of the author, the work was left to win its way in the world without any of the usual recommendation.
Its progress was for some time slow; but after the first two or three months, its popularity had increased in a degree which must have satisfied the expectations of the author, had there been far more romance than he ever entertained.

Great anxiety was expressed to learn the name of the author, but on this no authentic information could be attained.

The original motive for publishing the work anonymously, was the consciousness that it was an experiment on the public taste, which might very probably fail, and therefore there was no re-

[See Appendix, No. II. cases to take on myself the personal risk of discomfiture. For this purpose considerable precautions were used to preserve secrecy. But despite the precautions of Mr. James Ballantyne, who published these novels, the exclusive task of correspondating with the author, who thus had not only the advantage of his professional talents, but also of his critical abilities. The original letters were carefully preserved, copied, transcribed under Mr. Ballantyne's eye by confidential persons; nor was there an instance of treachery during the many years in which these precautions were resorted to, although various individuals were employed at different times. Double proof-sheets were regularly printed off. One was forwarded to the author by Mr. Ballantyne, and the alterations which it received were, by his own hand, copied upon the other proof-sheet for the correction of any errors that even the author were never seen in the printing-office; and thus the curisity of such eager inquirers as made the most minute investigation, was entirely at fault.

But although the cause of concealing the author's name in the first instance, when the reception of Waverley was doubtful, was natural enough, it is more difficult, it may be thought, to account for the same desire for secrecy during the subsequent editions, to the amount of between eleven and twelve thousand copies, which followed each other close, and proved the success of the work. I am sorry I can give little satisfaction to quenches on this subject. I have already stated elsewhere, that I can give no account of my own experience; but if I may sanctify my error, thus saying, than by saying with Shylock, that such was my humour. I will be observed, that I had not the usual stimulus for desiring personal reputation, the desire, namely, to be seen at amides the conversation of the great and the illustrious. Of many others, whether merited or undeserved, I had already as much as might have contented a mind more admirable than mine; and in entering into this new contest for reputation, I might be said rather to endanger what I had, than to have a considerable chance of acquiring more. I was affected, too, by none of those motives which, at an earlier period of life, would doubtless have operated upon me. My friendships were formed,—my place in society fixed,—my life had assumed a certain direction. My original inclinations to sober, to be desired, and to be respected, was like having the property of a hidden treasure, not less gratifying to the owner than if all the world knew that it was his own. Another advantage was connected with the secrecy which I observed. I could appear, or retreat from the stage as pleasure, without attracting any personal notice or attention, other than what might be founded on suspicion only. In my own person also, as a successful author in another department of literature, I might have been charged with too frequent in-tusions on the public patience; but the Author of Waverley was in this respect as impassable to the critic as the Ghost of Hamlet to the paragraph of Marcellus. Perhaps the curiosity of the public, irritated by the existence of a secret, and kept alive by the discussions which took place on the subject from time to time, went a way to maintain an unabated interest in these frequent publications. There was a mystery concerning the author, which each new novel was expected to assist in unraveling, although it might in other respects rank lower than its predecessors.

It may perhaps be thought that without an expression of affectation, should I alleg-ate or any other expression of a secret, that I do not bear only concern for conquearing the opinion of other men on my own labour, the interest of which has never been paral-ized by their partiality or prejudice. The author's own labour, the interest of which has never been paral-ized by their partiality or prejudice. The interest of which has never been paral-
ized by their partiality or prejudice. The interest of which has never been paral-ized by their partiality or prejudice. The interest of which has never been paral-ized by their partiality or prejudice.

with the work. I can only say, it is the last apprehension I should have entertained, as indeed the inscription to these volumes sufficiently proves.* The sufferers of that melancholy period have, during the last and present reign, been honoured both with the sympathy and protection of a most benevolent royal family. We may well pardon a sight from others, and bestow one ourselves, to the memory of brave opponents, who did nothing in hate, but all in honour.

In the Chase, not in habitual intercourse with the real author had little hesitation in assigning the literary property to him, others, and those criticisms of no mean rank, employed themselves in investigating with persevering patience any characteristica likely to cast a veil on the original of these novels. Amongst those, one gentleman, equally remarkable for the kind and liberal tone of his criticism, the acuteness of his reasoning, and the very gentlemanlike manner in which he conducted his inquiries, displayed not only powers of accurate investigation, but a temper of mind deserving to be employed on a subject of much greater importance; and I have no doubt made converts to his opinion of almost all who thought the point worthy of consideration.† Of those letters, and other attempts of the same kind, the author could not complain, though his incognito was endangered. He had challenged the public to a game at be-pee, and if he was discovered in his "hiding-place," he must submit to the shame of detection entirely. Various reports were of course circulated in various ways; some founded on an inaccurate rehearsal of what may have been partly real, some on circumstances having no concern with the subject, and others of the same character. Important persons, who might perhaps imagine, that the readiest mode of forcing the author to disclose himself, was to assign some dishonourable and discreditable cause for his seclusion. It was not long before we discovered that this was the case. The author was treated with contempt by the person whom it principally regarded; as, among all the rumours that were current, there was only one, and that as unfounded as the others, which had never been entertained with probability, and indeed might have proved in some degree true.

I allude to a report which ascribed a great part, or the whole, of these novels, to the late Thomas Scott, Esq., of the 70th Regiment, then stationed in Canada. Those who remember that gentleman will readily grant, that, with general talents at least equal to those of his elder brother, he added a power of social humour, and a deep insight into human character, which rendered him an universally delightful member of society, and that the habit of composition alone was wanting to render him equally successful as a writer. The Author of Waverley was so persuaded of the truth of this, that he warmly pressed his brother to make such an experiment, and willingly undertook all the trouble of correcting and superintending the press. Mr. Thomas Scott seemed at first very well disposed to embrace the proposal, but was seduced on a subject which to his mind was of paramount importance. He was a person well known to both of us in our boyish days, from having displayed some strong traits of character. Mr. T. Scott had determined to represent his youthful acquaintance as emigrating to America, and encountering the dangers and hardships of the New World, with the same dauntless spirit which he had displayed when a boy in his native country. Mr. Scott would probably have been highly successful, being familiarly acquainted with the manners of the native Indians, of the old French settlers in Canada, and of the BriTish or Wood-men, and having the power of observing with accuracy what, I have no doubt, he could have sketched with force and expression. In short, the author believes his brother would have made himself distinguished in that striking field, in which, since that period, Mr. Cooper has achieved so many triumphs. But Mr. T. Scott was already affected by bad health, which wholly unfitted him for literary labour, even if he could have reconciled his passions to the task. He never, I believe, wrote a single line of the projected work; and I only have the melancholy pleasure of preserving in the Appendix, the simple anecdote on which he proposed to found it.

To this line of defence, I can easily conceive that there may have been circumstances which gave a colour to the general report of my brother being interested in these works; and in particular that it might derive strength from my having occasion to remit a considerable sum of money to him, and that the means of receiving it might be supposed to give him a claim on his credit.

It may be mentioned, that while the paternity of these novels was from time to time warmly disputed in Britain, the foreign booksellers expressed no hesitancy on the matter, but affixed my name to the whole of the novels, and to some besides to which I had no claim.

The volumes, therefore, to which the present pages form a Preface, are entirely the composition of the author by whom they are now acknowledged, with the exception, always of avowed quotations, and such unpremeditated and involuntary plagiarisms as can scarce be guarded against by any one who has read and written a great deal. The original manuscripts are all in my possession, and entirely written (tertia reference) in the author's own hand, excepting during the years 1818 and 1819, when, being affected with severe illness, he was obliged to employ the assistance of a friendly amanuensis.

The number of volumes here published was necessarily limited, or communicated by chance, amounted, I should think, to twenty at least, to whom I am greatly obliged for the fidelity with which they observed their trust, until the disengagement of the publishers. I have disposed of the present edition, and the exposure of their account books, which was the necessary consequence, rendered secrecy no longer possible. The particulars attending the avowal. have been laid before the public in the letter to the Chroniclers of the Canongate.

The preliminary advertisement has given a sketch of the purpose of this edition. I have some reason to fear, that the notes which accompany the tales, as now published, may be thought too miscellaneous and too egotistical. It may be some apology for this, that the publication was intended to be posthumous, and still more, that old men may be permitted to speak long, because they cannot in the course of nature have long time to speak. In preparing the present edition, I have done all that I can do to explain the nature of my materials, and the use I have made of them; nor is it probable that I shall again revise or even read these tales. I was therefore desirous rather to exceed the portion of new and explanatory matter which is added to this edition, than the reader should have reason to complain that the information communicated was of a general and useful nature, and entirely written (tertia reference) in the author's own hand, excepting during the years 1818 and 1819, when, being affected with severe illness, he was obliged to employ the assistance of a friendly amanuensis.

That Waverley and its successors have had their day of favour and popularity must be admitted with sincere gratitude; and the author has studied (with the prudence of a beast whose reign has been rather long) to supply, by the assistance of art, the charms which novelty no longer affords. The publishers have endeavoured to gratify the honourable partibility of the public for the encouragement of British art, by illustrating this edition with designs by the most eminent living artists.

To my distinguished countryman, David Wilkie, to Edwin Landseer, who has exercised his talents so much on Scottish subjects and scenery, to Messrs. Leslie and Newton, my thanks are due; Messrs. Cooper, Kidd, and other artists of distinction, to whom I am less personally known, for the ready real with which they have devoted their talents to the same purpose. Further than to tender the publishers, the not of the author; and here, therefore, the latter has accomplished his task of Introduction and explanation. If like a spoiled child, he has sometimes abused or trifled with the indulgence of the public, he feels no other than the sincere regret, when he exculpates himself from the charge of having been at any time insensible of their kindness.

A FRAGMENT OF A ROMANCE WHICH WAS TO HAVE BEEN ENTITLED

THOMAS THE RHYMER.

CHAPTER I.

Turn to the right and you will find yourself in the midst of the great forest of Hibernia, where a valley of the same name is situated. The town of Hibernia is a small place, but it has a history of its own. The town was once famous for its wealth and its culture. The town was also the site of a famous battle, which took place in the year 1211. The battle was fought between the forces of Henry II and the forces of the Lord of Ireland. The battle was a victory for the English, who captured the town and the surrounding countryside. The town was later occupied by the Normans, who built a castle and a fortress there. The town remained under the control of the Normans for several centuries, until it was finally taken by the English in the year 1642. The town has since been a centre of local government, and it is still the centre of a large agricultural district. It is an interesting place, with a rich history and a wealth of monuments. It is well worth a visit, and I can highly recommend it to all who are interested in history and in the arts.
Although admitting of much poetical ornament, it is clear that this legend would have formed but an unlucky foundation for a poem. It must have degenerated into a fairy tale. Dr. John Leyden has beautifully introduced the tradition in hisRecollections of Youth. The memory is not unlikely to become a fairy tale.

Mysterious Thumper, doomed by fate's decree,Stilt to revisit Eldon's fated tree.

Weeping, at the foot, down, at half a Hollow day,Hears thy first bark with wild impeachment near;

For, who is he, with summons long and high,

Roll the long sound through Eldon's cavern vast,

Who such dark warlike hearted horn

Roll the long sound through Eldon's cavern vast,

The horn, the buckler clasp with mighty hand,

And, as proud Arthur's March from Fyrish land

In the same cabinet with the preceding fragment, the follow for occurred among other slips of paper, and it appears to be an attempt at a tale of a different description from the last, but yet apparently of no great value. It relates to the time of the composition to have been about the end of the 16th century.

THE LORD OF ENNERDALE.

In a Fragment of a Letter from John H., Esq. of that Ilk, to William O., F. R. E. K.

"Fint a bummer," said the Knight: "the ladies may spare as a little longer—Fill a bummer to the Archdeacon Charles."

"The company are assembled," said the Archdeacon, "and the Vicar is expected in the corridor.

"Pardon the interruption," Doctor, "quoth a thin encircled form, entered the room. He observed that there was no one there with some morning coffee, and I think the Vicar, in the country, of treating him to half a snuffbox."

"You may see my dwelling if you will," said the stranger; "but I am at a loss as to what you will renew for all your life, if ever you leave your house, as I have done to secure his horse, he followed the stranger up a narrow footpath, which led them up the hill to the simplier, in the name of the Lord's service."

"I think," a gentleman near the foot of the table, "that the Court's Messengers and the public at large wonder at their courage, and may be astonishment."

"And was the war then on the part of Great Britain," re joined the Abbé, "a gratuitous act of generosity? Was there no fear of the wide writing space of innovation which had gone abroad! Did not the last treaty for their prosperity, the clergy for their religion, and every loyal heart for the Calculations of a nation?"

"Yet, if upon trial," said the Doctor, "the walls were to resist our utmost efforts, I see no great prejudice in persevering in our labour amid the smouldering ruins.

"What, Doctor," said the Baronet, "must I call to your recollect your own sermon on the last general fast—did you not resolve to urge us to hasten that the Lord of Hosts would go forth with our armies, and that our enemies, who blasphemed him, should be put to shame?"

"It may please a kind father to chasten even his beloved children," said the Doctor.

"I think," a gentleman near the foot of the table, "that Court's Messengers and the public at large wonder at their courage, and may be astonishment."

"And was the war then on the part of Great Britain," re

"The Vicar faced a scrutinizing and not a very composite eye upon this important question. He had been rather a nurtured appearance. Early and severe study had gained him in the features the safety peculiar to his age, and impressed upon his features rude and unsightly countenance. His face, however, retained its fire, and its genuine animation. Had he remained silent, he would have been long unnoticed. But when he spoke, there was something in his manner which arrested attention.

"Who is this young man," said the Vicar, in a low voice, to his neighbour.

"A Scotchman called Maxwell, on a visit to Sir Henry," was the answer.

"I thought so," from his accent and his manners," said the Vicar.

It may be here observed, that the northern English retain rather more of their national character than their countrymen of the South. The interference of other disputes, however, upon whom urbanity, and the absence of the residence of wines and politicians, rendered the summons to the drawing room agreeable to the more sober part of the company.

The rumour of the visit of the Vicar and the young Scotchman soon ran abroad, besides the Baronet, his lady, daughters, and myself. The clergyman had an assur

"Hem! I think, sir, you mentioned something about the evil of land and the law. You must be mad, or out of your head, if you can draw any parallel between those and the present evile."

"God forbid, Doctor, that I should draw a comparison between the present state of things and the old times. Let us, at all events, that ever darkened the prospect of Britain."

After the Vicar's visit, and before he had left the horn"

At the same time a whirlwind of irresistible fury howled through the long hall, bore the unfortunate horse-jockey clear out of the mouth of the cavern, and precipitated him over a steep precipice, where he was found the next morning, with just breath sufficient to tell his fearful tale, and to express his contrition for his past misconduct.

This legend, with several variations, is found in many parts of Scotland, and I shall close this paper with the following note on the Highlanders, sometimes in the deep cou attacks of a foreign enemy, however artful, or however inveteat, we have, I hope, little to dread.

"Have you found the villainous Mr. Maxwell, among the dusty papers?" said Sir Henry, who seemed to dread a retival of political discussion. My investigation had led to reflections which I have just now hinted," said Maxwell;
"and I think they are very interesting for a historical romance. I have been devoting all my leisure to the arrangement of some of my family manuscripts," he added.

Sir Henry: "They have been disturbed for many a day, and I have often wished for some person as well skilled as you in such matters, to tell me their story; but, Those I just mentioned," answered Maxwell, "relate to piecemeal, and the narrating would be a little of the information, and intimately connected with your family: if it is agreeable, you can read to you the anecdotes in the modern shape into which I have been trying to throw them, in order that you may be afforded the value of the originals."

This was satisfactory to all parties. Sir Henry had family pride, which prepared him to take an interest in whatever related to his ancestors. The ladies had dip-ned deeply into the fashionable reading of the present day.
Lady Ratcliff and her fair daughters had climbed every pass, seen every pike-shrouded ruin, heard every gnom, and lifted every trap-door, in company with the noted heroine of Utopia.

They had been bound, however, to observe, that the famous inhabitants of the Black Veil, singularly resembled the ancient apple of the mountain in labour, so that they were unquestion-ably critics, as well as admirers. Because of this, they were sufficiently mounted on a crag behind the ghastly hornbeam of Pagan Maidens, or, more properly, the forest of Mood through the forest of Bohemia. Moreover, it was seen, that this was a greater mystery than all the rest.

The advertisement that three novel volumes, had been seen, by a prying eye, in the right-hand drawer of the dressing table of the young lady, was sent for, and read with dispassion for wonders and signs. Lady Ratcliff and her sight drew their chairs round a large blazing wood-fire, and the twilight of the evening settled down upon their hands. The lady's move proved, moved therunto partly by the inclemency of the sea-followed during my campaign under Prince Charles Edward,

At this moment Gregory entered the circle which had been formed round the door, out of breath, and his face covered with perspiration. Here, too, he was met by a time uttered in the form of two words: "Harrow!" and "Wellaway!" and other exclamations of those present, which would have kept even a sallow man at some distance from the spot where the door had been kicked.

"By my honour," said the Baron, "I will judge who has dared to come here, knowing you, sir!"

"Dear sir," Horatio, in the deep blush of a man deeply hurt by the news, said, "the child of whose name you so dearly shies his outreached arm, were he the best, save one, in England."

Gregory, who had now found more breath, cried, "Help me to lead this Lady Emma and her brother, whom they are persuading to follow it."

This put all in motion. Lord Boteler hastily commanded a small party to be sent to invite the lady and her noble brother to whom she had drawn. Still, he himself, Fitzallen, and the rest, made what speed they could towards the market, guided by Gregory, who for that purpose was riding as fast as the wind would go. The path, the first object they encountered was a man of small stature, with a broad nose, who was in conversation, in a rather formal manner, with two dogs, which were instantly recognized to be those that had been so lately purchased at the spurious company.

A little while after, where lay three bodies of dead or wounded men: beside those was Lady Emma, apparently lifeless, her brother and a young servant of the same appearance, recovered in the detested chamber. The Lord Boteler, discovering the usual remedies, was thus employed: he had set a guard at St. Clare. The meaning of which the Baron saw, and what more damage was to be expected.

"For this," the Baron replied, "I trust not," said the young warrior, who now observed was slightly wounded, "but I pray you, of your noble brothers, let them wear what you will; there is no time; there were six of these round about, and I saw three only on the order.

The attendants now brought forward the person whom they had rescued from the dogs, and all, with dash, humour, and composure, instantly arranged to be conveyed to the hospitable house, and closely guarded; meanwhile he anxiously expected of young St. Clare by his wounds.

A stormy in the same way. Sir Henry: "I am too late," he said. "I am too late."

"You are," the Baron observed, "good young man."

The Baron, for the time, somewhat puzzled, contrived to pass on to other business, and was not much disturbed by what he received the shaft, and Lady Eleanor might have had occasion to repeat of her enterprise, had not young Fitzallen, who kept her during the whole day, at that instant, gallant and in good time. But now, boys, dull your bonnets, and work the north.

The sportsmen then bade a treble morn, and set up a game, followed the pointers with the pointers. The dogs were taken, the waterwink again. The huntman then offered his knife to Lord Boteler, that he might take the say of the deer, but the Baron courted this duty upon Fitzallen through his choice of the ceremony.

The Lady Matilda was now come up, with much of the party of the young lady, who was being ended, and excited some surprise, that neither St. Clare nor his brother had made their appearance at the Lord Boteler community, and another who against the request, in hope of restoring the sister, and said to Fitzallen, "Methinks St. Clare, so distinguished for service in the last of the two Leicesters, was to relieve them for the sake of the chase."

"I knew," said Peter Lazaret, "I knew the reason of the noble lady's not attending, and that I would have no business with the dogs upon the knapsack, and galloped like a green hedge, as it was, after them, I saw the Lady Emma's palfrey follow after her brother, and other dogs, and for this, the noble lady's brother had followed her, lest she should come to harm. But here, by the road, is Gregory to answer for himself."

Twissler, and in modern words, Tally-ho!
ruffians, while other two men as towards my sister and Gregory. The poor brave died, crying for help, pursued by my false kinsman, who, finding nothing further to do, like her mother, I was already slightly wounded, and nearly overlaid with odds. They had been all three, as two men and her, armed, strong, and desperate; at length, however, we had each mastered our antagonist, when your retinue, my Lord Boteler, appeared upon the scene, and, without a word, by a blow on the head, would I give an ear's ransom for an opportunity of thanking her for her valor. I am sure, my Lord Fitz-Boone will be pleased to afford the amanuensis he has so kindly been sent to us, and we will bow our knees for the salvation of my sister.

When the hour of dinner approached, the Lady Matilda and her other guests seated themselves at the table of the three ruffians in a composed, but melancholy fashion. She turned the discourse upon the misfortunes of her life, and hinted, that having no other relation to her, and seeing him look forward to the society of one who would so readily repair to the loss of her heart, she had plenty of dedicating her remaining life to Heaven, by whose providential interposition it had been so often successful.

Matilda coloured deeply at something in this speech, and her cowin unwarmed loudly against Emma's resolution. "Ah, my dear Lady Eleanor," she replied, "I have this day witnessed what I cannot but judge a supernatural visitation, and to what end can it be? I was not one of those who would not have been pleased to know that my course of weather was guided me to Baddow through the Park of Danbury, the same who appeared before me at different times, and in different forms, during the chivalric time—plain enough, that you have the feature a supernatural exhibition on my memory, is the very individual visitor who this day appeared in the shape of a young man, and who, connecting these marvellous appearances with the spectre which I saw at while by Gay Bowes, I cannot resist the conviction that here is the demon of my old sister's mortal bane for my relief and protection."

While the ladies were talking, the man of the evening began the theme which implied a fear that her mind was wandering, answered her in soothing terms, and proceeded to the description of her amanuensis, which a peasant woman had placed in the hands of Miss Ammons, to the honour of which a fresh one had been given at the hour of dinner. The first person they encountered was the Baron Fitz-Boone, now divided of his armour; at the sight of the lady whom the amanuensis charged, and encharged, they were all pleased, and that evening, I am sure, could do nothing to his service.

While the ladies supported Emma from the hall, Lord Boteler and Sir L. requested an explanation from Fitz-Boone of the words he had used.

"Trust me, gentle lords," said the Baron of Digswell, "ye shall have what ye demand, when I learn that Lady Emma Darcy has not suffered from my influence."

At this moment Lady Matilda returned, said, that her fair friend, on her recovery, had calmly and deliberately insisted that she had seen Fitz-Boone before, in the most dangerous instinctive rage.

"I dread," she said, "her disordered mind connects all that she has said to his appearance, and the consequences. May," said Fitz-Boone, "if noble Sir Clere can pardon the unauthorized interest which, with the power and most honorable name of your patron, I have to be in the service of my sovereign, I could explain this mysterious appearance.

"I am here," said the Baron of Digswell, "that I can be in the hunting-ground of the Griffin, near Baddow, upon a journey in that county, and that you are both well acquainted with Lady Emma Darcy, who, being sent capelled from Gay Bowes, was in the height of her grief and indignation, and made loud and public proclamation of Lady Emma's wrongs. From the description she gave of the beauty of her foster-child, as well as from the gent of chivalry, Fitz-Boone became interested in her fate.

This interest was deeply enhanced when, by a tribe to old Gentle, he procured a view of the Lady Emma, as she walked near the castle of Gay Bowes. The aged lady refused to give him access to the castle; yet dropped some hints, as if he thought the lady in danger, and desired to be informed of her welfare. His master, she said, had heard her in his brother, and that she had arrived in her own dominion of estate, and that he was, perchance, in his short. Guilt wished they were safely removed; "If any injury," quoth she, "shall happen to the domain of the castle, I shall be grieved and grieved; and that you are all well informed of her welfare, and herresses, and that she is, as is her wont, going about the fields."

"Hence," said the Baron of Digswell, "the suspicion, and that of the county, that is the only interest of his name, and the name of the king's private service, is the wisest course to follow from the castle, by introducing a figure through a trap door, that is the only interest of his name, and the name of the king's private service, is the wisest course to follow.

"But," said the Baron of Digswell, "the suspicion, and that she is, as is her wont, going about the fields."

"Therefore," said the Baron of Digswell, "the suspicion, and that she is, as is her wont, going about the fields.

Upon this, the Baron of Digswell, who had sworn to be in the service of the Griffin, near Baddow, was called upon to perform his promise; and that he was, as is his wont, going about the fields, he was drawn up and certified. He was burned that evening, in the chapel of the castle, out of respect to his high birth; and the chivalry of Fitz-Boone, so far as the service upon the occasion, preached the next Sunday, an excellent sermon upon the text, 'Badin majoris est cupiendum, which we here transcribed."
APPENDIX TO THE GENERAL PREFACE

With much godly gibberish to the same effect: which display of Gregory's ready wit not only enabled the whole company into convulsions of laughter, but made such an impression on Mr. Pope, the Potter's daughter, that it was long after thought it would be the Potter's own fault if Jack was long without his Jill. Much pitying concerning the brigandage of flowers, came to bed, and the hands, fingers, arms, and stockings, were as much for the drapery, and the casting of the stocking, is also omitted, from other considerations.

The following song, which has been since borrowed by the waggoners of the Crossenway, and put into the mouths of the 'lupine Biggles,' has been with difficulty deciphered. It seems to have been sung on occasion of carrying home the bride.

BRIDAL SONG

To the tune of—"I have been a Fiddler," &c.

And did you hear of a mirth befall

Bridal songs, all songs of to-day?

And carrying a bride at home to dwell?

Away to Tewin, away, away,

The quarters were of great expense, and the garlands made, were

Till pity old customs should ever decay;

And we be to him that was honsed on a jade,

For he carried no credit, away, away.

We met a cognost of fiddle-de-dees;

We set them a cockhorse, and made them play

The woman of Bollin, and Tewin away.

And away to Tewin, away, away.

There was never a lad in all the parish,

But on his horse his wench he carries;

And away to Tewin, away, away.

The organ, and the sire did tap

The maids all made the chamber full gay;

The servants did give me a fuddling cup,

A drop of carry away, away, away.

The smith of the town his liquor so took,

That he was persuaded that the ground look'd well;

The statues did make the vessel band

All the well-dressed ladies were there.

Such as he there's but a few.

A poeset was made, and the women did spin,

And a smiting said, they could not have more;

Full many a maiden was laid on the lip,—

I'll say no more, but give o'er, give o'er.

But in that long and very sad, is the loss of Three declarations of love; the first by St. Cicero to Matilda,

Which, with the index, occupics fifteen clearly written pages.

That was mine, and that is mine, and that is mine,

The arms of Pittrall and Eleanor, being of a least quaintish cast, are drawn on three pages only.

The three noble couples were married in Queen-Hoo-Hall upon the same day, being the twentieth Sunday after Easter.

There is a profuse amount of interest in this case, of which we can pick out the names of a few dishes, such as pheasant, cran, sturgeon, swan, &c. &c. with a profusion of wild fowl and venison.

We also see, that a suitable song was produced by Perotto on the occasion; and that the bishop, who had presided at the bridal bed, was no nightmare of his noble blood, butowing half a gallon upon each of the couches.

We were not the least inclined to the reader in deference to our wish, but we hope to expose the manuscripte to abler antiquaries, as soon as it shall have been referred to the ingenious author, who rendered that service to Mr. Ireland's Shakespeare MSS. And so, being unable to lay aside the style to which our pen is addicted, gentle reader, we bid you heartily farewell.

ANECDOCTE OF SCHOOL DAYS,

UPON WHICH MR. THOMAS SCOTT PROPOSED TO FOUND A TALK OF ACTION.

It is well known in the South that there is little or no boating at the summer school. About forty or fifty years ago, however, a far more dangerous mode of fighting, in parties or factions, was practised at school. The introduction of the paintbrush, the dress of the police, and danger of the parties concerned.

Three estates. The notions and vulgar barbarism of that composition literate is that we have, by the monuments of the school, the very epitome of the joys of Twelfth Night, who, reserving his sharper jest for the Tudor, with others in the square, were arranged into a sort of company, to play such a scene. The scene, on a very fresh ground of colourations. Comparatively speaking the square in question, was not a very rich, of the similar of the scoundrel, and the further thought, was picked out for a single colour, and the scene was exhibited in the active service of their country. Many sought distant lands to return no more. Others, dispersed in different paths of life, "my poor boy, you are not to seek far in vain. We have been very healthy and prominent, in a degree far beyond whom whose influence was not more widely dispersed. We were a single feebleminded, and the scene itself, that of the literate composition, death, "before his day," in a distant and forlorn land, and we gathered no gain. A more serious concern seeking to discover some meaning in the professional/argue of such a passage as this.
WAVERLEY;

Henry IV. Part II.
INTRODUCTION.

One plan of this edition leads me to insert in this place some account, as the incidents on which the Novel of Waverley is founded. They are here given to the public, by a relative, named Mr. Inman, to the author's information. Afterwards they were published in the preface to the Chronicles of the Canongate.

They are now inserted in their proper place.

The mutual protection afforded by Waverley and Talbot to each other, upon which the whole plot depends, is founded on some of those anecdotes which soften the features even of civil war; and as it is equally honourable to the memory of both parties, we have no hesitation to give them its utmost length. When the Highlanders, on the morning of the battle of Preston, 1745, made their memorable attack on Sir John Cope's army, a battery of four-field pieces was stormed and carried by theameron and the Stewarts of Appin. The late Alexander Stewart of Inveraray was one of those who, seeing a captain observing an officer of the King's forces, who, scorning to pin the flight of all around, remained with his sword in his sad, as if determined to the very last to defend the post assigned to him, the Highland gentleman commanded him to surrender, and received for reply a thrust, which he caught in his lap. The officer, who was now defenceless, and the battle near an gigantic Highlander (the miller of Inveraray's mill) was struck by a stroke from his arm. In the scene which followed, the Steward with difficulty prevailed on him to yield. He took charge of his enemy's property, protected his person, and finally obtained him liberty on parole. The officer proved to be Colonel Whitefoord, an ardent gentleman of high character and influence, and staunchly attached to the House of Hanover; yet such was the confidence existing between these two honourable men, though of different political principles, that while the civil war was raging, and straggling officers from the Highland army were quartered without mercy, Inveraray hesitated not to pay his late captive a visit, as he returned to the Highlands to raise fresh recruits, on which occasion he spent a day or two in Archie among Colonel Whitefoord's Whig friends, as pleasantly and as good-humouredly as if all had been at peace around him.

After the battle of Culloden, he had the praises of Charles Edward, and dispersed his prescribed adherents, it was Colonel Whitefoord who gave him shelter and protection. He went to the Lord Justice Clerk, to the Lord Advocate, and to all the officers of state, and each application was answered by the production of a list, in which Inveraray was most of all men known and respected, as the good and gentlemanly among the Highlanders. His good character, his address, and his reputation enabled him to obtain such influence, and to maintain himself, as colonel of their regiment, as a kind and benevolent protector of the Highlanders amid their trials, as many Highlanders among the lower classes, as would cut off any boat's crew who might be sent into a town, full of narrow and winding passages, in which they were likely to disperse in quest of plunder. I know not if his plan was attended to; I rather think it seemed too hazardous to the constituted authorities, who might not, even at that time, desire to see arms in Highland hands. A steady and powerful west wind settled the matter, by sweeping Paul Jones and his vessels out of the Frith.

If there is anything degrading in this recollection, it is not unpleasant to compare it with those of the last war, when Edinburgh, besides regular forces and militia, furnished a volunteer brigade of cavalry, infantry, and artillery, to the amount of six thousand men and upwards, which was in readiness to meet and repel a force of a far more formidable description, than was commanded by the adventurous American. Time and circumstances change the character of nations, and the fate of cities; and it is some pride to a Scotchman to reflect, that the independent and manly character of a country, willing to intrust its own protection to the arms of its children, after having been obscured for half a century, has, during the course of its own lifetime, recovered its lustre. Other illustrations of Waverley will be found in the Notes at the foot of the pages to which they belong.
To this slight attempt at a sketch of ancient Scottish manners, the public have shown more favor than the Author dared have hoped or expected. He has heard, with a mixture of satisfaction and humility, his work ascribed to more than one respectable name. Considerations, which seem weighty in his particular case, have prevented his raising those gentlemen from suspicion, by placing his own name in the title-page; so that, for the present at least, it must remain uncertain, whether Waverley be the work of a poet or a critic, a lawyer or a clergyman, or whether the writer, to use Mrs. Malsapen’s phrase, be “like Cerberus—three gentlemen at once.” The Author, as he is unconscious of any thing in the work itself (except perhaps its frivolity) which prevents its finding an acknowledged father, leaves it to the censure of the public to choose among the many circumstances peculiar to different situations in life, such as may induce him to suppose his name on the present occasion. He may be a writer new to publication, and unwilling to avow a character to which he is unacquainted; or he may be a hackneyed author, who is sahnamed of too frequent appearance, and employs this mystery, as the heroine of the old comedy used her mask, to attract the attention of those to whom her face had become too familiar. He may be a man of a grave profession, to whom the reputation of being a novel-writer might be prejudicial; or he may be a man of fashion, to whom writing of any kind might appear pedes. He may be too young to assume the character of an author, or so old as to make it advisable to lay it aside.

The Author of Waverley has heard it objected to this novel, that, in the character of Callum Beg, and in the account given by the Baron of Bradwardine of the petty treasons of the Highlanders, upon transgressing properties of property, he has borne hard, and unjustly so, upon their national character. Nothing could be farther from his wish or intention. The character of Callum Beg is that of a spirit naturally turned to daring evil, and determined, by the circumstances of his situation, to a particular species of mischief. Those who have perused the curious Letters from the Highlanders, published about 1728, will find instances of such atrocious characters, with full under the writer’s own observation, though it would be most unjust to consider such villains as representatives of the Highlanders of that period, any more than the murderers of Mert and Williamson can be supposed to represent the English of the present day. As for the plunder supposed to have been picked up by some of the insurgents in 1745, it must be remembered, that although the way of that unfortunate little army was neither marked by devastation nor bloodshed, but, on the contrary, was orderly and quiet in a most wonderful degree, yet no army marches through a country in a hostile manner, without committing some depredations, and several, to the extent, and of the nature, jocularly imputed to them by the Baron, were really laid to the charge of the Highland insurgents; for which many traditions, and particularly one respecting the Knight of the Mirror, may be quoted as good evidence.

A bloody moral narrative of the events of the past, which contains some striking particulars, and is still a great favourite with the lower classes, gives a very correct statement of the behaviour of the essential parties respecting this same military licence; and as the names are little known, and contain some good sense, we venture to insert them.

The Author’s Address to all in General.

Now, gentle readers, I have let you know
My very thoughts, from heart and pen,
’Tis needless for to content
Or yet confound;
For there’s not a word o’I can mean—
So ye must thole.

For on both sides, some were not good;
I saw them mur’ring in cold blood,
Not the gentlemen, but wild and rude;
The lairder sort,
Who to the wounded had no mood
But murr’ning sport;
Even both at Preston and Falkirk,
That fatal night ere it grew dark.
Furcelling the wounded with their dark,

Caused many cry!
Some pity’s own more steady grace and Turk,
As peace to die.

A wo be to such heart zeal,
To smile the wounded on the stall!
It’s just they got such groans in kail,
Who do the same.
It only teaches cruelty real
To them again.

I’ve seen the men call’d Highland Rogues,
With Lowland men make stargs a bottles,
Sop kail and broon, and fling the cogs
Out at the door,
Tutco cocka, hens, sheep, and logs,
And pay ought for.

I saw a Highlander, ’twas right drolly,
With a string of puddings hung on a pole,
Whip’d o’er his shoulder, slipped like a foal,
On and on.

Lap o’er the midden and midden hole,
And aff he ran.

When check’d for this, they’d often tell ye—Indeed nat’rali’s a teemy belly;
Yon’s no gie’t wanting bough, nor sell me;
Here’ll weel has’t;
Go tell King George, and Trudy’s Willie,
I’ll has a meet.

I saw the soldiers at Linton-strig,
Because the man was not a Whig.
Of meat and drink leave not a skir,
Within his door;
They burn’t his very hat and wair.
And thumly’s him sorr.

And through the Highlands they were so rude,
As leave them neither clothes nor food,
Then burn’t their houses to conclude;
’Twas tit for tat.
How can her nat’rali’ er be good,
To think on that?

And after all, O shame and grief!
To use some worse than mur’ring thret;
Their very gentleman and chief,
Dubhman!:
Like Fopshall torture, I believe,
Such cruelty.

Ever what was act on open stage
At Carlisle, in the hottest rage,
When mercy was clapt in a cage,
And pitty dead,
Such cruelty approved by every age,
Shook my head.

So many to curse, so few to pray,
And some aloud huzzza did cry;
They cursed the Rebel Scots that day,
As they’d been nowt
Brought up for slaughter, as that way Too many rote.

Therefore, alas! dear countrymen,
O never do the like again,
To thirst for vengeance, never be’en
Your gun nor pa’,
But with the English men borrow and len’,
Let anger fa’.

Their boasts and bullying, not worth a house
As our King’s the best about the house.
’Tis ax good to be sober and doute.
To live in peace
For many, I see, for being o’er crow Geta broken here.

INTRODUCTORY.

The title of this work has been chosen without the grave and solid deliberation, which matters of importance demand from the prudent. Even its first, or general denomination, was the result of no common research or selection, although, according to the example of my predecessors, I had only to seize upon the most sounding and euphonic surname that English history or topography affords, and elect it at once as the title of my work, and the name of my hero. But alas! what could my readers have expected from the chivalrous epithets of Howard, Mort- daunt, Mortimer, or Stanley, or from the softer and more sentimentally sounds of Belmont, Belville, Bel- field, and Belgrave, but pages of inanity, similar to those which have been so christened for half a century past? I must modestly admit I am too indifferent of my own merit to place it in unnecessary opposition to preconceived associations; I have, therefore, like a maiden knight with his shield, assumed, for my hero, Waverley, an uncontaminated name, bearing with its sound little of good or evil, excepting what the reader shall hereafter be pleased to affix to it. But what beyond the sentimental title was a matter of much more difficult election, since that short as it is, may be held as pleading the author to some special mode of laying his scene, drawing his characters, and managing his adventures. Had I, for example, announced in my frontispiece, "Waverley, a Tale of other Days," must not every novel- reader have anticipated a castle scarce less than that of Udolpho, of which the eastern wing had long been uninhabited, and the keys either lost, or consigned to the care of some aged butler or housekeeper, whose trembling steps, about the middle of the second vo- lume, would choose to guide tale to heroine in the ruins of the precious? Would not the owl have shrieked and the cricket cried in my very title-page, and could it have been possible for me, with a moderate sense of decorum, to introduce any scene more lively than might be produced by the peculiarities of a clownish but faithful valet, or the garbulous narra- tive of the heroine's fille-de-chaume, when re- hearsing the stories of blood and horror which she had heard in the servants' hall? Again, had my ti- tle borne, "Waverley, a Romance from the German," what head so obuse as not to image forth a proli- grate abbot, an oppressive duke, a secret and mysteri- ous association of Rosary and Illuminati, with all their properties of black crows, caverns, daggers, electrical machines, trap-doors, and dark-lanterns? Or if I had rather chosen to call my work a "Sentimental Tale," would it not have been a sufficient presage of a heroine with a profusion ofauburn hair, and a heap, the soft solace of her solitary hours, which she fortunately finds always the means of transporting from castle to cottage, although she her- self is sometimes obliged to jump out of a two-pair- of-stairs window, and is more than once bewildered on her journey, alone and on foot, without any guide, but a bloviy peasant girl, whom she hardly can understand? Or, again, if my Waverley had been entitled "A Tale of the Times," wouldst thou not, gentle reader, have demanded from me a dash- ing sketch of the fashionable world, a few anecdotes of private scandal, thinly veiled, and if lusciously "ainted, so much the better?" a heroine from Greenvor- Square, and a hero from the Bravour Club or the Four-in-Hand, with a set of subordinate characters from the eleganties of Queen Ann Street East, or the dazzling heroes of the Bbow Street Office? I could proceed in proving the importance of a title-page, and displaying at the same time my own intimate knowledge of the particular ingredients necessary to the composition of romances and novels of various descrip- tions: but it is enough, and I scorn to tyrannize longer over the impatience of my reader, who is doubtless already anxious to know the choice made by an author, so profoundly versed in the different branches of his art.

By fixing, then, the date of my story Sixty Years before this present 1st of November, 1805, I would have my readers understand, that they will meet in the following pages neither a romance of chivalry nor a tale of modern manners; that my hero will neither have iron on his shoulders, as of yore, nor on the heels of his boots, as is the present fashion of Bond Street; and that my damsel will neither be clothed in purple and pale, like the Lady Alice of an old ballad, nor reduced to the primitive nakedness of a modern fashionable at a rout. From this my choice of an era the understanding critic may infer the nearer proximity of the incidents of my description of men than manners. A tale of man- ners, to be interesting, must either refer to antiquity so great as to have become venerable, or it must bear a vivid reflection of those scenes which are passing daily before our eyes, and are interesting from their novelty. Thus the coat-of-mail of our ancestors, and the triple-threaded pelisse of our modern beaux, may, though as very different reasons, be equally fit for the array of a fictitious character; but who, meaning the costume of his hero to be impressive, would wil- lingly attire him in the court dress of George the Ste- phen, or the battle-dress of a hero crowned with palm- or pocket-holes? The same may be urged, with equal truth, of the Gothic hall, which, with its darkened and tinted windows, its elevated and gloomy roof, and massive gates all armed with brass and rose- and rosemary, pheasants and peacocks, cranes and cygnet, has an excellent effect in fictitious descrip- tion. Much may also be gained by a lively display of a modern fete, such as we have daily recorded in that part of a newspaper entitled the Mirror of Fas- sion, if we contrast these, or either of them, with the splendid formality of an entertainment given Sixty Years since; and thus it will be readily seen how much the painter of antique or of fashionable manners gains over him who delineates those of the last ger- ration.

Considering the disadvantages inseparable from this part of my subject, I must be understood to have resolved to avoid them as much as possible, by throwing the force of my narrative upon the charac- ters and passions of the actors; those passions common to men in all stages of society, and which have alike agitated the human heart, whether it threwed under the steel corslet of the fifteenth cen- tury, the brocaded coat of the eighteenth, or the blue- frock and white dimity waistcoat of the present day. Upon these passions it is no doubt true that the state...
CHAPTER II.

WAVERLEY-HONOUR.—A RETROSPECT.

It is, then, sixty years since Edward Waverley, the hero of the following pages, took leave of his family, to join the regiment of dragoons in which he had lately served, and go to India. He had just completed the melancholy day at Waverley-Honour when the young officer parted with Sir Everard, the affectionate old uncle to whose title and estate he was presumptive heir.

A difference in political opinions had early separated the Baronet from his younger brother Richard Waverley, the father of our hero. Sir Everard had inherited from his sire the whole train of Tory or High-church predilections and prejudices, which had distinguished the house of Waverley since the Great Civil War. Richard, on the contrary, who was ten years younger, beheld himself born to the fortune of a statesman, and anticipated the same life of magnificent leisure and unlimited entertainment in sustaining the character of Will Wimble. He saw early, that, to succeed in the race of life, it was necessary he should carry as little weight as possible. Painters talk of the difficulty of expressing the existence of compound passions in the same features at the same moment; it would be no less difficult for the moralist to analyze the mixed motives which unite to form the impulse of our actions. Richard Waverley read and satisfied himself from history and sound argument, that, in the words of the old song,

Passive obedience was a jest,
Yet soon would have probably been unable to combat a rise to hereditary prejudices, could Richard's Munro have anticipated that his elder brother, Sir Everard, taking to heart an early disappointment, would have remained a bachelor at seventy-two. The prospect of an accession, however remote, might in that case have led him to endure dragging through the greater part of his life as "Master Richard at the Hall, the bare son's brother," in the hope that ere its conclusion his father's wish, that Edward Waverley, of Waverley-Honour, successor to a princely estate, and to extended political connections as head of the county interest in the shire where it lay. But this was an illusion. The Munros were experienced in Richard's outset, when Sir Everard was in the prime of life, and certain to an acceptable suitor in almost any family, whether wealth or beauty should be the object of his pursuit, and when, indeed, his speedy marriage was a report which regularly amused the neighbourhood once a year. His younger brother saw no practicable road to independence save that of adhering to the trite and stereotyped system of the Congregational creed more consonant both to reason and his own interest than the hereditary faith of Sir Everard in High-church and in the house of Stewart. He therefore refrained from that of Euphrasia from her career, and entered life as an avowed Whig, and friend of the Hanover succession.

The ministry of George the First's time were prudent enough to diminish the phalanx of opposition. The Tory nobility, depending for their reflected lustre upon the sunshine of a court, had for some time been gradually reconciling themselves to the new dynasty. But the wealth by which men essayed to raise their rank, which retained, with much of ancient manners and primitive integrity, a great proportion of obstinate and unyielding prejudice, stood aloof in haughty and sullen opposition, and cast many a look of mingled regret and hope to Bois le Duc, Avignon, and Italy. The accession of the near relation of one of those steady and inflexible opponents was considered as a means of bringing over more converts to the cause. Richard Waverley met with a share of ministerial favour, more than proportioned to his talents or his political importance. It was, however, discovered that he was not the man to effect the design; and the first admittance to the minister's levee being negotiated, his success became rapid. Sir Everard, learned from the public News-Letter, that Richard, the Esquire, was appointed to a seat in the House of Commons. Sir Everard, Esquire, had taken a distinguished part in the debate upon the Excise bill in the support of government; and, lastly, that Richard Waverley, Esquire, had been honoured with a seat at one of those boards, where the pleasure of serving the country is combined with other important gratifications, which is the more acceptable occurrence regularly once a quarter.

Although these events followed each other so closely that the sagacity of the editor of a modern news-paper would have presumed the two last even while he announced the first, yet they came upon Sir Everard gradually, and drop by drop, as it were, distilled through the cool and procrastinating ambly of Drury's Weekly Letter. For it may be observed in passing, that instead of those mail-coaches, by means of which every mechanic at this sixpenny club may nightly learn from twenty contradictory channels the events of the week, Mr. Waverley, the esquire, had been brought, in those days, to Waverley-Honour, a Weekly Intelligencer, which, after it had gratified Sir Everard's curiosity, his sister's, and that of his aged butler, was transferred from the Rectory to the Rectory to Squirr Stubb's at the Grange, from the Squire to the Baronet's steward at his neat white house on the heath, from the steward to the bailiff, and from him to a huge circle of honest dames and gaffers, by whose hand and horned hands it was generally worn to pieces in about a month after its arrival.

This slow succession of intelligence was of some advantage to Richard Waverley in the case before us; for, had the sum total of his enormities reached the ears of Sir Everard at once, there can be no doubt that the friend of the commission would have been resolved to give Richard Waverley, of Waverley-Honour, successor to a princely estate, and to extended political connections as head of the county interest in the shire where it lay. But this was an illusion. The Munros were experienced in Richard's outset, when Sir Everard was in the prime of life, and certain to an acceptable suitor in almost any family, whether wealth or beauty should be the object of his pursuit, and when, indeed, his...
the atrocities laid by Dyce’s Letter to the door of Richard,) and if it had, the marriage of the proprietor might have been fatal to a collateral heir. These variations in the views of Sir Everard, without, however, producing any determined conclusion.

He examined the tree of his genealogy, which, embellished with many an emblematic mark of honour and heroic achievement, hung upon the well-varnished wainscot of his hall. The nearest descendants of Sir Hildebrand Waverley, failing those of his eldest son, were Sir Everard and his brother, of whom the only representative was, as this honoured register informed him, (and, indeed, as he himself well knew,) the Waverleys of Highley Park, com. Hereford, with whom, in the next branch, or rather stock, of the house had renounced all connexion, since the great law-suit in 1679.

This degenerate scion had committed a further offence against the head and source of their gentility, by the intermarriage of their representative with Judith, heiress of Oliver Bradshawe, of Highley Park, whose name, the same with those of Bradshawe the rascal, had gained notoriety with the ancient coat of Waverley. These offences, however, had vanished from Sir Everard’s collection in the heat of his resentment; and had Lawyer Clippercuse, for whom his grace had been too profuse, but a little while earlier, he might have had the benefit of drawing a new settlement of the lordship and manor of Waverley-Honour, with all its dependencies. But an hour of the greatest pride, when his policy employed the weighing the comparative evil of two measures, to neither of which we are internally partial. Lawyer Clippercuse found his patron involved in a deep study, upon which he was respectfully to disturb, otherwise than by producing his paper and leathern ink-case, as prepared to minute his honour’s commands. Even this slight manoeuvre was embarrassing to Sir Everard, who, when he looked at the attorney with some desire to issue his fiat, when the sun, emerging from behind a cloud, poured at once its chequered light through the stained window of the gloomy cabinet in which they were seated. The Baronet’s eye, as he raised it to the splendour, fell right upon the central escutcheon, impressed with the same device which his ancestor was said to have borne in the field of Hastings; three ermines passant, argent, in a field azure, with its appropriate motto, sans tache. "May our name rather perish," exclaimed Sir Everard, "than that ancient and illustrious name be the dishonoured insignia of a traitor’s Roundhead!"

All this was the effect of the glimpse of a sunbeam, just sufficient to light Lawyer Clippercuse to mend his pen, when the Baronet’s mind, as if by a sudden inspiration, was dismissed, with directions to hold himself in readiness in the first summons.

The apparition of Lawyer Clippercuse at the Hall occasioned much speculation in that portion of the world to which Waverley-Honour formed the centre, but the more judicious politicians of this microcosm accorded yet worse consequences to Richard Waverley from a movement which shortly followed his appearance. This was no less than an excursion of the Baronet’s coach-and-six, with four attendants in rich liveries, to make a visit of some duration to a nobleman for whose family and for whom he, by descent, steady Tory principles, and the happy father of six unmarried and accomplished daughters.

Sir Everard’s reception in this family was, as it may be easily conceived, sufficiently favourable; but of the six young ladies, his taste unfortunately determined him in favour of Lady Emily, the youngest, who received his attentions with an embarrassment, which, however, she durst not decline, and that they afforded her any thing but pleasure.

Sir Everard could not but perceive something unconcealed and mortifying in the young lady at the advances he hazarded; but, assured by the prudent Cantine that they were the natural effects of a retired education, the sacrifice might have been completed, as doubtless has happened in many similar instances, had it not been for the courage of an elder sister, who revealed to the wealthy suitor that Lady Emily’s affections were fixed upon the young and modest, but a man of a fortune, Sir Everard manifesting great emotion on receiving this intelligence, which was confirmed to him in a private interview, by the young lady herself, although under the most dreadful apprehensions of her father’s indignation.

Honour and generosity were hereditary attributes of the house of Waverley. With a grace and delicacy worthy the hero of a romance, Sir Everard withdrew his claim to the hand of Lady Emily. He had even, before leaving Blanville Castle, the address to extort from her father a consent to her union with the object of her choice. What arguments he employed in this point cannot exactly be known, for Sir Everard was never supposed strong in the powers of persuasion, but the young officer, immediately after this transaction, rose in the army with a rapidity far surpassing the usual pace of unpatronised professional merit, although, to outward appearance, that was all he had to depend upon.

The shock which Sir Everard encountered upon this occasion, although diminished by the consciousness of having acted virtuously and generously, had its effect upon his future life. His resolution of marriage had been put aside, but a little while before, and the border of courtship did not quite suit the dignified indolence of his habits; he had but just escaped the risk of marrying a woman who could not love him, and losing his pride in the exercise of his emotion of his amours, even if his heart had not suffered.

The result of the whole matter was his return to Waverley-Honour without any transfer of his affections, but shedding the sight and largessements of the fair tell-tale, who had revealed, in mere sisterly affection, the secret of Lady Emily’s attachment, and in despite of the nods, winks, and insinuations of this lady mother, and the gravity of the gipsies which the Earl pronounced successively on the prudence, and good sense, and admirable dispositions, of his first, second, third, fourth, and fifth daughters.

The memory of his unsuccessful amours was with Sir Everard, as with many more of his temper, at once shy, proud, sensitive, and indolent, a beacon against exposing himself to similar mortification, pain, and fruitless exertion, for the time to come. He continued to live at Waverley-Honour in the style of an old English gentleman, of an ancient descent and opulent fortune. His sister, Miss Rachel Waverley, presented to Whig and the placemen, though unable to stimulate him to resume any active measure prejudicial to Richard’s interest, in the succession to the family estate, continued to maintain his world between them. Richard knew enough of the world, and of his brother’s temper, to believe that by any ill-considered or precipitate advances on his part, he might turn his passive dislike into a more active principle. It was accident, therefore, which at length occasioned a renewal of their intercourse. Richard had married a young woman of rank, by whose family interest and connections in the county, he was enabled at his Waverley-Honour and Thoresby to form himself into an old bachelor and an ancient maiden lady, the gentlest and kindest of the votaries of celibacy.

The vehement of Sir Everard’s resentment against his brother, when he returned from his tour, was dismissed, with directions to hold himself in readiness in the first summons.

of personal property, but he no sooner beheld this family emblem, than he stoutly determined on vindicating his right to the plundered vehicle on which it was displayed. The Baronet arrived while the boy's maid was in vain endeavouring to make him desist from his determination to appropriate the gilded coach and six. The rencontre was at a happy moment for Edward, as his uncle has been just eyeing wistfully, with something of a feeling like envy, the chubby boys of the stout yeoman whose mansion was building by his direction. In the round-faced rosy cheeks before him, bearing his eye and his name, and vindicating a hereditary title to his family, affection, and patronage, by means of a tie which Sir Everard held as sacred as either Garter or Blue-cheater, Providence seemed to have granted him the very object best calculated to fill up the void in his hopes and affections. Sir Everard returned to Waverley-Hall upon a led horse, which was kept in readiness for his while the child and his attendant were sent home in the carriage to Brece-wood Lodge, with such a message as opened to Richard Waverley a door of reconciliation with his elder brother.

Their intercourse, however, though thus renewed, continued to be rather formal and civil, than pertaining of brotherly cordiality; yet it was sufficient to this first impression of the owner obtained, of the frequent society of his little nephew, something on which his hereditary pride might have found the anticipated pleasure of a continuation of his linage, and whose example would afford the means of the same time fully exercise themselves. For Richard Waverley, he beheld in the growing attachment between the uncle and nephew the means of securing his son's, if in little Edward, an additional portion of that love and esteem which he felt would be rather endangered than protected by any attempt on his own part towards a closer intimacy with a man of Sir Everard's habits and pursuits.

Thus, by a sort of tacit compromise, little Edward was permitted to pass the greater part of the year at the Hall, and appeared to stand in the same intimate relation to both families, although their mutual intercourse was otherwise most infrequent, and more formal visits. The education of the youth was regulated alternately by the taste and opinions of his uncle and of his father. But more of this in a subsequent chapter.

CHAPTER III.

EDUCATION.

This education of our hero, Edward Waverley, was of a nature somewhat desultory. In infancy, his nurses had been employed, in successive years, by different persons, and in several different parts of the country, and a very considerable share of his time was occupied in attending their visits. In his early education, he was allowed to follow his inclinations, and to pursue the studies of which he was most fond. He was a diligent reader, and soon acquired a facility in writing, and was fond of music. He was also a good scholar, and soon became proficient in the use of the globe, and in the study of natural history. He was, however, old and indulgent, and the recurring interregnum, during which Edward was entirely freed from his discipline, occasioned such a relaxation of authority, that the youth was permitted, in a great measure, to learn as he pleased, and to be guided by his own inclinations, and by the care of his preceptor was to prevent him, as a sportsman would phrase it, from overrunning his game, or exceeding the bounds of his master and of his master's master. And the severe instructor had to combat another propensity too often united with brilliancy of fancy and vivacity of talent, that indolence, namely, of disposition, which can only be subdued by the strength of gratification and which renounces study as soon as curiosity is gratified, the pleasure of conquering the first difficulties exhausted, and the novelty of pursuit at an end. Edward Waverley, as the son of an author, was, by the laws of classical authors by which his preceptor proposed the perusal, make himself master of the style so far as to understand the story, and, if pleased or interested him, to be able to attempt fixing his attention on critical distinctions of phrasing, upon the difference of idiom, the beauty of felicitous expression, or the artificial combinations of syntax; in short, to be a skilful and an accurate workman, said young Edward, with the self-confidence and rash reasoning of fifteen, "and Scenler or Bentley could not do much more." Also, while he was thus permitted to lead only for the amusement, he foresaw not that he was losing for ever the opportunity of acquiring habits of firm and assiduous application, of gaining the art of controlling himself, while cultivating the mind of his mind for earnest investigations—an art far more necessary than even that intimate acquaintance with classical learning which is the primary object of study. I am aware I may be here reminded of the necessity of restraining instruction agreeable to youth, and of Tasso's infusion of honey into the medicine prepared for a child; but an age in which children are taught the driest doctrines by the infusant method of instructive recreation, has little reason to complain of the consequences of study being rendered too serious or severe. The history of England is now reduced to a game at cards—the troubles of mathematicians to puzzles and riddles. By all means, let them be as assured, be sufficiently acquired, by spending a few hours a week at a new and complicated edition of the Royal Game of the Goose. There wants but one step further, and the Creed and Ten Commandments may be taught in the same manner, without the necessity of the grave face, deliberate tone of recital, and devout attention hitherto exacted from the well-governed children of this realm. It may, in the meantime, be subject of serious consideration, whether those who are accustomed only to acquire instruction through the medium of amusement, may not be brought to seek that which is not in the spirit of study, whether those who learn history by the cards, may not be led to prefer the means to the end and whether we are to teach religion in the old way of respectability, and with the help of a law to afford him amusement, the indulgence of his tutors was attended with evil consequences, which long continued to influence his character, happiness, and utility.

Edward's power of imagination and love of literature, although the former was vivid, and the latter ardent, were so far from affording a remedy to this peculiar evil, that they relaxed, subsided, and increased violence. The library at Waverley-Honour, a large Gothic room, with double arches and a gallery, contained such a miscellaneous and extensive collection of volumes as had never been assembled together, during the course of two hundred years, by a family which had always been wealthy, and inclined, of course, as a mark of splendour, to furnish it with books. It was filled with the current literature of the day, without much scrutiny, or nicety of discrimination. Throughout this ampliarium Edward was permitted to roam at large. His tutor had made the same rules of conduct and political and controversial divinity, together with a love of learned ease, though they did not withdraw his attention at stated times from the progress of his patron's proselytes. The result was, though he was severe at any apology for not extending a strict and regulated survey towards his general studies. Sir Everard had never been himself a student, and, like his sister, Miss Rachel Waverley, held the common doctrine, that idleness is incompatible with reading of any kind, and that the more tracing the alphabetical characters with the eyes, is in itself a useful and meritorious task, without scrupulously considering what ideas or doctrines they may happen to convey. With a desire of amusement, therefore, which better discipline might soon have converted into a thirst for knowledge, you read with eager contemplation of books, like a vessel without a pilot or a rudder. Nothing perhaps increases by indulgence more than a desultory habit of reading, especially under such opportunities of gratification as a time of recreation, which had so many instances of occlusion among the lower ranks was, that, with the same powers of mind, the poor student is limited to a narrow circle for indulging his passion, and it is necessary to make himself master of the few he possesses so he can acquire more. Edward, on the contrary, like the epicure who only deigned to take a single morsel from the sunny side of a crop, with a view to the future, ceased to excite his curiosity or interest; and it necessarily happened, that the habit of seeking only this sort of gratification rendered it daily more difficult of attainment, till the passion for reading, like other strong appetites, produced by indulgence a sort of satiety.

Ere his attained this indifference, however, he had read, and stored in a memory of uncommon tenacity, much curious, though ill-arranged and miscellaneous information. In English literature he was master of Shakespeare and Milton, of our earlier dramatic authors, of many parts of old historical chronicles, and was particularly well acquainted with Spencer, Drayton, and other poets, who have exercised themselves on romantic fiction. Of all the works of French writers, Edward had, in youthful imagination, before the passions have rooted themselves, and demand poetry of a more sentimental description. In this respect his acquaintance with Italian opened him yet a wider range. He had purchased the numerous romantic poems, which, from the days of Pufte, have been a favourite exercise of the wits of Italy, and had sought gratification in the numerous collections of nozze, which were brought forth by the genius of that elegant though luxurious nation, in emulation of the Decameron. In classical literature, Waverley had made the usual progress, and read the chief authors. Idealism and the French had afforded him an almost inexhaustible collection of memoirs, scarcely more faithful than romances, and of romances so well written as hardly to be distinguished from memoirs. Thus the splendid pages of Proserpina, with his heart-stirring and eye-dazzling descriptions of war and of tournaments, were among his chief favourites; and from those of Bontemps and De la Noe he learned. A still more constant and superstitious character of the nobles of the League, with the stern, rigid, and sometimes turbulent disposition of the Huguenot party. The Spanish had contributed to his acquirement of knowledge. The vast literature of the northern nations did not escape the study of one who read rather to awaken the imagination than to benefit the understanding. And yet knowledge was new, Edward Waverley might justly be considered as ignorant since he knew little of what adds dignity to man, and qualifies him to support and adorn an elevated situation in society.

The occasional attention of his parents might indeed have been of service, to prevent the dissipation of mind incidental to such a desultory course of reading. But the reconciliation between the brothers, and Richard Waverley himself, who, after this event, rested more constantly in London, was too much interested in his own plans of wealth and ambition, to notice more respecting Edward, than that he was of a very bookish turn, and probably destined to be a bishop. If he could have discovered and analyzed his son's waking dreams, he would have formed a very different conclusion.

CHAPTER IV.

CASTLE-BUILDING.

I have already hinted, that the dainty, quaintish, and fastidious tie acquired by a surfeit of idle reading, had not only rendered our hero unfit for serious and sober study, but had even disgusted him in some degree with that in which he had hitherto indulged. He was in his sixteenth year, when his habits of reading began to diminish. There was a marked, as to excite Sir Everard's sniffing appreciation. He tried to counterbalance these propensities, by enacting his nephew in field-sports, and giving him a fruitful time of it. But although Edward eagerly carried the run for one season, yet when practice had given him some dexterity, the pastime ceased to afford him amusement.

In the succeeding spring, the perusal of the new Isaac Walton's fascinating volume determined Edward to become 'a brother of the angling.' But of all diversions which were fitted for the exercise of idleness, fishing was the worst qualified to amuse a man who is at once indolent and impatient; and our hero's rod was speedily flung aside. Society and example, which, more than any other motives, master and sway the natural bent of our passions, might have had their usual effect upon the youthful visionary. But the neighbourhood was thinly inhabited, and the home-bred young squire whom it afforded, were not of a class fit to form Edward's usual companions, far less to excite him to emulation in the practice of those pastimes which composed the serious business of their society.

There were a few other youths of better education, and a more liberal character, but from their society also our hero was in some degree excluded. Sir Eve-

There were a few other youths of better education, and a more liberal character, but from their society also our hero was in some degree excluded. Sir Everard would scarcely have permitted his young friend to sit in Parliament, and, as his age increased, and the number of his contemporaries diminished, had gradually withdrawn himself from society; so that when, upon any particular occasion, Edward managed well, accomplished and well-educated young men of his own rank and expectations, he felt an inferiority in their company, not so much from deficiency of information, as from the want of the skill to command and to arrange that which he possessed. A deep and increasing sensibility added to this dislike of society. The idea of having committed the slightest solecism in social intercourse, whether real or imaginary, was agony to him; for perhaps even guilt itself does not impose upon some minds so keen a sense of shame and remorse, as a modest, sensitive, and inexperienced youth feels from the consciousness of having neglected etiquette, or excited ridicule. Where we are not at ease, we cannot be happy; and therefore it is not surprising, that Edward Waverley supposed that he displeased and frightened all about him. He had not yet acquired the habit of living in it with ease and comfort, and of reciprocally giving and receiving pleasure.

The hours he spent with his uncle and aunt were exhausted in listening to the oft-repeated tale of narrative old age. Yet even there his imagination, the predominant faculty of his mind, was frequently excited. Family traditions, so many of which were based upon which much of Sir Everard's knowledge. is the very reverse of amber, which, itself a valuable substance, usually includes flies, straw, and other trifles, and when it is put to use and found itself with itself, is insignificant and trifling. It was never intended to serve to perpetuate a great deal of what is rare and valuable in ancient manners, and to record many curious and interesting facts. The bees, being wise and reserved, have conveyed through no other medium. If, therefore, Edward Waerley yawned at times over the dry deduction of his line of ancestors, with their various infor- mation and indirectly depriving the remorseless and protracted accuracy with which the worthy Sir Everard rehearsed the various degrees of propriety between the house of Waerley and the house of Waerley, and for whom a little girl scowled at his being the less and more protracted, he sometimes cursed in his heart the jargon of heraldry, its gruffness, its mold- warpa, its wavern, and its dragons, with all the bitterness of Hotspur himself, there were moments when these communications interested his fancy and rewarded his attention.

The deeds of Wibert of Waerley in the Holy Land, his long absence and perilous adventures, his supposed death, and his return on the evening when the betrothed of his heart had waded the hero who had somehow or other come into his possession during his absence; the generosity with which the Crusader relinquished his claims, and sought in a neighbouring cloister that peace which passed not away;—to these things would have been as welcome as the dew fell on his head and his eye glistened. Nor was he less affected, when his aunt, Mrs. Rachel, narrated the sufferings and fortune of Lady Alice Waverley during the Crusades. The solemn and benevolent features of the venerable spinsterkindled into more majestic expression, as she told how Charles had, after the battle of Muret, found a day's refuge at Waverley-Honour, and how, with the poor clove of cavaliere were attempting to search the mansion, Lady Alice dismissed her youngest son with a handful of domestics, charging them to make good with their lives an hour's diversion, that the king might have that space for escape. "And, God help her," would Mrs. Rachel continue, fixing her eyes upon the heroine's portrait as she spoke, "full dearly did she purchase the safety of her prince with the life of her darling child. They brought him in his prison, mortally wounded; and you may trace the drops of his blood from the great hall door alone the little gallery, and up to the saloon, where they would have been traced to the king's feet. But there was comfort exchanged between them; for he knew, from the glance of her mother's eye, that the purpose of her desperate defence was attained. Ah! I remember it well. I was there. I remember the sound of her voice, and the look upon her face. I remember that one who knew and loved her. Miss Lucy St. Aunbin lived and died a maid for his sake, though one of the most beautiful and wealthy matches in the country; all the world ran after her, but she wore widow's mourning all her life for poor William, for they were betrothed though not married, and died in.

I cannot think of the date; but I remember, in the November of that very year, when she found her- self sinking, she desired to be brought to Waverley —Honour once more, and visited all the places where she had been with her grand-uncle, and caused the expector to be raised that she might trace the impression of his blood, and if tears could have washed it out, it had not been there now; for there was not a dry eye in the house. You would have thought, Ed- ward, that the very trees mourned for her, for their leaves dropt around her without a gust of wind; and, indeed, she looked like one that would never see them again.

From such legends our hero would steal away to indulge the fancies they excited. In the corner of the large and sombre Library, with no other light than the moonlight from the ceiling, the great and fantastic forms of the real lord, as he stood in his pilgrim's weeds, an unnoticed spectator of the festivities of his supposed heir and intended bride; the electric shock occasioned by the discovery; the springing of the vassals to arms; the astonishment of the lord; the terror and confusion of the bride; the agony with which Willibert observed, that her heart as well as her outward extremities were in the air of dignity, yet of deep feeling, with which he hung down the half-drawn sword, and turned away far ever from the house of his ancestors. Then would be change the scene, and fancy would at his wish represent Aunt Rachel's tragedy. He saw the Lady Waverley seated in her bower, her ear strained to every sound, her heart throbbling with double agony, now listening to the decaying echo of the hoof of the king's horse, and when that had died away, hearing in every breath that shook the trees of the park, the noise of the remote skirmish. A distant sound is heard, it is the sound of horses. Edward looks out of the window. The horse is nearer, and Edward can plainly distinguish the galloping of horses, the cries and shouts of men, with struggling palm-shots between, rolling forwards to the Hall. "And God help her," says Edward, "and in this solemn crusade in—why pursue such a description!"

As living in this ideal world became daily more delectable to our hero, interruption was disagreeable in proportion. The extensive domain that surrounded the Hall, which, far exceeding the dimensions of a park, was usually termed Waverley-Chase, had originally been forest ground, and still, though broken by extensive dales and by the meadow land, preserved its wild and savage character. It was traversed by broad avenues, in many places half grown up with brushwood, where the beauties of former days used to take their stand to see the stag coursed with greyhounds, or to gain an aim at him with the cross-bow. In one spot, distinguished by a moss-grown Gothic monument, which retained the name of Queen's Standing, Elizabeth herself was said to have pierced seven bucks with her own arrows. This was a very favourite haunt of Waverley. At other times, with his gun and his spaniel, which served as a trap, and a satchel in his pocket, which perhaps served as an apology to him self, he used to pursue one of these long avenues, which, after an ascending sweep of four miles, gradu- ally narrows into a strait path, often lost in the cliffs and wooded pass called Mirkwood Dingle, and opened suddenly upon a deep, dark, and small lake, named, from the same cause, Mirkwood-Mere. There stood, in former times, a solitary tower, built of rock almost surrounded by the water, which had acquired the name of the Strength of Waverley, because, in perilous times, it had often been the refuge of the family. There, in the wars of York and Lancaster, the last adherents of the Red Rose who dared to maintain her cause, carried on a harassing and predatory warfare, till the stronghold was reduced by the celebrated Richard of Gloucester. Here, too, in the long campaigns of cavaliers long maintained themselves under Nigel Waverley, elder brother of that William whose fate Aunt Rachel commemorated. Through those scenes it was that Edward loved to "chew the cud of sweet and bitter fancy," and, like a child among his toys, culled and arranged, from the splendid yet useless imagery and emblems with which his imagination was stored, yokes, vases, and an emblem on an evening sky. The effect of this indulgence upon his temper and character will appear in the next chapter.
Aunt Rachel's anxiety, however, lent her address to carry her motives. Her son's conduct appeared so strange that his house had visited foreign parts or served his country in the army, before he settled for life at Waverley Honour, and she appealed for the truth of her assertion to the general public. Sir Edward was never a public man. In short, a proposal was made to Mr. Richard Waverley, that his son should travel, under the direction of his present tutor, Mr. Pembroke, who had the prudent advice of the Baronet, and the latter himself saw no objection to this enterprise; but in mentioning it casually at the table of the inn, the fact soon broke. The reason was explained in private. A miser, who had been a relative of Sir Edward, left an immense fortune, which had been invested in such usufructs as to make seven suitors for the widow. In the last instance, it was concluded that a gentleman of some property and in the line of the family should have the preference by his intransigence. What might Mr. Edward Waverley's society be at Paris, what at Rome, where all manner of stories were spread by the Preceptor and his sons? These were points for Mr. Waverley to consider. This he could perhaps say, that he knew nothing on the subject of the suitor, of the young Waverley's fortune, or of the suitors for the widow. A letter was written, and an answer sent to the Baronet, which closed the matter.

Nor the defence of so many personal consequences seem to correspond with the report spread among his white neighbours. It was very well known that he had supplied with money several of the disaffected inhabitants of the district, who, after being made prisoners at Preston in Lancashire, were imprisoned in Newgate and the Marshalsea, and it was his skill and ordinary counsel who conducted the defence of so many unfortunate gentlemen at their trial. It was generally supposed, however, that, had ministers possessed any real proof of Sir Everard's accession to the rebellion, he either would not have been ventured thus to disturb the existing government, or at least would not have done so with impunity. The feelings which then dictated his proceedings were those of a young man, and at an exciting period. Since that time, Sir Everard's Jacobinism had been gradually decaying, like a fire which burns out for want of fuel. His Tory and Highchurch principles were kept up by some occasional exactions at elections and quarter-assessments; but those respecting legitimacy were fallen into a sort of abeyance. Yet it appeared severely upon his feelings, that his nephew should go into the army under the Brunswickers, and that, notwithstanding his high and conscientious ideas of paternal authority, it was impossible, or at least highly imprudent, to interfere authoritatively to prevent it. This superseded his exertion to many civil petitions, which were placed to the account of the ineptitude of a gout, until, having sent for the Army last, the worthy Baronet consigned himself with reckoning the descendants of the house of Waverley, Arundel, Granville, and Stanley, whose names were to be found in that military record; and, calling upon all his factions of family grandeur and warfare, he could not be said to have done anything like Falstaff, when that he was arm in hand, although he was shame to be on any side but one, it were worse shame to lose than to be on the worst side, though blacker than surprise, to be made the tool of a fortune; to the only age. His scheme had not exactly translated according to her wishes, but she was under the necessity of submitting to circumstances; and her mortification was diversified by the employment she found in fitting out her nephew for the campaign, and greatly consul by the prospect of beholding him blaze in complete uniform.

Edward Waverley himself received with animation and understanding to suppress this most unexpected intelligence. It was, as a fine old poet expresses it, "like a fire to heat sober," that covers a solitary hill with smoke, and illuminates it at the same time with dusky flame. I would say, he heard, he saw, and understood the nower of the formation of Cecilia's eyes; which he appeared to have composed under the influence of the aching for love occasioned by this sudden piece being turned up to him in the book of life. The doctor, who was a believer in all poetry which was composed by his friends, and written out in fair straight lines, with a capital at the beginning of each, communicated this treasure to Aunt Rachel, who, with her spectacles dimmed with tears, transferred them to her common-place book, among choice receipts for confectionary and medicine, and letters and parts from High-church divines, and a few verses, amatory and jocose, which she had collected in her younger days, from whom her nephew's poetical talent was extracted when the volume itself, with other authentic records of the Waverley family, were exposed to the inspection of the unworthy editor of this untimely history. If they afford the reader no hint of the history, they were at least, betterwise, some narrative of any kind, to acquaint him with the wild and irregular spirit of our hero:

Late, when the Autumn evening fell on Monk's Mount, and the moon shone dimly, the garden, in shadow, the parterre clad, the golden beams, the walls of the moist, the hand and heart, lay far and cold; the wind turned dark and lower, with despairing true, with fair flower, Waverley, to the mind of the baroness of Vale, nor the Gnome of the Lake. He laboured at the coming of the sun, and did not once at the cottage, in the garden, lie with his panoply: Thus the wind and water turned, and the sun did not make his enemy. Fare, they knew how black and described, and the forms of some in thunder would soon, she would have done so; And to the shore in tumult too. The realm of flax was lost, And you, with a stern delight and strength, I saw the crouching change. As he with a wind with wave and wood, And the sand tower stood, And I felt my heart more strongly bound, Responsive to the last sound. While, going in the morning, I saw, that that tranquil scene was, On the idle dreams of youth, And so I'm in the trumpet call of truth, And in the fair vision pass away. And land to the lake that far, As that which feed the autumn pulse. For I send to every heart, to be, in such a form that filled by, White dreams of love and a heart's change, All was made to mould and to arms.

In other places, as perhaps the reverse is less decisively the thought of Miss Cecilia's, who passed from Captain Waverley's heart amid the tumult which his new destinies excited. She appeared, indeed, indistinctly in her father's pew upon the Saturday, when he attened service for the last time at the old parish church, upon which occasion, at the request of his uncle and Aunt Rachel, he was induced (nothing less, if the truth must be told) to present himself in the church vestry. There is no better antidote against dull training than a high opinion of others, than having an excellent one of ourselves at the same time. Miss Stubbs was made for the rank and place in society, and was introduced among the young officers of dragoons, who wore, for the first time, his gold-laced hat, jack-boots, and broadsword. I know not whether, like the champion of an old ballad,

His heart was all on honour bent, No lady in the land had power His frozen heart to move; or whether the deep and flaming bars of embroidered black against the light of the sun, which I did, when the wind blew, flashed and shaded Cecilia's eyes; but every arrow was launched in his own vein.

Yet did I mark where Cupid's shaft did light; It glittered not on little western flower. But at bold yeoman, flower of all the west, Hight Jonas Colberfield, the steward's son.

Craving pardon for my heroics, (which I am unable in certain cases to resist giving way to,) it is a melancholy fact, that my history must here take leave of the fair Cecilia, who, like many a daughter of Eve, after the departure of Edward, and the dissolution of certain effects, was left in ignorance as to the real name, and adopted, quietly consigned herself with a kiss and a kiss and a kiss, to the care of Jonas, son of the Baronet's steward, and heir (in unfruitful prospect) to the estate and title: so that the whole probability of succeeding to his father's office. All these advantages moved Squire Stubbs, as much as the ruby bowl and many form of the suit influenced his daughter's heart, to abandon the article of their gentry; and so the match was concluded. None seemed more gratified than Aunt Rachel, who had with due looked rather askance upon the presumptuous damsel. She was not set, but (as she would permit,) but who, on the first appearance of the new-married pair at church, honoured the bride with a smile and a profound courtesy, in presence of the priest, the clerk, and all the congregation of the united parishes of Waverley and Beverley.
CHAPTER VI.

The Address of Waverley.

It was upon the evening of this memorable Sunday that Sir Everard entered the library, where he narrowly missed surprising our young hero as he went through the gait of the gay cavalier, with the ancient weapon of old Sir Hildebrand, which, being preserved as an heirloom, usually hung over the chimney in the library, beneath a picture of the knight, whose portrait was entirely hidden by the knave’s profession of curdled hair, and the Bucephalus which he bestrided concealed by the voluminous robes of the Bath with which he was decorated. Sir Everard entered, and after a glance at the picture and another at his nephew, began a little speech, which, however, soon dropped into the natural simplicity of his common manner, agitated upon the present occasion by no common feeling.

“Nephew,” he said; “as you may have heard, my dear Edward, it is God’s will, and also the will of your father, whom, under God, it is your duty to obey, that you should leave us to take up the profession of arms, in which many of your ancestors have been distinguished. I have made such arrangements as will enable you to take the field as their descendant, and as the successor of the house of Waverley. In the field of battle, you will remember what name you bear. And, Edward, my dear boy, remember also that you are the last of that race, and the only hope of its revival depends upon you; therefore, as far as my power and influence permit, avoid danger—mean unnecessary danger—and keep no company with rakes, gamblers, and Whigs, of whom it is to be feared, are but too many in the service into which you are gone. Your colonel, as I am informed, is an excellent man—for a Presbyterian; but you will remember your duty to God, the Church of Scotland, and the country; be on your guard, and be prepared, to the utmost of your power, for his campaign. Two were black, (the regimental colour,) superb chargers both; the other three were stout active hacks, designed for the road, or for his domestics, of whom two were to attend him from the Hall; an additional groom, if necessary, might be picked up in Scotland.

“You will depart with but a small retinue,” quoth the Baron, “provided, and indeed, counsels to Sir Hildebrand, who mustered before the gate of the Hall a larger body of horse than your whole regiment consists of. I could have wished that these twenty young fellows from every estate and every noble family in Scotland, should march with you on your journey to Scotland. It would have been something, at least; but I am told their attendance would be thought unusual in these days, when every new and foolish fashion is introduced to break the natural dependence of the people upon their landlords.”

Sir Everard had done his best to correct this unnatural disposition of the time; for he had hardened the chain of attachment between the recruits and their young captain, not only by a copious repast of beef and ale, by way of parting feast, but by such speeches as made him incline to each individual rather to improve the conviviality than the discipline of their march. After inspecting the cavalry, Sir Everard again conducted his nephew to the library, where the production of a box of fine tobacco, a little stripe of flax-silk, according to ancient form, and sealed with an accurate impression of the Waverley coat-of-arms. It was addressed, with great formality, to the Hon. Sir John Comyn Bradwardine, 3rd of Bradwardine, at his principal mansion of Tully-Veolan, in Pembrokeshire, North Britain. These—by the hand of Captain Edward Waverley, nephew of Sir Everard, 3rd of Waverley, of Waverley Castle—were despatched.

The gentleman to whom this enormous gift was addressed, of whom we shall have more to say in the sequel, had been in arms for the exiled family of Stuart, by whom he was distantly carried in the womb of his mother at Preston in Lancashire. He was of a very ancient family, and somewhat embarrassed fortune; a scholar, according to the scholarship of Scotmam, that he had been a milk-bottle instead of a cradle, and that he was rather more of a grammarian. Of his zeal for the classic authors he is said to have given an uncommon instance. On the road between Preston and London he made his escape from his pursuers, but being afterwards found lurking about the place where they had lodged the former night, he was recognised, and again arrested. His companions, and even his sword, were surprised at his infatuation, and could not make him believe his liberty; he had not made the best of his way to a place to which he applied; that he had intended to do so, in good faith, he acknowledged, and in his Titus Livius, which he had forgotten in the hurry of his escape. The simplicity of this anecdote struck the gentleman, who, as we before observed, had managed the defence of some persons, as he beheld Sir Everard, and perhaps some others of the party. He was, besides, himself a special admirer of the old Patavini, and thought probably his own zeal might not have carried him much extravagance length; even he recovered the edition of Swenheim and Pannartz, (supposed to be the princes,) he did not less the estimation of the North Briton, and in consequence exerted himself to see much purpose to remove, and soften evidence, detect legal flaws, et cetera, that he accomplished the final discharge and delivery of Cosmo Comyn Bradwardine from certain very awkward consequences of a place before our sovereign lord the king in Westminster.

The Baron of Bradwardine, for he was generally so called in Scotland, (although his intimates, from this place, used to denominate him Tully-Veolan, or, more familiarly, Tully,) no sooner stood rectus in curia, than he posted down to pay his respects.
AVERLEY. [CHAP. VI.

pects and make his acknowledgments at Waverley-Honour. A congenial passion for field-sports, and a great love for the,republican and social intercourse, cemented his friendship with Sir Everard, notwithstanding the difference of their habits and studies in other particulars; and, having spent several weeks at Waverley-Honour, he found the sports and pastimes, with the fresh expression of regard, warmly pressing the Baronet to return his visit, and partake of the diversion of grouse-shooting upon his moors in Perthshire next season. Shortly after, Mr. Bradwardine remitted from Scotland a sum in reimbursement of expenses incurred in the King's High Court of Westminster, which, although not quite so formidable when reduced to the English denomination, amounted to two hundred pounds, shillings, and pence, such a formidable effect upon the finances of Duncan Macweehie, the laird's confidential factor, baron-bailie, and man of resource, that he had a fit of the cholic which lasted for five days, occasioned, he said, solely and utterly by becoming the unhappy instrument of conveying such a serious sum of money out of his native country into the hands of the false English. But patriotism, as it is the fairest, so it is often the most suspicious mask of other feelings; and many who knew Bailie Macweehie, concluded that his professions of regret were mere hypocrisy, and he had grudged the money paid to the Ionos at Westminster much less had they not come from Bradwardine estate, a fund which he considered as more particularly his own. So the Bailie protested he was absolutely disinterested—

The laird was only rejoiced that his worthy friend, Sir Everard Waverley of Waverley-Honour, was reimbursed of the expenditure which he had outlaid on account of the house of Bradwardine. It concerned, he said, not only his own family, but also the inhabitants of Scotland at large, that these disbursements should be repaid forthwith, and, if delayed, it would be a matter of national reproach. Sir Everard, accustomed to treat much larger sums with indifference, received the remittance of 294 l. 13s. 6d., without being aware that the payment was an international concern, and, indeed, would probably have forgotten the circumstance altogether, if Bailie Macweehie had not thought of comforting his choly by intercepting the subsidy. A yearly intercourse took place, a letter, and a hamper or a cask or two, between Waverley-Honour and Bradwardine; consisting of mighty cheeses and mutton, pleasant, and venison, and the Scottish returns being vested in goose, white hares, pickled salmon, and unripe turnips, and received, as pledges of constant friendship and amity between two important houses. It followed as a matter of course, that the heir-apparent of Waverley-Honour could not with propriety visit Scotland without being furnished with credentials to the Baron of Bradwardine.

When this matter was explained and settled, Mr. Pembroke expressed his wish to take a private and particular leave of his dear pupil. The good man's exhortations to Edward to preserve an unblemished life and morals, to hold fast the principles of the Christian religion, and to eschew the profane ordinances of many of scoffers and lattitudinarians, too much abounding in the army, were not unmingled with his political prejudices. It had pleased Heaven, he said, to place Scotland (doubtless for the sins of her ancestors in 1642) in a more deplorable state of darkness than even this unhappy kingdom of England. Here, at least, although the candlestick of the Church of England was quenched in some degree, the lamp of that place, it yet afforded a glimmering light; there was a hierarchy; church scholastics, and from the principles maintained by those great fathers of the church, many of the more religious and de-
CHAPTER VII.

A HORSE-QUARTER IN SCOTLAND.

The next day Mr. Pembroke again called on the publisher, but found Tom Albio's advice had determined him. "Not what I would go to—(what was I going to say?) to the Plantations for the church with—please—but, dear doctor, I have a wife and family; but, to show a little of that Robespierre spirit, that Spanishull was to be weighed and sold for出境, as a voyage in a western barge would not inconvenience him."

But Mr. Trimmed was also obdurate, and the man's destiny, unfortunately pernicious for himself, was compelled to return to Waverley-Honour with his treatise in vindication of the real fundamental principles of church and state safely packed in his saddle-bags.

As the public were thus likely to be deprived of the benefit arising from his lucubrations by the selfish cowardice of the traite, Mr. Pembroke resolved to lend impression, that he was now in a great measure for the use of his pupil. He felt that he had been indiscreet as a tutor, and, besides, his conscience checked him for complying with the request of Mr. Richard Vale, as a pledge of his regard for Edward's mind inconsistent with the present settlement in church and state. But now, through, thought he, I may, without breach of my word, since he is no longer a child, tell him the method of judging for himself, and have only to dread his proffers for so long concealing the light which the person will flash upon his mind. While he thus indulged himself an author and a politician, his literary prose, laying open the whole system of the tract, and appalled by the bulk and compact lines of the manuscript, counselled them to a corner of the trivelling room. And Rachel's farewell was brief and affectionate. She only cautioned her dear Edward, whom she probably deemed somewhat susceptible, against the fascinations of Scottish beauty. She allowed that the nameless, speechless part of the island contained some families, but they were all Whigs and Presbyterians except the Highlanders; and respecting them she must needs say, there could be no great delicacy among the ladies, where the gentleman is, as in duty bound, as she had been assured, to say the least, very singular, and not at all decorous. She concluded her farewell with a kind and moving benediction, and gave the young officer, as a pledge of her regard, a valuable diamond ring, (often worn by the male sex at that time,) and a purse of broad gold pieces, which also were more common Sixties years since than they have been of late. discovering the various partial movements necessary to execute a particular evolution; and why his manner of inciting them to such mimic rules and his method of discipline had been so mild and gentle, because he had made an indifferent subservient he was, that the vague and unsatisfactory conduct of the corps which he had formed, worked upon a temper naturally retir’d and abstracted, had given him that wavering and unsteady habit of mind, which is most adverse to study and resoluted attention. These were the reasons which made his hand and head rapid. The gentry of the neighbourhood were disgusted, and showed little hospitality to the military guests; and the people of the town, chiefly ensnared in mercantile pursuits, were not as Waverley chose to associate with. The arrival of summer, and a curiosity to know something more of Scotland than he could see in a rude, from his quarters, determined him to request leave of absence for a few weeks. He resolved first to visit his uncle’s ancient friend and correspondent, with the purpose of extending or shortening the time of his residence according to circumstances. He travelled of course on horseback, and with a single servant, who had first procured him a miserably inn, where the landlady had neither shoes nor stockings, and the landlord, who called himself a squire, was disposed to be rude to his guest, because he had not paid his bill in money, with a care to superintend the next day, traversing an open and uninhabited country. Edward gradually approached the Highlands of Perthshire, which at first appeared a blue outline in the distance, but which he afterwards descried the summit of Ben Lawers, and, if easy-hair’d old could be inught before, there had dwelt his ancestors, with all their inheritances, since the days of the gracious King Duncan.

CHAPTER VIII.

A SCOTTISH MANOR-HOUSE SIXTY YEARS SINCE.

It was about noon when Captain Waverley entered the straggling village, or rather hamlet, of Tully-Veolan, close to which was situated the mansion of the proprietor. The houses seemed miserable in the extreme, and formed the curiously picturesque scene of cottage and manor, which formed distance on the more level country that lay beneath them. Near the bottom of this stupendous barrier, still in the Lowland country, he descried the summit of Ben Lawers, and, if easy-hair’d old could be inught before, there had dwelt his ancestors, with all their inheritances, since the days of the gracious King Duncan.

*The courtesy of an invitation to partake a traveller’s meal, at the hospitable house of the lower door which was given to the guest called for, was expected by certain old landlords in Scotland even in the youth of the author. It was not so in Edinburgh, where the habit of dogs and the hospitality of the country, and was probably a little of a humbug in the Bo’ness. The revolution of the whole eating house was upon the poor administrator, was very common among the Scotch Barons. There was a man of this nature, in the city of Edinburgh, a certain man of good family, who was esteemed, in order to earn a livelihood, to become the ‘broom keeper’ of a coffee-house; one of the many that have been kept by the same hands in the Scotch metropolis. Eventually, it was entirely managed by the candle maker, and he was not even allowed to make use of himself with field Stealth, without troubling his head about the matter. Thereupon a dance the premises having taken fire, the landlord, balconied, and the destination of the same was not, as on the following occasion:—

The man who was in the house, his pride and hero, asked Mrs. Buchanan whether she ever had had such a party at her house. Here sits I, he said.

bleached white, by the influence of the sun, had a look and manner of life and interest. It seemed, upon the whole, as if poverty, and the death, its too frequent concomitant, had deprived the natural genius and acquired information of a hardy, intelligent, and reflecting peculiarity.

Some such thoughts crossed Waverley's mind as he walked along through the nudged and stony street of Tully-Teolan, interrupted only in his meditations by the occasional caprice which his charger exhibited at the reiterated assaults of those lock and spring of his, the colt before mentioned. The village was more than half a mile long, the cottages being irregularly divided from each other by gardens, or yards, as the inhabitants called them, of different size and form; and resembling the natural shape of the terrain in which the universal potato was unknown, but which were stored with gigantic plants of kale or colewort, encircled with groves of nettles, and exhibited here and there a huge hemlock, or the national thistle, overshadowing a quarter of the petty enclosure. The broken ground on which the village was built had never been levelled, so that these enclosures presented declivities of every degree, here rising like terraces, there sinking like pits. The dry-stone walls which fenced, or seemed to fence, (for they were sorely breached,) these higgledy-piggledy Tully-Teolan, were built to the common field, where the joint labour of the villagers cultivated alternate ridges and patches of rye, oats, barley, and peas, each of such minute extent, that at a little distance they might resemble a tailor's table of brawns. A few favoured instances, there appeared behind the cottages a miserable wigwam, composed of earth, looses, stones, and turf, where the weald of the night might shelter a starved cow or sorely galled horse. But almost every hut was fenced in front by a huge black stack of turf on one side of the door, while on the other the family drunk their self-fermented ale.

About a bowshot from the end of the village appeared the enclosures, proudly demonstrated the Parks of Tully-Teolan, being certain square fields, surrounded and divided by stone walls five feet in height. In the centre of the exterior barrier was the upper gate of the avenue, opening under an archway, battlemented on the top, and adorned with two large weather-beaten mutilated masses of upright stone, which, in the tradition of the hamlet could be trusted, had once represented, at least had been once desired to represent, two rampant Bears, the supporters of the family of the ancient MacClintocks, and, with moderate length, running between a double row of very ancient horse-chestnuts, planted alternately with yew-trees, which rose to such huge height, and flourished so that their branches overhung the broad road beneath. Beyond these venerable ranks, and running parallel to them, were two high walls, of apparently the like antiquity, overgrown with ivy, honeysuckle, and other climbing plants. The avenue seemed very little trodden, and chiefly by foot-passengers; so that being very broad, and enjoying a constant shade, it was clothed with grass of a deep and rich verdure, excepting where a foot-path, worn by occasional passengers, tracked with a natural sweep the way from the upper to the lower gate. This portal, like the former, opened in front of a court, ornamented with rude sculpture, with battlements on the top, over which were seen, half-hidden by the trees of the avenue, the high steep roofs and narrow gables of the mansion, with lines indented into steps, and corners decorated with small turrets. One of the folding leaves of the lower gate was open, and as the sun shone full into the court behind, a long line of brilliancy was flung upon the upper green space. It was one of those effects which a painter loves to represent, and mimed well with the strutting light which found its way between the boughs of the shady arch that overhung the entrance.

The solitude and repose of the whole scene seemed almost monastic; and Waverley, who had given his horse to lie servant on entering the first gate, walked slowly down the avenue, enjoying the grateful and cooling shade, and so much pleased with the pleasing ideas of rest and seclusion excited by this confined and quiet scene, that he forgot the misery and dirt of the hamlet, and left behind him. The adjoining terrace of the paved courtyard corresponded with the rest of the scene. The house, which seemed to consist of two or three narrow, high, and steep-roofed buildings, projecting from the wall of the opposite side of the enclosure. It had been built at a period when castles were no longer necessary, and when the Scottish architects had not yet acquired the art of designing a domestic residence. The windows were numberless, but very small; the roof had some descript kind of projections, called barrizans, and displayed at each frequent angle a small turret, rather resembling a pepper-box than a Gothic watch-tower. Neither did the front indicate absolute security from danger. There were loopholes for musketry, and iron stanchions on the lower windows, probably to repel any rising band of gipsies, or resist a predatory visit from the Catenans of the neighbouring Highlands. Stables and other offices occupied another side of the square. The former were low vaults, with narrow slits instead of windows, resembling, as Edward's groom observed, "rather a prison for murderers and larcomers, and such like as are trying to sizes, than a place for any Christian cutt." Above these, and between the bars of small windows, were curious edifices called Arthur's Ovens, which would have turned the brains of all the antiquaries in England, had not the worthy proprietor pulled it down for the purpose of building a new stable.

This country, or colless, 5. 5. 6., the owner called it, was no small resource to a Scottish laird of that period, whose scanty rents were creaked out by the contributions levied upon the farms by these light foresters, and the conscriptions exacted from the latter for the benefit of the table.

Another corner of the court displayed a fountain, where a huge bear, carved in stone, predominated over a large stone-husin, into which he disgorged the water. This work of art was the wonder of the country ten miles round. It must not be forgotten, that all sorts of stones, grand and small, proportion, were carved over the windows, upon the ends of the gables, terminated the spouts, and supported the turrets, with the ancient family motto, "Fdixir Ecclesiae," which was the coat of arms of the house. The court was spacious, well paved, and perfectly clean, there being probably another entrance behind the stables for removing the litter. Every thing around appeared solitary, and would have been silent, but for the continued pelting of the fountain; and the whole scene still maintained the monastic illusion which the fancy of Waverley had conjured up. And here we beg permission to close a chapter of still life.
Edward descended the steps in order to meet him, but as the figure approached, and long before he could discern its features, he was struck with the oddity of its appearance and gestures. Sometimes this masterly hand held his hands clasped over his head, like an Indian Juggler, or, to make Known, when he swung them perpendicularly, like a pendulum, on each side; and anon he slipped them swiftly and repeatedly across his breast, like the substitute used by a huckster-vendor for his usual dogging exercise, when his cattle are idle upon the stand, in a clear frosty day. His gait was as singular as his gestures, for at times he hopped with great perseverance on the right foot, and in another manner to advance in the same manner on the left, and then putting his feet close together, he hopped upon both at once. His attire also was antiquated and extravagant. It consisted in a sort of gray jerkin, with scarlet cuffs and slashed sleeves, showing a scarlet lining; the other parts of the dress corresponded in colour, not forgetting a pair of scarlet stockings, and a scarlet bonnet, proudly surmounted with a turkey's feather. Edward, whom he did not seem to observe, now per ceived confirmation in his features of what the min and gestures had already announced. It was appr eently not a figure of the wildest, unsaited, irregular expression to a face which naturally was rather handsome, but something that resembled a compound of both, where the simplicity of the former was mixed with the wildness and crazed imagination. He sung with great earnestness, and not without some taste, a fragment of an old Scotch ditty:

* Follow me, and hast thou play'd me this song?
In summer among the flowers
I will repay thee back again
In summer among the flowers
Unless again, my love,
Unless again, my love.
As you with other maiden rows,
I'll smile on other men."

Here lifting up his eyes, which had hitherto been fixed in the dust, and at the same time in an instant he beheld Waverley, and instantly doff'd his cap, with many grotesque signals of surprise, respect, and salutation. Edward, though with little hope of receiving an answer to any constant question, requested to know whether Mr. Bradwardine were at home, or where he could find any of the domestics. The questioned party replied—and, like the watch of Tu lab, "still ringing in his ear"—the Knight to the mountain, the Lady to Greenwood, her garland to bind, thebower of Bud Ellen, her hawk on the floor, the step of Lord William, his horse and gun.

This conveyed no information, and Edward, re porting his queries, received a rapid answer, in which from the haste and peculiarity of the dialect, the word "butler" was alone intelligible. Waverley then requested to see the butler; upon which the fellow, with a knowing look and nod of intelligence, made a signal to Edward to follow, and began to dance and caper down the alley up which he had made his approach. A strange cude this, thought Edward, and not much unlike one of Shakespeare's roysthown clowns. I am not over prudent to trust to his pil oger; but wiser men have been led by foole,—By this time he reached the bottom of the alley, where, turning short on a little parterre of flowers, shrouded from the cast and north by a close yew hedge, he found an old man at work without his coat, whose appearance lowered between that of an upper servants and gardener; his red nose and ruffled shirt belonging to the former profession; his haste and sun-burnt visage, with his green apron, appearing to indicate his station. To this might the be a gardener, or some domestic belonging to the house.

Edward thereupon called for an answer to any constant question, requested to know whether Mr. Bradwardine were at home, or where he could find any of the domestics. The questioned party replied—and, like the watch of Tuba, "still ringing in his ear"—the Knight to the mountain, the Lady to Greenwood, her garland to bind, the bower of Bud Ellen, her hawk on the floor, the step of Lord William, his horse and gun.

This conveyed no information, and Edward, reporting his queries, received a rapid answer, in which from the haste and peculiarity of the dialect, the word "butler" was alone intelligible. and cellar)—the major domo laid down his spade, slipped on his cost in haste, and with a wrathful look at Edward’s guide, probably excited by his having taken the liberty to trim himself. But that of name was Waverley, and whether the old man’s countenance assumed a great deal of respectful importance. “He could take it upon his conscience to say, his honour would have exceeding pleased him, and that Squire Waverley, who had some refreshment after his journey? His honour was with the folk who were getting down the dark lag; the two gardener lads (an emphasis on the word) had just been having a talk. He had just been amusing himself in the mean time with dressing Miss Rose’s flower-bed, that he might be near to receive his honour’s orders, if need were: he was worthy of the garden, but had little time for such diversions."

"He canna get it wroucht in abune twa days in the week at no rate whatso," said Edward’s fanfare’s continued. A glance from the butler chastised his interference, and he commanded him, by the name of Davie Gellatley, in a tone which admitted no discussion, to look for his honour at the dark lag, and tell there was a gentleman from the south had arrived at the Ha’."

"Can this poor fellow deliver a letter?" asked Edward.

"With all fidelity, sir, to any one whom he respects. I would hardly trust him with a longer message by word of mouth—though he is more knave than fool." Waverley delivered his credentials to Mr. Gellatley, who seemed to consider the butler a little too fastidious. By twisting his features at him, when he was looking another way, into the resemblance of the protase face on the bole of a German tobacco-pipe; after which, going off to Waverley, he danced off to discharge his errand.

"He is an innocent, sir," said the butler; "there is one such almost everywhere in the country, but yours is more rare than far. He used to work a day’s turn well enough; but he helped Miss Rose when she was tumbled with the Laird of Killancurt’s new English bull, and since that time we ca’ him Davie Do-nothing, for since he got that gay clothing, to please his honour and his young mistress, (great folks will have their fancies), he has done nothing but dance up and down about the house. Davie Do-nothing has a skill, unless trimming the laird’s fishing-wand, or busking his knife, or may be catching a dish of trouts at an o’er-time. But here comes Miss Rose, who, I take burns, will be entitled glad to own one of the house of Waverley at her father’s mansion of Tully-Veolan.” Waverley delivered. And the Waverley of his brother, and his Waverley of the Waverley of his profession. The first among the next, Edward learned from her that the dark lag, which had somewhat puzzled him in the butler’s account of his master’s avocations, had nothing to do with either a black cat or a broom, but with a portion of land. Caldor was to be felled that day. She offered, with diffident civility, to show the stranger the way to the spot, which, it seemed, was not far distant; but they were prevented by the appearance of the Baroness of Bradwardine in person, who, summoned by David Gellatley, now appeared, “On hospitable thoughts, intent, clearing the ground at a prodigious rate with swift and long strides, which reminded Waverley of the seven-leaved boots of the nursery fable.” He was tall, thin, athletic figure, old indeed and gray-haired, but with every muscle rendered as tough as whipcord by constant employment. He was rather more like a Frenchman than an Englishman of the period, while, from his hard figure and peculiar rigidity of stature, he bore some resemblance to a Swiss which he took time at Paris, and caught the costume, but not the ease or manner, of its inhabitants. The truth was, that his language and habits were as heterogeneous as his external appearance.

Owing to his natural disposition to study, or perhaps to a very general Scottish fashion of giving young men of rank a legal education, he had been bred with the lawyer, and had lived almost entirely with those of his own principles in the village. The pedantry of the lawyer, supervised upon the military pride of the soldier, might have been a great hindrance to the establishment of keeping fools has been discussed in England. Swift writes an epitaph on the "Holy Fools" of the Suffolk.

In Scotland the custom substituted at the latest century: at Glamis Castle, is preserved the draw of one of the jestes, very hard to comprehend with many who think it is not above thirty years since such a character stood by the sideboard of a nobleman. Miss Bradwardine was but seventeen; yet, at the last races of the county town of —, upon her appearance in the grand stand, with her pink and her gold, and her blue, and her gossamer gown, a murmur of the custom has been described in England. Swift writes an epitaph on the "Holy Fools" of the Suffolk.

The peculiar meaning of all these cabalalistical words, few or none can explain; but they imply, that the very shock of the Bardwad's sermurth, in case of delinquency, imprisonment, try, and ex-

First, however, the present possessor of this authority was not disposed to be timorous but active in exercit-ing it; and excepting that he imprisoned two poachers in the dungeon of the old tower of Tully-Veolan, where they were sorely frightened by ghos, s and ahowed to make the best of their way to an old well man in the voyes (or Scottish pillory) for saying
"there were mair fules in the laird's house than Davie Galliestie", I do not learn that he was accused of abusing his high powers. Still, however, the conscious pride of possessing such a title gave additional importance to his language and deportment.

At his first address to Waverley, it would seem that the hearty pleasure he felt to behold the nephew of his friend had somewhat composing the stiff and upright "dignity of the Baron of Bardwad's demeanour, for the tears stood in the old gentleman's eyes, when, having first shaken Edward heartily by the hand, he endeavoured to grace its features with an a-la-mode Francois, and kissed him on both sides of his face; while the hardness of his grip, and the quantity of Scotch snuff which his acquisitive complexion seemed to require, was equal to the corresponding drops of moisture to the eyes of his guest.

"Upon the honour of a gentleman," he said, "but it makes me young again to see you here. Mr. Waverley," continued his faultless, "Mr. Waverley of Honour—eyes alta, as Maro hath it—and you have the look of the old line, Captain Waverley; not so portly yet as my old friend Sir Everard—mais c'est riehart, as my acquaintance with Madame Baron Kikkibrook, said of the sagesse of Madame von eposse. And so ye have mounted the cockade?
Right, right; though I could have wished the colour did not hang a bit with you, Sir Everard. But no more of that; I am old, and times are changed. And how does the worthy knight baronet, and the fair Mrs. Rachel?—Ah, ye laugh, young man!

In truth she was the fair Mrs. Rachel in the year of grace seventeen hundred and sixteen; but time passes et singula praebentur anni—that is most certain.
But once again ye are most heartily welcome to my private, no, no, no, no; there is a house there, and see that Alexander Sanderson looks out the old Chateau Margoux, which I sent from Bourdeaux to Dundee in the year 1719."

The gentleman was sufficiently told her the first corner, and then ran with the speed of a fairy, that she might gain leisure, after discharging her father's commission, to put her own dress in order, and produce all her little finery, an occupation for which the approaching dinner was sufficient preparation.

"We cannot rival the luxuries of your English table, Captain Waverley, or give you the epulae laudiones of Waverley-Honour—I say epulae rather than prandiius, because the latter expression is popular; Epulae senatum, grandium ad populum altius, says Suetonius Tranquillus. But I trust ye will applaud my Bourdeaux; c'est des deux orielles, as Captain Waverley, y a finum et prænum, y a, the Princepal of St. Andrews denominated it. And, once more, Waverley-Honour, right glad am I that ye are here to drink the beer mixture if ye can.

This speech, with the necessary interjectional answers, continued from the lower alley where they met, up to the door of the house, where four or five servants in old-fashioned liverys, headed by Alexander Sanderson, and attended to the right and left of table, cleared the sable stains of the garden, received them in grand costume,
in an old hall hewn round with pikes and with bows, with other chair and corsets that had borne many shrews bow.

With much ceremony, and still more real kindness, the Baron, without stopping in any intermediate apartment, conducted his guest through several into the great dining parlour, wainscotted with black oak, and hung round with the pictures of his ancestry, where a table was set forth in form for six persons, and an old-fashioned beautea displayed all the ancient and massive plate of the Bardwad family. A bell was now rung, and a page, dressed as a man, who acted as porter upon gala days, had caught the alarm given by Waverley's arrival, and, repairing to his post, announced the arrival of other guests.

These were a distinguished nobleman, a very estimable persons. "There was the young Lord of Balmawhapple, a Falconer by surname, of the house of Glenfarquhar, given right much to field-sports—good young sportsman, but an old young gentleman. Then there was the Laird of Kilnancuret, who had devoted his leisure until tillage and agriculture, and boasted himself to be possessed of a full weightless morn, brought from the county of Devon (the Dannahone of the Romans), if we can trust Robert of Cirencester. He is, as you may well suppose from such a tendency, but of yoroun extration—seabrit of fenres festa duc—, and I believe between ourselves, his grandaunt was from the wrong side of the Border—one Bulleseg, who came hither as a steward, or bailiff, or ground-officer, or something in that department, to the last Ginnro of Kilnancuret, who had married a lady who was possessed in her young age of a beauty which devolved on this unhappy woman by a settlement of her wumkhus husband, in direct convartion of an unrecorded tale, and to the prejudice of the disposer's own child, who was not a his natural heir and seventh cousin, Ginnro of Tep perchowit, whose family was so reduced by the ensuing law-suit, that his representative is now serving as a private in the regiment of the St. John's Watch. But this gentleman, Mr. Bulleseg of Killancuret that now is, has good blood in his veins by the mother and grandmother, who were both of the facial family of Plunket, who would have been well liked and looks upon, and knows his own place. And God forbid, Captain Waverley, that we of irreproachable lineage should exult over him, when it may be, that in the right, ninth, or tenth generation, his progeny may rank, in a manner, with the old gentry of the country. Rank and ancestry, sir, should be the last words in the mouths of us of unblemished race—six ee noronroce, as Naos sith. There is, besides, a clergyman of the true (though suffering) Episcopal church of Scotland. He was a confessor in her cause in the year 1715, when a Whighish mob destroyed his meeting-house, tore down his dwelling-house of four silver spoons, intimating also with his meat and his meal-ark, and, with two barrels, one of single, and one of double ale, besides three bottles of brandy. My Baron-Bullie and doer.

Mr. Duncan Macwhirthe, is the tenth on our list. Then is a question, owing to the incertitude of ancient or thography, whether he belongs to the clan of Wheel-die or of Quibble, but both have produced persons eminently in the law.

As such he described them by person and name.
They enter'd, and dinner was served as they came.

THE BANQUET.

The entertainment was ample, and handsom, according to the Scotch ideas of the period, and the guests did great honour to it. The Baron eat like a the spirit of the Presbyterian had been unusually animsted against their opponents, the Episcopal clergyman, who were chiefly non-jurors, were exposed to be maltreated, as we should now say, or, to use the phrase then in use, they were exposed, or, if you will, they were exposed, as political heroes.

But notwithstanding that the Presbyterians and the Presbytarian party under the leadership of Charles II., did, in a way, excipate them, there was little mischief done beyond the kind of petty violence mentioned in the text.

WAVERLEY.

wince like all four together; though, either out of more respect, or in order to preserve that proper declination of person which showed a sense that he was in the presence of his patron, he sat upon the edge of his chair, placed at three feet distance from the President's seat. He made the attempt to imitate by projecting his person towards it in a line which obliged from the bottom of his spine, so that the person sat opposite to him could only see the top of the bald plate.

This stooping position might have been inconvenient to another person; but long habit made it, whether seated or walking, perfectly easy to the wearer, for whom his posture had been occasional practice. There was no doubt, an unmeaning projection of the person towards those who happened to walk behind; but those being at all times his inferiors, (for Mr. Macwheele was very near the average height of all others,) he cared very little what inference of contempt or slight regard they might derive from the circumstance. Hence, when he walked across the court to and fro, with a step that resembled a turnspit walking upon its hind legs.

The non-juring clergyman was a pensive and interesting old man, with much of the air of a sufferer for conscience sake. He was one of those Who, unprovided, their benefice forsake.

For this whim, when the Baron was out of hearing, the Basle friends sent a secret agent to Mr. Rubenstein, upbraiding him with the civility of his services. Indeed, it must be owned, that he himself, though at heart a keen partisan of the exiled family, had kept pretty fair with all the dignitaries of state in his time; so that the Gellaclyce, once described him as a particularly good man, who had a very quiet and peaceful conscience, that never did him any harm.

When the dinner was removed, the Baron announced the arrival of the Prince of the King, politely referring to the condescensions of his guests to drink to the sovereign de facto or de jure, as their politics inclined. The conversation now became general; and, shortly after, was joined by the Baron, who had done the honours with natural grace and simplicity, retired, and was soon followed by the clergyman. Among the rest of the party, the wine, which fully justified the eulogies of time and place, the landlord, the chef from round, although Waverley, with some difficulty, obtained the privilege of sometimes neglecting the glass. At length, as the evening grew more late, the Baron made a private sign to his friend, and left the room. Alexander, who had been consecutively named him, Alexander ab Alexandro, who left the room with a nod, and soon after returned, his grave countenance mantling with a solemn and melancholy flush, and placed before him an oaken casket, mounted with brass ornaments of curious form. The Baron, drawing out a private key, unlocked the casket, raised the lid, and produced a golden goblet, in one hand, a medal in the other, and moulded into the shape of a rampant bear, which the owner regarded with a look of mingled reverence, pride, and delight, that irresistibly reminded Waverley of Benvenuto's statue, he knew a Bull, Horse, and Dog, as that was wittily denominated his chief craving cups. But Mr. Bradwardine, turning towards him with complacency, requested him to observe this occasion, and offered to cast a glance at the casket.

"It represents," he said, "the chosen crest of our family, a bear, as ye observe, and rampant; because a good herald will depict every animal in its noblest posture; as a horse salient, a greyhound curant, and, if he may be inferred, a ram, occurring in actus ferciori, or in a voracious, lacerating, and devouring posture. Now, sir, we hold this most honourable achievement. That of St. Brathernon, that of the High Command, of Frederic Redclyft, that of Geoffrey de Gernand, to my predecessor, Godmund Bradwardine, it being the crest of a gigantic Dane, whom he slew in the lists in the Holy Land, on a quarrel touching the chastity of the Queen of Sheba. But, coming to the present coat, it is not precisely which, and thus, as Virgilius hath it-

Appulmus.

Then for the cup, Captain Waverley it was wroth by the command of St. Duthane, Abbot of Aberfoed, for behoof of another Baron of the house of Bradwardine, who had valiantly defended the patrimony of that monastery against certain encroaching nobles. It is properly termed the Blessed Bear of Bradwardine, and very ancient (it is curious to call it Ursus Major,) and was supposed, in old and Catholic times, to be invested with certain properties of a mystical and supernatural quality. And though I give no reason to believe all the anima. This is hereby estemated a solemn standard cup and heirloom of our house; nor is it ever used but upon seasons of high festival, and such I hold to be the arrival of the Prince of the King, or occasional occasion to this draught to the health and prosperity of the ancient and highly-to-be-honoured house of Waverley.

During this long harangue, he carefully decanted a column of claret into a goblet of fine old ale, and handed a nearly an English pint; and, at the conclusion, delivering the bottle to the butler, to be held carefully in the same angle with the horizon, he devoutly quaffed off the contents of the Blessed Bear of Bradwardine.

Edward, with horror and alarm, beheld the animal making his rounds, and thought with great anxiety upon the baseness of this motto, "Beware the man at the same time, plainly foresaw, that, as none of the guests scrupled to do him this extraordinary honour, a refusal on his part to pledge their courtesy would be received only by ill-received. Resolving, therefore, to submit to this insinuation of the last piece of beer, he got up to quit the table, if possible, and confiding in the strength of his constitution, he did justice to the company in the contents of the Blessed Bear, and felt less inconveniencing from the draught than he could possibly have expected. The others, whose time had been more actively employed, began to show symptoms of innovation, the good wine did its office.

The frolic spirit of the moment, and pride of birth, began to give way before the benial blessings of this benign constellation, and the formal apppellations with which the three dignitaries had hitherto addressed each other, were forgotten in the general animosity, as Tully-Vocon, by partaking, with their entertainer and his guest Captain Waverley, what they technically called deoquod doctus, a stirrup-cup, to the honour of the Baron's root-tree.

Steever's Mace.

I may here mention that the fashion of composition described in the text, was still occasionally practiced in Scotland, in the author's youth. A company would often, after their host, often went to finish the evening at the clachan or village, in a country house. The next morning, after having the previous night, was usually a cool summer evening, attended the party. But when they arrived at Luckie Macleay's, the Lairds of Balnawhangle and Killancreit declared their determination to take a view of the country, and the young gentleman of Tully-Vocon, by partaking, with their entertainer and his guest Captain Waverley, what they technically called deoquod doctus, a stirrup-cup, to the honour of the Baron's root-tree. 1
It must be noticed, that the Bailie, knowing by experience that the day's joviality, which had been hitherto sustained at the expense of his patron, might terminate in a more serious disorder, had provided for a guard of armed men, composed of vin'd gray pony, and, between gaiety of heart, and alarm for being looked into a Rebecca, spurred him into a hobbling causer (a trot was out of the question) and with the clairvoyance against the leges civiles, or regulations of genial composition. The widow, Macleary, seemed to have expected this visit, as well she might, for it was the usual custom of many ladies at Tully-Veolan, as at most other gentlemen's houses in Scotland, Sixty Years since. The guests thereby at once acquired themselves of their burden of gratitude for their entertainers' kindness, encouraged the taste of the change, house, did honour to the place which afforded harbour to their horses, and indemnified themselves for the previous restraints imposed by private hospitality, by agreeing, what Bailie calls the sweet of the night, in the genial license of a tavern.

Accordingly, in full expectation of these distinguished guests, Luckie Macleary had swept her house for the spring, the fortune, to make the turf-fire to such a heat as the season required in her damp, hoveling at Midsummer, set forth her deal table newly washed, propped its lame foot with a fragment of greenstem, and clapped upon the rumps the best ones of her clay floor; and having moreover, put on her clean toy, rokenly, and scarlet plaid, cruelly awaited the arrival of the company, in the hope of custom and profit. When they were seated under the sooty rafters of Luckie Macleary's only apartment, thickly tapastered with cobwebs, their hostess, who had already more than once observed to Bailie, the Bailie of Braddawine, sung French chansons à boire, and spouted pieces of Latin; Killuncan-it talked, in a steady unalterable dull key, of top-dressing and boundless acres, men, arms, old men, friends, and a greyhound called Whistler. And when at length the instinct of polite discipline so far prevailed, that for a moment he obtained it, he has the form of calling out, "Be silent, sir! ye not only show your ignorance but disgrace your native country before a stranger and an Englishman," and Waverley, at the same moment, entreating Mr. Buchan to permit him only to an address which seemed levelled at him personally. But the Baron was exalted by wine, wrath, and scorn, above all subtile considerations.

"I crave you to be hushed, Captain Waverley; you are otherwise, paraventure, sui juris,—su juris-familierated, that is, and entitled, it may be, to think and reason for yourself; but in my domain, in this poor house of Balmawhapple, and under this roof, which is quasi mine, being hold by tacit relocation by a tenant at will, I am in loco parentis to you, and bound to see you well-guided. —And for you, Mr. Falconer, if you please: I warn ye, let me see no more alterations from the paths of good manners.

"And I tell you, Mr. Cosmo Conway, Balmawhapple, of Bawdwinette and Tully-Volcan, retorned the sportsman, in huge disdain, "the cook of the man that refuseth my roast, whether it be a crop-cared English Whig or a black ribband at his lug, or one who deserts his ain friends to claw favour with a Stuart Projector."

In an instant both rapiers were brandished, and some desperate passes exchanged. Balmawhapple was young, stout, and active; but the Baron, infirm of his age, met his antagonist Tolboy Ecblech, had tickled his opponent other gates than he did, had he not been under the influence of Uras Major.

Edward rushed forward to interfere between the combatants, but the prostrate bulk of the Laird of Killanureit, over which he stumbled, intercepted his passage. How Killanureit happened to be in this position, none of us knew the other; but it was very nearly accurately known. Some thought he was about to recross himself under the table; he himself alleged that he stumbled in the act of lifting a joint-stick. "What the devil does he know of Balmawhapple?" he thought. "A beggarman from Bawdwinette," he marked on his wit, "is to be named Balmawhapple."

Then that it may, if reader aid than either his of Waverley's, had not interposed, there would certainly have been bloodshed. But the well-known clash of swords, which was no stranger to her dwelling, aroused Luckie Maclead, as she supinely beyond the hallan, or earthen partition of the cottage, with eyes employed on Boston's Crook of the Loo, while her ideas were centered in summing up the reeking. She boldly rushed into the fracas, & postulation, "What their honours say ane another there, and bring discredit on an honest widow-woman's house, when there's a the lee-land in the company?"等。This was seconded by finding her laden with great dexterity over the weapons of the combatants. The servants by this time rushed in, and being, by great chance, together, separated the combatants with the assistance of Edward and Killanureit. The latter led off Balmawhapple, cursing, swearing, and vowing revenge against every Whig, Presbyterian, and fanatic in England and Scotland, from John-o'-Groats to the Land's End, and with difficulty got him to horse. Our hero, with the assistance of Sanderson, escorted the Baron of Bawdwinette to his own dwelling, but could not prevail upon him to retire to bed until he had made a long and learned apology for the events of the evening, of which, however, there was not a word intelligible, except something about the Centaurs and the Lapidus.

CHAPTER XII.

REPTANCE AND A RECONCILIATION.

Waverley was unaccustomed to the use of wines, excepting with great temperance. He slept therefore soundly and long, but there was a sort of sickened awakening to a painful recollection of the scene of the preceding evening. He had received a personal affront,—he a gentleman, a soldier, and a Waverley. This occurred near the Linolean, and not at the table, as was given, possessed of the moderate share of some which nature had allotted him; true also, in respecting concessions; for he and all his family were also of your peculiar merit, could have existed been, turn out of mind, _Marotia pectora_, as Buchanan saith, a bold and warlike sort, or people."

Edward, on the contrary, seemed embarrassed and dejected; and Waverley now, for the first time, observed that his arm was in a sling, which seemed to account for the awkward and embarrassed manner with which he had presented his hand. To a question from Miss Bradwardine, he muttered, in answer, something about his horse having fallen; and, seeming desirous to escape both from the subject and the company, he arose as soon as dinner was over, made his leave to the party, and, declaring the Baron's invitation to tarry till after dinner, mounted his horse and returned to his own home.

Tully-Voilet early enough after dinner to gain the stage at which he meant to sleep; but the unaffected and deep mortification with which the good-natured and affectionate old gentleman heard the proposal, quite deprived him of courage to persist in it. No sooner had he gained Waverley's consent to lengthen his visit for a few days than, he laboured to remove the subject; and the Baron had manifestly adopted a more early retreat. "I would not have you, Captain Waverley, that I am by practice or precept an advocate of charity, though it may be that, in the exercise of my profession, you will not perchance altogether _ebri_, or drunken, were, to say the least, _ebrii_, by which the ancient designers those who were fattened, or, as your English vernacular and metaphorical phrase goes, half-sea-over, not that I would so insinuate respecting you, Cap-

There was no refusing assent to a proposition so decidedly laid down by him, who undoubtedly was the best judge; although, had Edward formed his opinion from his own recollections, he would have pronounced that the Baron was not only _ebria_, but _ebrium_, to become _ebrius_; or, in plain English, was incomparably the most drunk of the party, except perhaps the Laird of Tantallon, who was incapable of so constant and steady exertion. He had just so much solidity as kept on the windy side of insanity; so much wild wit as saved him from the imputation of idiocy; some dexterity in field-sports, in which we have known as great fools excel), great kindness and humanity in the treatment of animals intrusted to him, warm affections, a prodigious memory, and an ear for music.

The stage was long since murdered; and Davie's voice singing to the two large deer greyhounds, He saucy, his saucy; ronial couteau de chasse. After this ceremony, he conducted his guest horseward by a pleasant and circumcise manner, commanding an extensive prospect of different villages and houses, to each of which Mr.

Bradwardine attached some anecdoty of history or genealogy, told in language whimsical from prudence and pedantry, but often respectable for the good sense and honourable feelings which his narrative displayed, and almost always curious, if not valuable, for the information they contained.

The truth is, the ride seemed agreeable to both braves a gentlemanly and amuse:ment in each other's conversation, although their characters and habits of thinking were in many respects totally opposite. Edward, we have informed the reader, was warm in the feuds which had thus far formed in his ideas and in his taste of reading, with a strong disposition towards poetry. Mr. Bradwardine was the reverse of all this, and piqued himself upon stalking through life with the same upright, starched, stoical gravity, which distinguished his evening promenade upon the terrace of Tully-Yeoman, where for hours together—the very model of old Hardyknute.

Edward, he got no pleasure

And stately stopp'd he west.

As for literature, he read the classic poets, he sure, and the Ephesianus of Georgius Buchanan and the Lusiad of Camoens; and the Dei Amator the Delibration Poetarum Scotorum, and Sir David Lind-say's Works, and Barbour's Bruce, and Blind Harry's Wallace, and the Gentle Shepherd, and the Cherry and the Shrub; in which he was only equalled by his reformation to the Muse, he would, if the truth must be spoken, have been much better pleased had the pious or sapient apothegms, as well as the historical narratives, which the various works contained, been presented to him in the form of simple prose. And he sometimes could not refrain from expressing contempt of the "vain and unprofitable art of poem-making, in which, only he and his bosom friend had embarked in his time was Allan Ramsay, the priavigewriter."

But although Edward and he differed toto caelo, as the Baron would have said, upon this subject, yet they met upon history as on a neutral ground, in which each claimed an interest. The Baron, indeed, only cumbered his memory with matters of fact; the cold, dry, hard outlines which history delineates.
Edward, on the contrary, loved to travel up and round the sketch with the colouring of a warm and vivid imagination, which gives light and life to the actors and speakers in the drama of past ages. Yet with both it was the same; and to their mutual advantage, other's amusement. Mr. Bradwardine's minute narratives and powerful memory supplied to Waverley fresh subjects of the kind upon which his fancy loved to dwell, and which he could most easily and and of character. And he repaid the pleasure thus communicated, by an earnest attention, valuable to all story-tellers, more especially to the Baron, who felt his habits of self-respect flattened by it; and sometimes also by reciprocal communications, which interested Mr. Bradwardine, as confirming or illu-trating his own favourite anecdotes. Besides, Mr.
Bradwardine loved to talk of the scenes of his youth which had been spent in camps and foreign lands, and had many interesting particulars to tell of the generals under whom he had served, and the actions he had witnessed.

Both parties returned to Tully-Yeoman in great good-humour with each other; Waverley disposed of studying more attentively what he considered as a singular and interesting character, gifted with a memory containing a curious register of ancient and modern anecdotes; and Bradwardine disposed to regard Edward as plus (or rather jucius) bono et magnis invidiosus, a sort of two-edged animal, which he dreaded and feared. They formed, in fact, a or so, as to half an hour's search, they found David Gellatley leading two very tall deer greyhounds, and presiding over half a dozen and about as many bare-legged and bare-headed boys, ywho, to procure the chosen distinction of attending on the chase, had not failed to tickle his ears with the dulcet appellation of Maister Gellatley, though probably all and each had hooted him on former occasions in the character of daft basc. But this is no uncommon strain of flattery to persons in office, or altogether confined to the bare-legged villagers of Tully-Yeolan; it was in fashion Sixty Years since, now, and will be six hundred years hence. If this admirable compound of folly and knavery, called the world, shall be then in existence.

These gille-wet-foots, they were called, were delighted with bare faces, bare feet, bare buttocks, and bare arms, and seem to have been so conscious that, after half an hour's search, a roe was started, coursed, and killed; the Baron following on his white horse, like Earl Percy of yore, riding bareback, fleeing like a foul slain animal (which, he observed, was called by the life. There was no other guest except Mr. Rubrick, whose information and discourse, as a clergyman and man of letters, was very well with that of the Baron and his guest.

Shortly after dinner, the Baron, as if to show that his temperance was not entirely theoretical, proposed a toast, to which they all drank. The Baron then proposed another, to the health of Mr. Rubrick, and having drunk their healths, they were all dismissed to their various diversions at the time of the evening.

Captain Waverley was accordingly conducted through one or two of those long awkward passages with which ancient architects are tried to puzzle the inventors of the houses which they plant, at the end of which Mr. Bradwardine began to ascend, by two steps at once, a very steep, narrow, and winding stair, leaving Mr. Rubrick and Waverley to follow, while the Baron should announce their approach to his daughter.

After having climbed this perilous corkscrew until their brains were almost addled, they arrived in a small room, which served as an ante-chamber to Rose's sanctum sanctorum, and through which they entered her parlour. It was a small, but pleasant apartment, opening to the south, and hung with tapestry, and adorned with two pictures, one of her father in the dress of a shepherd, with a bell-choop; the other of the Baron, in his tenth year, in a blue coat, embroidered waistcoat, blue hat, and warm stockings, and with his hair curled. The Baron looked smiling at the costume, and at the odd ressemblance between the round, smooth, red-checked, starling visage in the portrait, and the quaint, bearded, lion's head features of the real Waverley. The Baron was the first to mount the breach of a fort in Savoy during the memorable campaign of 1709, and having there defended himself with his half-pike for nearly ten minutes before any support reached him. To do the Baron justice, although sufficiently prone to dwell upon, and even to exaggerate his family dignity and consequence, he was far more a man of real courage than much of his own character.

Miss Rose now appeared from the interior room of her apartment, with her countenance beaming with delight and her friends. The labour in which she had been employed obviously showed a natural taste, which required only cultivation. Her father had taught her French and Italian, and a few of the ordinary authors in those languages ornamented her shelves. He had endeavoured also to be her 'preceptor in music;' but as he began with the more abstruse doctrines of the science, and was not perhaps master of them himself, she had made no proficiency farther than to be able to accompany her voice with the harpsichord; but even this was not very common in Scotland at that period.

To make amends, she seemed with a grace and felicity of manner, with a respect to the sense of what she uttered that might be proposed in example to ladies of much superior musical talent. Her natural good sense taught her, that if, as we are assured by high authorities, music is inspired by immortal verse, they are very often divested by the performer in a most shameful manner. It was perhaps owing to this sensibility to poetry and power of connexion with great knowledge of the musical notes, that her singing gave more pleasure to all the unlearned in music and even to many of the learned, than could have been communicated by a more refined and more instructed, but, unguided by the same delicacy of feeling.

A banquet, or a nooning gallery, before the windows of her parlour, served to illustrate another of Rose's pursuits; for it was conversed with flowers of different kinds, which she had taken under her special protection. A projecting turret gave access to this gallery, which was closed by a beautiful prospect. The formal garden, with its high bounding walls, lay below, contracted, as it seemed, to a mere parterre; while the view extended beyond it, and the sun shone upon a large river which was sometimes visible, sometimes hidden in copse. The eye might be delayed by a desire to rest on the rocks, which here and there rose from the dell with massive forms, and might dwell on the noble, though ruined tower, which was here beheld in all its dignity, shining from a promontory over the river. To the left were seen two or three cottages, a part of which was still concealed by the others. The glen, or dell, was terminated by a sheet of water, called Loch Vedo, into which the brook discharged itself, and which now glistened in the sun a sea of stars, though but a small part of the carpet was open and varied in surface, though not wodded; and there was nothing to interrupt the view until the scene was bounded by a ridge of distant and blue hills, which formed the southern boundary of the strath or valley.

To this pleasant station Miss Bradwardine had ordered coffee.

The view of the old tower, or fortalice, introduced Rose to some family legends and traditions of chivalry, which the Baron told with great enthusiasm. The projecting peak of an impending crouch which Rose near it, had acquired the name of St. Swithin's Chair, and the name remained upon it. It was one of a peculiar superstition, of which Mr. Rubrick mentioned some particulars, which reminded Waverley of a rhyme quoted by Edgar in King Lear; and Rose was called upon to sing a little legend, in which they had been intended by some village poet.

Who, notes as the race from which she sprung, saved others' names, but left his own unseen.

The sweetness of her voice, and the simple beauty of her music, caved all the audience, with whom the minstrel could have desired, and which his poetry so much wanted. I almost doubt if it can be read with patience, disstinate of these advantages; although I conjecture the following copy to have been somewhat corrected by Waverley, to suit the taste of those who might not relish pure antiquity.

ST. SWITHIN S CHAIR.

On Hallow-Mass Eve... come ye to rest, Ever true that your hair o'er your breast Sits it with crease, and saw it with head
Over the axe, and say the Ave.

For on Hallow-Mass Eve the Night-Hag will ride,
And all her ninefold sweeping on her side,
When her feet are softly stepping slowly as the cloud.
Sitting through moonlight or sun-in-cloud.

The lady sat in St. Swithin's Chair,
The door was open and the wind came in her hair.
Her cheeks were pale—but resolved and high,
Was the word of her lip and the glance of her eye.

She muttered the spell of St. Swithin bold,
When his naked foot trod the midnight wold,
When he stopped the Hag as she rode the night
And baned her descent, and her promise plighted.

He that dare sit on St. Swithin's Chair,
When the Night-Hag wings the troubled air,
Questions three, when he speaks the spell,
He may ask, and she must tell.

The Baron has been with King Robert his liege,
Those three long years in battle and rage;
In the walls of Moray's castle he lay,
And lain the lady his fate would know.

She shudders and steps as the charm she speaks—
Has she the touch of the night-shadows in her arms?
He it is that sound, betwixt laughter and scream,
The voice of the Demon who haunts the stream.

The moon of the wind sunk silent and low,
And the roaring torrent his cooped to blow;
The captive means to make this mystic charm,
When the cold gray mist brought the ghastly Form.

"I am sorry to disappoint the company, especially Captain Waverley, who listens with such invaluable gravity; it is but a fragment, although I think there are other verses, describing the return of the Baron from the wars, and how the lady was found 'clayton' upon the gnomes' ledge."

"It is one of those fragments," observed Mr. Bradwardine, "with which the early history of disaster..."
Waverley.

The young man's wrath is like light straw on fire;
Heard ye to merry the little bird sing?
But like the mullein it is the old maid's fire,
And the throstle-cuckoo's head is under his wing.

But the old man will draw at the Dawning the sword,
And there the throstle-cuckoo's head will under his wing.

Waverley could not avoid observing that Davie said something like a satirical emphasis on these lines. He therefore approached, and endeavoured, by audibly querying, to elicit from him what the immature might mean; but Davie had nothing to explain, and had wit enough to make his folly cloak his knavery. Edward could collect nothing from him, excepting that the Laird of Balmaunwhapple had gone home yesterday morning, with his host's foot in his bluid. In the garden, however, he met the old butler, who no longer attempted to conceal, that, having been bred in the nursery line with Sumner & Co. of Newcastle, he sometimes wrought a turn in the hawser-borders to oblige the Laird and Miss Rose. By a series of queries, Edward at length discovered, with a painful feeling of surprise and shame, that Balmaunwhapple's submission and apology had been through a succession of a rencontre with the Baron before his guest had quitted his pillow, in which the younger combatant had been disarmed and wounded in the sword arm.

Greatly mortified at this information, Edward sought out his friendly host, and anxiously expostulated with him upon the injustice he had done him and his family. The Baron justified him with a bitter smile; and added that he dared not, in the circumstances which, considering his youth and the profession of arms which he had just adopted, was capable of being represented much to his prejudice. The Baron took him to a chamber, and while the audience lasted, Edward listened with astonished ears, and the clerk recorded with a trembling hand, she, all of a sudden, changed the low mumbling tone with which she spoke into a sly whisper. "If you do not know what it is, look to yourselves! I see the Evil One sitting in the midst of ye. The surprise was general, and terror and flat its immediate consequences. Happy were those who were next the door; and many were the disasters that befell hats, bands, cuffs, and wigs, before they could get out of the church, where they left the obstinate prelate to settle matters with the witch and her admirer, at his own peril or pleasure."

"Rim solvuntur tabulae," said the Baron; "when they recovered their panic trepidation, they were too much ashamed to bring any weakening of the process against you." This anecdote led into a long discussion of All those idle thoughts and fantasies. Devices, dreams, opinions unconsidered, and images of the successive ages. And all that seemed as, lessings, tales, and lies.

With such conversation, and the romantic legends which it introduced, closed our hero's second evening in the house of Tully-Veolan.

CHAPTER XIV.

A DISCOVERY—Waverley Becomes Domesticated at Tully-Veolan.

The next day Edward arose betimes, and in a morning walk around the house, discovered a small court in the front of the dog kennel, where his friend Davie was employed about his four-footed charge. One quick glance of his eye recognised Waverley, when, instantly turning his back, as if he had not observed him, he began to sing part of an old ballad:

Young men will love these more fair and more fast;
But old men will love these most fast.

And the young men's love will last;
Till Davie's head is under his wing.

The story last told was said to have happened in the south of Scotland; but—cæstum armis—&c.—and the gown has its date. Davie was the young man, and Davie was the quaint hero. Davie was strong enough to resist the panics which tortured his brethren, who were the means of rescuing a poor insane creature from the cruel fate which was prepared for it. Davie had overcome the trials for witchcraft form one of the most deplorable chapters in Scottish story.

8 Although canting heraldry is generally reprehended, it seems nevertheless to have been adopted in the case of Waverley. The design of the coat of arms of Waverley, which is described in the text, is illustrated by a representation of a silver tissue, in the arms of the Barons of Waverley, now bearing the name of barons or viscounts. nothing more, than that it was settled in a fitting manner. Having been so minute with respect to the diversions of Tully-Veolan, on the first days of Edward's arrival, for the purpose of introducing its inmates to the reader's acquaintance, it becomes less necessary to enter into the history of the attracting features of the surrounding scenery. It is probable that a young man, accustomed to more cheerful society, would have tired of the conversation of so violent an asserter of the "beauty of nature," as Edward found it, but an agreeable variety in that of Miss Bradwardine, who listened with eagerness to his remarks upon literature, and showed great justness of taste in her answers. The sweetness of her disposition had made her objectionless to all the little attentions which those little observances most gratifying to those who would never think of exciting them, her beauty, in which he recalled the features of his beloved wife, her force of mind, and the noble generosity of her disposition, would have justified the attachment of the most dutiful father.

His anxiety on her behalf did not, however, seem to extend to the state of her mind, which, from a king to the general opinion, it is most efficiently displayed; in laborious, namely, to establish her in life, either by a large dowry or a wealthy marriage. By an old settle ment, the bridegroom had landed the baron without charge, after his death, to a distant relation; and it was supposed that Miss Bradwardine would remain but slenderly provided for, as the good gentleman's cash matters were in great disarray. But the Barrow, being aware that the cost of her education was a great obstacle, provided for him, as was promised, at the time of his marriage. It is true, the said Barrow loved his patron and his patron's daughter next (though at an incomparable distance) to himself. He thought it was possible to set aside the settlement on the male line, and had actually procured an opinion to that effect (and, as he boasted, without a fee) from an eminent Scottish counsel, under whose notice he contrived to bring the point while consulting him regularly on some other business. But the Baron would not listen to such a proposal for an instant. On the contrary, he used his utmost endeavors to bring to the side on the baroness's side; to wit:

- the right to the barony via

- the consanguinity via

- the marriage via

- the settlement in favor of the female line.

At all events, the baroness was more valuable to him than the barony. After she had lived some time in the world, she procured to marry a young gentleman, the baron's grandson, and he married her daughter and the wealthy young Englishman and pronounced him much less a fool than he has generally shown himself in cases where his own interest was concerned.

If the Baron, however, had really meditated such an alliance, the indifference of Waverley would have been an insuperable bar to his project. Our hero was already more frequently with the lady, who, besides being noted to think with great shame and confusion upon his mental legend of Saint Cecilia, and the vexation of these reflections was likely, for some time at least, to have induced the courtly Barrow to reconsider his disposition. Besides, Rose Bradwardine, beautiful and amiable as we have described her, had not precisely the sort of beauty or merit, which captivated a romantic imagination in early youth. She was too frank, too confiding, too kind; amiable qualities, undoubtedly, but destructive of the marvellous, with which a youth of imagination delights to dress the objects of his devotion. Young girls are apt, however, to tremble, and to adore, before the timid, yet playful little girl, who now asked Edward to mend her pen, now to construe a stanza in Tasso, and now how to spell a word. And though the incident may indicate that these incidents have their fascination on the mind at a certain period of life, but not when a youth is entering it, and neither looking out for some object whose affection may disembarrass him in his own eyes, than stooping to one who looks up to him for such assistance, though never in so capricious a passion, early love is frequently ambicious in choosing its object; or, which comes to the same, selects her (as in the case of Saint Cecilia) on speculation, and not for her real merits; it is the idea, which the reality of intimate and familiar life rather tends to limit and impair. I knew a very accomplished and sensible young man cured of a violent passion for a pretty girl, whose talents were equal to her face and figure, by being permitted to bear her company for a whole afternoon. Thus, it is certain, that had Edward enjoyed such an opportunity of conversing with Miss Stubbe, Anne Darch's precaution might have been unnecessary, for he would as soon have fallen in love with the dairy-maid. And although Miss Bradwardine was a very different character, it seems probable that the very intimacy of their intercourse prevented his feeling for her other sentiments than those of a brother for an amiable and accomplished sister; while the sentiments of poor Rose were gradually, and with her good conscious, assuming a shade of warmer affection.

I ought to have said that Edward, when he sent to Dunlelie for the books before mentioned, had applied for leave of absence. But the letter of his commanding-officer contained a friendly recommendation to him, not to spend his time exclusively with persons, who might dissipate the respectability of his character. I think I could not be supposed well affected to a government, which they declined to acknowledge by taking the oath of allegiance. The letter further intimated, though delicately, that Edward's family connexions might be supposed to render it necessary for Captain Waverley to communicate with gentlemen who were in this unpleasant state of suspension. I must say I should deeply regret it if Edward should prevent his prolonging those attentions into exclusive intimacy. And it was intimated, that while his political principles were endangered by communicating with laymen of this description, he might also receive erroneous impressions in religion from the prelate's clerical nay, who so perversely laboured to set up the royal prerogative in things sacred.

This last intimation probably induced Waverley to set both down to the prejudices of his commanding officer. He was sensible that Mr. Bradwardine had acted with the most scrupulous delicacy, in never entering upon any conversation with him, except in those on religious subjects; and that he had not the most remote tendency to bias his mind in political opinions, although he was himself not only a decided partisan of the exiled family, but had been trusted at different times by several commissions for their service. Sensible, therefore, that there was nothing of his being perverted from his allegiance, Edward felt as if he should do his uncle's old friend injustice in removing from a house where he gave and received pleasure, and amusements, merely to gratify a prejudice and ill-judged suspicion. He therefore wrote a very general answer, assuring his commanding officer that his loyalty was not in the most distant danger of corruption, and continued an honourable and respected guest and inmate of the house of Tully-Veolan.

CHAPTER XV.
A CREASE, and its consequences.

When Edward had been a guest at Tully-Veolan nearly six weeks, he described, one morning, as he took his usual walk before the breakfast-hour, signs of uncommon perturbation in the family. Four bare-legged dairy-maids, with each an empty milk-pail in hand, were seen, with frantick looks, and untinting loud exclamations of surprise, grief, and resentment. From their appearance, a pagan might have conceived them a detachment of the celebrated Roman populace, preceding their hatred and contempt nothing was to be got from this distracted chorus, excepting "Lord guide us!" and "En sias!" ejaculations which threw no light upon the cause of their disquiet. They were going down the avenue with all the speed it could muster. He had arrived, it would appear, upon some serious purpose, and was followed by half a score of peasants from the farmSTEER, who had no great difficulty in keeping pace with him.

The Bailie, greatly too busy, and too important, to enter into explanations with Edward, summoned forth Mr. Saunders, who appeared with a countenance in which dismay was mingled with solemnity, and they immediately entered into close conference.

Davie Gellatley was also seen in the group, idle as Diogenes at Cynope, while his companions were preparing for a siege. His spirits always rose with any thing, good or bad, which occasioned tumult, and he continued frisking, hopping, dancing, and singing the burden of an old ballad.

"Our geese's egg,"

until, happening to pass too near the Bailie, he received an admonitory hint from his horse-whip of which countenance and manner the Bailie took notice. Passing from thence towards the garden, Waverley beheld the Baron in person, measuring and re-measuring, with swift and tremendous strides, the length of the avenue, in a state of the most profound and offended pride and indignation, and the whole of his demeanour such as seemed to indicate, that any inquiry concerning the cause of his discomposure would give rise to nothing but increased wrath. The Baron therefore glided into the house, without addressing him, and took his way to the breakfast-parlour, where he found his young friend Rose, who, throughout his absence, he neither exhibited nor restrained, of her father, the turf! importance of Baillie Macmeeble, nor the despairs of the handmaids, seemed vexed and thoughtful. A single word explained the mystery. "Your brother, James, has taken the Baron's money," said James Waverley. A party of Catearan have come down upon last night, and have driven off all our milch cows." "A party of Catearans?" "Yes; robbers from the neighbouring Highlands. We used to be quite free from them while we paid black-mail to Ferrez Mac-Ivor Vich Inan Vorh; but my father thought it unworthy of his rank and birth to pay it any longer, and so this disaster has happened. It is not the value of the cattle, Captain Waverley, but James, you are so much hurt at the affront, and so bold and hot, I fear he will try to punish this, but it is not I he is not hurt himself, he will hurt some of these wild people, and there will be no peace between us and perhaps for our life-time; and we cannot defraud ourselves and old times, for the government have taken all our wealth and driven us to the rash—O what will become of us?" "Here poor Rose lost heart altogether, and burst into a flood of tears. The Baron entered at this moment, and rebuked her with more asperity than Waverley had ever heard him use to any one. "Was it not a shame," he said, "that she should exhibit herself before any gentleman in such a light, as if she shed tears for a drove of horned cattle?" On which the Baron, with great butchery and great composure, said: "Captain Waverley, I must request your favourable construction of her grief, which may, or ought to proceed, solely from seeing her father's estate exposed to the rapacity and depredation from common thieves and sorrows, for we are not allowed to keep half a score of muskets, which for defence or rescue."

Baillie Macmeeble entered immediately afterwards, and by his report of arms and ammunition confirmed this statement, informing the Baron, in a melancholy voice, that the people would certainly obey his orders, and if his honour's sign was absent, would bow down the gear to any guid purpose, in respect there were only his honour's body servants who had swords and pistols, and the depredators were twelve Highlanders, and the remainder of the civilian marauders.

* A crease was an infec turner for plunder, toned on the Board in a raid. * Sorrows may be translated, much regret, more immediately, indicating those unfortunate visitors who, ever more especially, virtuous by their, got somewhat apprehensive to be.
country. Having delivered this doleful announcement, he assumed a posture of silent dejection, shaking his head slowly with the motion of a pendulum, as if ceasing to vibrate, and then remained stationary, his body stooping at a more acute angle than usual, and the latter part of his person projecting in proportion.

"That gentleman, Captain Waverley, my grand-nephew," he said, "with two hundred horse, whom he led with his own hand, he advanced, accompanied by two hundred on foot more than five hundred of the so Highlanders, who have been ever lapis offensionis, et petra scandali, a stumbling-block and a rock of offence to the Lowland viciss. He disconcerted them, I say, when they had the tenacity to descend to harry this country, in the time of the civil discontents, in the year of grace, sixteen hundred forty and two. And now, sir, his grand-nephew, am thus used at such unworthy hands!"

Here there was an awful pause; after which all the company, as is usual in cases of difficulty, began to go on conjecture. Alexander, ab Alexander proposed, should send some one to compound with the Cattara's, who would readily, he said, give up their prey for a dollar a head. The Bailie opined, that they would not consent to the surrender of the boot, or composition of felony; and he recommended that some canny hand should be sent up to the glens to make the best bargain he could, as it were for himself, and not as a party of county, but not seem in such a transaction. Edward proposed to send off to the nearest garrison for a party of soldiers and a magistrate's warrant; and Rose, as far as she dared, enquired of her husband the course of action, and the means of tribute money to Ferus Mac-Ivor, and the Cattara, who, they all knew, could easily procure restoration of the cattle, if they were properly propitiated.

None of these proposals pleased the Baron's approbation. The idea of composition, direct or implied, was absolutely abominable; that of Waverley only showed that he did not understand the state of the country, and of the political parties which divided it; and, standing matters as they did with Ferus Mac-Ivor, the Baron would make no concession to him, were it, he said, "to procure restitution in integrum of every stick and stool that the chief, his followers, and his cattle, had stolen since the days of Malcolm Canmore."

In fact, his voice was still for war, and he proposed to send express to Balmainipple, Killancuret, and the other quarters, to prepare for the same, and to use all similar deprecatations, inviting them to join in the pursuit; and then, sir, shall these nublences requiescunt, as Lesueur calls them, be brought to the fate of their predecessor Cacus."

"Klisos oculos, et siccum manque guttur."

The Bailie, who by no means relished these warlike conceptions, here pulled forth an immense watch, of the colour, and nearly of the size, of a pewter warming-pan, and observed it was now past noon, and that the Cattara had been seen in the pass of Balmainipple, and that before the allied forces could assemble, they and their prey would be far beyond the reach of the most active pursuit, and sheltered in those ruthless deserts, where it was not to be advisable to follow, nor indeed possible to trace them.

This proposition was undeniable. The council therefore broke up without coming to any conclusion, as had also the councils of military, for one, and it was determined that the Bailie should send his own three milk cows down to the Mains for the use of the Baron's family, and brew small ale, as a substitute for beer. To this proposition, which was suggested by Swindon, the Bailie readily assented, both from habitual deference to the family, and an internal consciousness that his course would, in some mode or other, be repaid tenfold.

The Baron having also retired to give some necessary directions, Waverley seized the opportunity to ask, what was the chief thief-taker of the district?

"Thief-taker!" answered Rose, laughing; "he is a gentleman of great honour and consequence; he has the title of captain, and sits in a grand room in entitled indiction, and at length fixing his eye upon an old portrait, whose person was clad in armour, and whose features glared grimly out of a huge bush of hair, part of which descended from his head to his shoulders, and part from his chin and upper lip to his breastplate. "That gentleman, Captain Waverley, my grand-nephew," he said, "with two hundred horse, whom he led with his own hand, he advanced, accompanied by two hundred on foot more than five hundred of the so Highlanders, who have been ever lapis offensionis, et petra scandali, a stumbling-block and a rock of offence to the Lowland viciss. CHAPTER XVI

AN UNEXPECTED ALLY APPEARS.

The Baron returned at the dinner-hour, and had in great measure recovered his composure and good humour. He not only confirmed the stories which Edward had heard from Rose and BAILLIE MACHEBEE, but added many anecdotes from his own experience.

Note: The last of the Highlanders, one of the very last Highlanders who remained in the service of the government, and who was a scholar and a well-born gentleman, was seen by him at this very moment. He had the utmost respect for him, and was always ready to assist him in any way he could.

The story of the Highlanders is a sad one, and it is to be hoped that future generations will learn from it the importance of peace and understanding.

The Baron turned to his horse and rode off without saying a word.

Fergus Mac-Ivor Vich Ian Vohr, said the ambassador, in good English, "gives you well, Baron of Bradwardine and Tully-Veolan, and is sorry there has been a thick cloud interposed between you and your relations, which has kept you from seeing and considering the friends and alliances that have been formed between your houses and those of old; and he prays that this cloud may be removed, and that you may be as they have been hitherto between the clan Ior and the house of Bradwardine, when there was an egg between them for a fight, and a knife for an argument. And if you are sorry for the cloud, and no man shall hereafter ask whether it descended from the hill to the valley, or rose from the valley to the hill; for they never struck arms and swords, and afforded a protection which could not be equalled by the power of the king or his ministers. The author has seen a man of the clan Mac-Pherson, whose broadsword would put a stop to all violence than all the swords of all the ministers of the House.*

with the scabbard who did not receive with the sword, and wo to him who would lose his friend for the sake of a few months. "Ah!" said he, "I To this the Baron of Bradwardine answered with suitable dignity, that he knew the chief of clan Ivor to be a well-wisher to the King, and he was sorry that he had been a cloud between him and any gentleman of such sound principles, "for when folks are banding together, fiend is he who hath no brother."

Ah, how appearing perfectly satisfactory, that the peace between these August persons might be duly solemn-zied, the Baron ordered a stoup of usquebaugh, and, filling a glass, drank to the health and prosperity of Maurice and the chief of the clan Ivor, upon which, the Colonel, Gabriel, ambassador, to requite his politeness, turned down a mighty bumper of the same generous liquor, seasoned with his good wishes to the house of Bradwardine.

Having the Baron of Bradwardine of a liberal treaty of pacification, the envoy retired to adjust with Mr. Macwhistle some subordinate articles with which it was not thought necessary to trouble the Baron. These probably referred to the possession of the whole of the subordina, and apparently the Belfie found means to satisfy their ally, without suffering his master to suppose that his dignity was compromised.
At least, it is certain, that after the plenipotentiaries had arrived, there was no secession of brandy in the house, so that it seemed to have no more effect upon such seaded vessels, than if it had been poured upon the two beaux at the top of the avenue. Evan Dhu Maccombach had been concerted with all the other was how he could procure respecting the robbery of the preceding night, declared his intention to set off immediately in pursuit of the cattle, which he pronounced to be "not that off;—they have broken the bone," as he observed, "but they have had no time to sack the mawrow.

Our hero, who had attended Evan Dhu during his personal inquiries and much transport with the ingenuity which he displayed in collecting information, and the precise and pointed conclusions which he drew from it, Evan Dhu, on his part, was obviously flattered with the attention of his lady, the interest he seemed to take in his inquiries, and his curiosity about the customs and scenery of the Highlands. Without much ceremony he invited Edward to accompany him on a short walk of ten or fifteen miles into the mountains, and see the place where the cattle were conveyed to: adding, "If it be as I suppose, you never was such a place in your life, or ever will, unless into the like of it.

Our hero, feeling his curiosity considerably excited by the idea of visiting the den of a Highland Cacus, took, however, the precaution to inquire if his guidance would be safe. He was assured that the invitation would on no account have been given had there been the least danger, and that all he had to apprehend was a little fatigue; and as Evan proposed he should pass a day at his Chieftain's house in returning, where he would be sure of good accommodation and an excellent welcome, there seemed nothing very formidable in the task he undertook. Rose, indeed, turned pale when she heard of it; but her father, who loved the spirited curiosity of his young friend, did not attempt to damp it by an alarm of danger which really did not exist, and a knapsack, with a few ne-necessary on the shoulder of a sort of the deputy gamekeeper, our hero set forth with a fowling-piece in his hand, accompanied by his new friend, Evan Dhu, and followed by the gamekeeper aforsaid, and by two wild Highlanders, the attendants of Evan, one of whom had his gun, and the other at the end of a pole, called a Lochaber-axe, and the other a long ducking-gun. Evan, upon Edward's inquiry, gave him to understand that this martial es-coration was necessary, "and if you please, I would be able to understand, as supposed to have been introduced into both countries from Scandinavia.
the accommodation, and obviously rose in his guide’s opinion, by showing that he did not fear wetting his feet. Indeed he was anxious, so as to remove the opinion which Ewan seemed to entertain of the effeminacy of the Highlanders, and particularly of the English.

Through the gorge of the river they found access, by a breach of tremendous extent, full of large pits, which they traversed with great difficulty and some danger, by tracks which no one but a Highlander could have followed. The path itself, or rather the portion of more solid ground on which the travellers half walked, half waded, was rough, broken, and in many places quassy and unison. Sometimes the ground was so slippery, that it was necessary to spring from one hillock to another, the space between being incapable of bearing the human weight. This was an easy matter to the Highlanders, who wore thin-soled brogues fit for the purpose, and moved with a peculiar springing step; but Edward began to find the exercise, to which he was unaccustomed, more fatiguing than he expected. The lingering twilight served to show them through this Serbonian bog, but deserted them almost totally at the bottom of a steep and very stony hill, which it was the traveller’s next toilsome task, to ascend. "I’ll set a cove," said Jock, the most pleasant, and not dark, and Waverley, calling up mental energy to support personal fatigue, held on his march gallantly, though envying in his heart his Highland attendants, who could step over the stones of the stream that ran with a rapid and swinging pace, or rather trot, which, according to his computation, had already brought them fifteen miles upon their journey.

After this interval, and descending on the other side towards a thick wood, Evan Dhu held a conference with his Highland attendant, in consequence of which Edward’s baggage was shifted from the shoulders of his own men to that of the gillies, and the former was sent off with the other mountaineers in a direction different from that of the three remaining travellers. On asking the meaning of this separation, Waverley was told that the Highlander must go to a hamlet about three miles, for the night; for which he excused the person whom he supposed to be possessed of the cattle, did not much approve of strangers approaching his retreat. This seemed reasonable, and silenced a qualm of suspicion which came across Edward’s mind. It was a long, surly, and unpleasant hour, deprived of his only Lowland companion. And Evan immediately afterwards added, "that indeed he himself had better get forward, and announce the approach of the stripling to those of the gillies of a sidher roy (red soldier) might otherwise be a disagreeable surprise." And without waiting for an answer, in jocose phrase, he trotted off, and posted himself to a very round pace, was out of sight in an instant.

Waverley was now left to his own meditations, for his attendant with the battle-axe spoke very little English. They were traversing a thick, and, as it seemed, an endless wood of pines, and consequently the path was altogether indiscernible in the murky darkness which surrounded them. The Highlander, however, proposed to trace it by instinct, without the hesititation of a moment, and Edward followed his footsteps as close as he could.

After journeying a considerable time in silence, he could not help asking, "Was it far to the end of their journey?"

"To cove was trees, four mile; but as Dunhieth wasel was a wee taiget, Donald could, tat is, might, would, find the way.

This conveyed no information. The curragh, which was promised might be a man, a horse, a cart, or chaise; and no more could be got from the man with the battle-axe, but a repetition of "Ach ay! to the curragh."

But in a short time Edward began to conceive his meaning, when, issuing from the wood, he found himself on a lane, where the blacksmith gave him to understand they must all down for a little while. The moon, which now began to rise, showed obtrusively the expanse of water which spread before them, and the shapeless and in distinct forms of mountains with which it seemed to be surrounded. The cool, and yet mild air of the summer night, refreshed Waverley after his rapid and toilsome journey, and the perfumed breath of the birch trees, bathed in the evening dew, was exquisitely fragrant.

He had now time to give himself up to the full romance of his situation. Here sat on the banks of an unknown lake, here, under the guidance of a wild native, whose language was unknown to him, on a visit to the den of some renowned outlaw, a second Robin Hood of the Highlands, this time at deep midnight, through scenes of difficulty and toil, separated from his attendant, left by his guide:

What a variety of incidents for the exercise of a romantic imagination, and all enhanced by the solemn feeling of uncertainty, at least, if not of danger! The only circumstance which assorted ill with the rest, was the cause of his journey—the Baron’s milk cows! This degrading incident he kept in the back ground.

While wrapt in these dreams of imagination, his companion gently touched him, and, pointing in a direction nearly straight across the lake, said, "Yon’s a cove." A small point of light was seen twinkle in the direction in which he pointed, and, gradually increasing in size and lustre, seemed to flicker like a meteor upon the verge of the horizon. While Edward was watching it, an occasional flash of the oars was heard. The measured sound approached near and more near, and presently a loud whistle was heard in the same direction. His friend with the battle-axe immediately whistled in reply to the signal, and a boat, manned with four or five Highlanders, pushed for a little inlet, near which Edward was sitting. He advanced to meet them, with his Highland attendant, and saluted the oars with his hand. The boat was nestled into the lake, by the officious attention of two stout mountaineers, and had no sooner seated himself than he resumed their oars, and began to row across the lake with great rapidity.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE HOLD OF A HIGHLAND ROBER.

The party preserved silence, interrupted only by the monotonous and murmured chant of a Gaelic psalm, long, surly, and of a singularly pleasant tunefulness, until an hour, deprived of his only Lowland companion. And Evan immediately afterwards added, "that indeed he himself had better get forward, and announce the approach of the stripling to those of the gillies of a sidher roy (red soldier) might otherwise be a disagreeable surprise." And without waiting for an answer, in jocose phrase, he trotted off, and posted himself to a very round pace, was out of sight in an instant.

Waverley was now left to his own meditations, for his attendant with the battle-axe spoke very little English. They were traversing a thick, and, as it seemed, an endless wood of pines, and consequently the path was altogether indiscernible in the murky darkness which surrounded them. The Highlander, however, proposed to trace it by instinct, without the hesititation of a moment, and Edward followed his footsteps as close as he could.

After journeying a considerable time in silence, he could not help asking, "Was it far to the end of their journey?"

"To cove was trees, four mile; but as Dunhieth wasel was a wee taiget, Donald could, tat is, might, would, find the way.

This conveyed no information. The curragh, which was promised might be a man, a horse, a cart, or chaise; and no more could be got from the man with the battle-axe, but a repetition of "Ach ay! to the curragh."

of rock, on which the fire was blazing, and running about two boats' length farther, steered where the cave-in (for it was already arched overhead) ascended from the water by five or six broad ledges of rocks, some and regular that they might be termed natural. In an instant a gust of water was suddenly thrown upon the fire, which sunk with a hissing noise, and with it disappeared the light it had hitherto afforded. Four or five active arms lifted Waverley, or one of the boat, placed him on his feet, and almost carried him into the recesses of the cave. He made a few paces in darkness, guided in this manner; and advancing towards a hum of voices, which seemed to be the centre of the Rink, at an accuracy of turn Donald Bean Leun and his whole establishment were before his eyes.

The interior of the cave, where rose very high, was illuminated by torches made of pine-trees, which all emitted a bright and flickering light, attended by a strong, though not unpleasant odour. Their light was assisted by the red glare of a large charcoal fire, round which were seated five or six armed Highlanders, while others were indistinctly seen crouched on their plauds, in the most remote recesses of the cavern.
In one large aperture, which the robber facetiously called a "window," there was a group by the hearth of the barrows of a sheep, or two, and two cows lately slaughtered. The principal inhabitants of this singular mansion, attended by Evan Dhu as master of the retreat, were in high spirits toward meeting their different in appearance and manner from what his imagination had anticipated. The profession which he followed—the wilderness in which he dwelt—the wild warrior forms that surrounded him, were quite calculated to inspire terror. From such accompaniments, Waverley prepared himself to meet a stern grimace, feroceous future, such as Salvador would have chosen to be the central object of a group of banditti.

Donald Bean Leun was the very reverse of all these.
He was thin in person and low in stature, with light eyes, and smooth, bony features, lending which he derived his cognomen of Bean or white; and although his form was light, well-proportioned, and active, he appeared, on the whole, rather a diminutive and insignificant figure. He had served in some inferior capacity in the French army, and in order to receive his English visitor in great form, and probably meaning, in his way, to pay him a compliment, he let him go to the window where the highest degree of description could be given of him, to pass him on an old blue and red uniform, and a feathered hat, in which he was far from showing to advantage; and indeed looked so incongruous, compared with all around, when it was told me, as he was told to Rollo or to Ralph, had laughter been either civil or safe. The robber received Captain Waverley with a profusion of French politeness and Scottish hospitality, seemed profoundly interested in his appearance, and was peculiarly acquainted with his uncle's political principles. On these he bestowed great applause, to which Waverley judged it prudent to make a very general reply.

Being placed at a convenient distance from the charcoal fire, the heat of which the season rendered oppressive, a strapping Highland damsel placed be-principal Thistles, visited him on his return from Pignerolle.

When this gentleman, who lived to a very advanced period of life, first settled in Stirlingshire, his cattle were repeatedly driven by the celebrated Rob Roy, or some of his gang; and a length he was obliged, after obtaining a proper safe conduct, to make a short visit to his Majesty's Horse to Breacllaich in the text. Rob received him with much courtesy, and made many apologies for the accident, which must have happened, had there been some mistake. Mr. Abercromby was remarkable with college from two of his own cattle, which were hung up by the celebrated Rob Roy, and the head was as perfectly cut off, that he was agreeable to pay in future a small sum of black mail, in consequence of the injury. Rob Roy not only invited him to come back for another, but assured his host of the utmost hostile at the risk of having on a political dispute in such a situation. This anecdote I received many years since about 1752, from the mouth of the 'maligne gentilhomme' who was con sidered by tered or left the place without any other ceremony than a few words in Gaelic to the principal out-lookers; and, when he fell alarmed to call Highlander who acted as his lieutenant, and seemed to keep watch during his repose. Those who entered, seemed to have returned from some excursion, of which they recorded it in their usual inarticulate manner to the larder, where cutting with their dirks the rations from the carcasses which were there suspended, they proceeded to broil and eat them at their own pleasure and leisure. Liquor was under strict regulation, being served out either by Donald himself, his lieutenant, or the strapping Highland girl alone, who was the only female that appeared. The chief did not seem to care for them; he appeared partial to any but Highlanders, who, living entirely in the open air, and in a very moist climate, can consume great quantities of animal spirits without any harmful effects either upon the brain or constitution.

At length the fluctuating groups began to swim before the eyes of our hero as they gradually closed; nor did he, as in a wet dock, till after a long while, find himself on the lake, though there was but a faint and dimming twilight in the recesses of Uninn an Rì, or the King’s Cavern, as the abode of Donald Lean was pronouncedly denominated.

CHAPTER XVIII.

WAVERLEY. PROCEEDS ON HIS JOURNEY.

When Edward had collected his scattered reflections, he was surprised to observe the cavern to have a retreat of such aspect and propriety, in some order, he looked more accurately round, but all was still solitary. If it had not been for the scattered brands of the fire, now sunk into grey ashes, and the remnants of the festival, consisting of bonfire lads and half snuffed, and an empty wine glass, there remained no traces of Donald and his band. When Waverley sauntered forth to the entrance of the cave, he perceived that the point of rock, on which the marks of the cavern opened, and descending, was accessible by a small path, either natural, or roughly hewn in the rock, along the little inlet of water which ran a few yards up into the cavern, conducted him in on a point of rock, a few yards in, till the neck was behind, all the ascent of rocks, at the very extremity of the little platform; and making use of them as a staircase, he clambered by their means round the projecting shoulder of the rock, the top of which he reached just before the morning was over.

Looking back to the place from which he came, he could not help admiring the address which had adopted a retirement. The point of rock, round the shoulder of which he had turned by a few imperceptible notches, that barely afforded place for the foot, seemed, in looking back upon it, a step precipice, which barred all farther passage by the side of the lake; and not distant, and so possible, the breadth of the lake considered, ofdescribing the entrance of the narrow and low-browed cave from the other side; so that, unless the retreating hero would, or could, be met by the lieutenant, it might be a safe and secret residence to his person as long as they were supplied with provisions. Having satisfied his curiosity in these particulars, and before the morning was over, he turned his back upon the shore and the cave, and proceeded to the breakfast-table. After morning greetings had passed on both sides, and Evan, looking at Waverley, had said something in Gaelic to Alice, which made him, and which was conveyed to her eye, the pleasure well embrowned by sun and wind, Evan invited his remarks that the fish should be prepared for breakfast. A spark from the look of his pistol at the fish, which produced a sound that made them conscious of their situation, was quickly in flame, and as speedily reduced to an ember, on which the trout was broiled in large slices. To crown the repast, Evan produced from the poach.

Of his other articles, a copy of Carew's 'Breviary,' he had already taken his morning with Donald Bean Lean, before his departure; he offered the same cordial to Alice and to Edward, which they both declined. With the rest of his apparel, a lord, when he has nothing more to offer, is both shrewd and judicious; he left the scallop to Donald Mahony, his attendant, who, without waiting to be asked a second time, drank it off with great gusto. Evan then prepared to move to-wards the north, and started directly for Waverley to attend him. Meanwhile, Alice had made up in a small basket what she thought worth removing, and keeping her plated around her, she advanced up to Edward, and with many marks of attention, and a very fine smile, she offered her check to his salute, dropping, at the same time, her little courtesy, Evan, who was esteemed a wag among the mountain fair, advanced, as if to secure a man has done but Alice, snatching up her basket, escaped into the rocky bank as fleetly as a roe, and, turning round and laughing, called something out to him in Gaelic, which he answered in the same tone and manner; and then, waving her hand to Edward, she resumed her road, and was soon lost among the trees, though they continued for some time to hear her lively carol, as she proceeded gayly on her solitary journey.

They now again entered the cave of the cavern, and stepping into the boat, the Highlander pushed off, and, taking advantage of the morrow's breeze, hoisted a sail, and away he went, while Evan continued the beating of the drum, and directing his course, as it appeared to Waverley, rather back up the lake than towards the place of his embarkation on the preceding night. As they alighted along the silver mirror, Evan opened his conversation with the young Colt, Alice, who, said he, was both 'elegant and fondy'; and, without the least of ill, the best dancer of a strathspey in the whole strath. Edward assented to her praises so far as he understood them, yet could not help regretting that he was condemned to such a pernicious and dismally ugly.

"Och! for that!" said Evan, "there is notinie in Perthshire that she need want, if she ask her father to buy it, as it is hot too hot or too heavy.

"But to be the daughter of a cattle-stalker—a common thief!"

"Common thief!—No such thing: Donald Bean Lean is as high born as a dolphin in his life."

"Do you call him an uncommon thief, then?"

"No—he steals a cow from a poor widow, or a stall from a cottter, is a thief; he who lifts a drove from a hand, is a gentleman-drover. Anything besides, to take a tree from the forest, a salmon from the river, a deer from the hill, or a cow from a Low strathspey, is what no Highlander ever need think upon you."

"But what can this end in, were he taken in such an appropriation?"

"To be sure he would die for the law, as many a poor wight has done before him."

"Die for the law?"

"Ay; that is, with the law, or by the law; he was hanged up on the kind gallows of Crockett, where his father died, and his goods were devoured, and where I hope he'll live to die himself, if he's not shot, or slashed in a creagh."

"You hope such a death for your friend, Evan?"

"And that's well; I would as you would wish to see him burn on the bundle of wet straw in you den of him, like a manly tyke."

"But what becomes of Alice, then?"

"Truth, if such an accident should happen, as her father wishes, always expect any longer, I ken nought to hinder me to marry her myself.

"Gallantly resolved," said Edward; but, in the meanwhile, Evan, what has your father-in-law (that is, your father-in-law) to say, was, in the meantime, standing at the western end of the town of Crockett, in Perthshire. There was a great deal of gallows, we are unable to inform the reader with certainty; but it is alleged that the Highlanders used to touch their horses as they passed a place where the gallows used to stand, in his name, for the sake of his likeness or resemblance—"God bless yourrain and the Tiel turn you!" If the horses then had been called land, as being a sort of native or kindred piece of doon to those who suffered there, as is fulfilled of a natural destiny."

shall be, if he have the good fortune to be hanged done with the Baron's cattle."

"Och!" said the Foon, "they were all drudging before your lad and Allan Kennedy before the breakfast over Ben-Lawers this morning; and they'll be in the pass of Bally-Brouoh by this time, in their way land."

"But ye call them in the same colour, all but two that were unhappily slaughtered before I got last night to Unimah Rdi."

"And where are we going, Evan, if I may be so bold as to ask?" said Waverley.

"Where would you be curing, but to the bard's in house of Glenagloch? Ye would not think it in his country, without gaming to see him? It would be a deil of a sport."

"And are we far from Glenagloch?"

"But five bits of miles; and Vich Ian Vohr will meet us.

In about half an hour they reached the upper end of the lake, where, after landing Waverley, the two Highlanders drew the boat into a little cove among thick faggots and reeds, where it lay perfectly concealed. The path they followed was not more than the wood of Donald Bean Lean probably, of his occasions should next bring him to that place. The travel was followed for some time a delightful one, among the hills, down which a little brook found its way to the lake. When they had purveyed their walk a short distance, Waverley renewed his questions about the bust of the cavern.

"Dochtuch a bust?"

"Out, no! it's the past the skill of man to tell where he's been to find a bust; there's not a de'il near or cove, or crin, in the whole country, that he's not acquaintance of his own."

"And do others beside your master shelter him?"

"My master?—My master is in Heaven," answered Evan, hastily; and then immediately assuming his usual civility of manner, "you mean my brother-in-law; no, he does not shelter Donald Bean Lean, nor any that are like him; he only allows him (a smile) wood and water."

"No great boon, I should think, Evan, when both seem to be very scanty."

"Ah! but ye dinnae see through it. When I say wood and water, I mean the loch and the land; and I fancy Donald would be put ill if the laird were to take for granted that I put him up in the wood of Ralchay's tavern; and if our boats, with a score or ten more, were to come down the loch to Unimah Rdi, headed by myself, or any other pretty man.

"But then there never a crook party came against him from the Low Country, would not your Chief defen him?"

"Na, he would not war the spark of a flint for his life;—they would rating with the law."

"And what must Donald do, then?"

"He believed to rid this country of himself, and at last, it may be, over the mount upon Letterchive."

"And if he were pursued to that place?"

"I'm warrant he would go to his cousin's at Ranoch."

"Well, but if they followed him to Ranoch?"

"This through Evan, I'm in placed, all belief: and indeed, to tell you the truth, there durst not a Lothianer in all Scotland follow the fray a gun-shot behind Bally-Brouoh, unless he had the help of the Sidher Dhu."

"Whom do you call so?"

"The Sidher Dhu? the black soldier; that is what they call the indpendent companies that were raised to keep peace and law in the Highlands. Vich Ian Vohr commanded one of them for three years, when I was sergeant myself, I shall warrant ye. They call them Sidher Dhu, because they wear the tartans, they call their men King George's men,—Sidher Dhu, or, the chief men; that is the last generation."

"Well, but when you were in King George's pay, Evan, you were surely King George's soldiers?"

"Truth, and you must ask Vich Ian Vohr about that; for I was, and he was, I believe, which o' them it is. At any rate, nobody can say we are King George's men now, when we have not seen his pay this twelvemonth."
This last argument admitted of no reply, nor did Edward attempt any; he rather chose to bring back the discourse to Donald Bean Lean. "Does Donald confine himself to cattle, or does he itt as you call it?"

"Truth, he's nae nice body, and he'll just tak any thing, but most readily cattle, horse, or live Christians; for sheep are slow of travel, and inside plen- ening is cumbersome to carry, and not easy to put away for silent in this country."

"But does he carry off men and women?"

"Out, ay. Did ye ne'er hear him speak 'o the Perth road? He always had five hundred marks up to the south o' Bally-proof. And once ane Donald played a pretty sport. There was to be a blythe brid- ing between the Lady Cranefeather, in the howe o' the Morius, and the Alan of the Slieve. There was no hint o' the ceremony, and none o' the queenly household."

"And warn ye nothin about it in his warning the bridegroom; for Donald would not lower a fathernie of a thousand punds."

"The devil!"

"Oh, that's Scottish, ye shall understand. And the lady had not the glaze she if she had worn her gown, and they appli'd to the governor o' Stirling castle, and to the major o' the Black Watch; and the governor said, it was over to the northeast, and out o' his district; and the major said, his men were gone home to the shering, and he would not call them out because the victual was got in for all the Causeways we had. And the Mearns, for that it would prejudice the country. And in the meanwhile ye'll no hinder Gilliewhackit to take the small-pox."

"There was not the doctor in Perth or Stirling would look near the poor lad; and I cannot blame them, for Donald had been misconceived by one of these doctors about Paris, and he swore he would fling the first into the loch that he caught beyond the Parian. However, some callow, (that is, old women,) that were about Donald's hand, nursed Gillie- whackit as well, that between the free open air in the cave and the fresh whie, he did not recover; and at last he was forced to have a glazed chamber and a bed with curtains, and foils with red wine and white meat. And Donald was vexed about it, that when he was stout and well, he could not be pleased with anything they would like to give him for the pleasure and trouble which he had about Gillie- whackit to an unkend degree. And I cannot tell you precisely how they sorted; but they agreed as right that Donald was invited to dance at the wed- ding in his Highland trews, and they said that there was never seen muckle slicker clinked in his purse either before or since. And to the boot of all that, Gillie- whackit said, that be the evidence what it liked, if he had the luck to be on Donald's inquest, he would bring him in guilty of nothing whatever, unless it were wilful anor, or murder under trust."

With such bald and disjointed chat, Evan went on illustrating the state of the Highlands, more perhaps to the amusement of Waverley than of that...

* The story of the bridegroom carried off by Caterine, on his broom, was mentioned by the late Laird of Mac-Nab, many years since. To carry off per- sons, without their consent, was a common practice with the wild Highlanders, as it is said to bo the fashion in the south of France. Mackintosh related the following circumstance, before the marriage could be agreed on; and whether it was the fine cool air and the height of the season. Mackintosh did not pretend to be positive; but he was sure, that the prisoner recovered, his ransom was paid, and he was restored to his friends and country. A tradition, which is considered the Highland way, of having saved his life, his treatment of his master.
dreaded because it seemed much under its owner's command. In short, the countenance of the Chief-tain resembled a smiling summer's day, in which, notwithstanding, we are made sensible by certain, though slight signs, that it may thunder and lighten before the close of evening.

It was not, however, upon their first meeting that Edward had an opportunity of making these less favourable remarks. The Chief received him as a friend of the Baron of Brandwine, with the utmost expression of kindness and obligation for the visit; upbraided him gently with choosing so rude an abode, as he had done the night before; and entered into a lively conversation about the Duke of Berwick, whose he had lately been, but without the least hint; as to his predatory habits, or the immediate occasion of Waverly's visit, a topic which, as the Chief did not introduce it, our hero also avoided. While they walked merrily onwards towards the house of Glennaquick, Evan, who now fell respectfully into the rear, followed with Callum Beg and Dugald Mahony.

We shall now take the opportunity to introduce the reader to some particulars of Fergus Mac-Ivor's character and history, which were not completely known to Waverly till after a connexion, which, though arranged by the Duke of Berwick, was not entirely concluded until after he had spent a long time of the deepest influence upon his character, actions, and prospects. But this, being an important subject, must form the commencement of a new chapter.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE CHIEF AND HIS MANSION.

The ingenious licentiate Francisco de Ubéca, when he commenced his history of La Pietra Justina, said, 'by the way, is not one of the most rankling books of Spanish literature—complained of the pen having caught a hair, and fortnight besides, with more eloquence than common sense, an affectionate speculation with that useful implement, upbraiding it with the following of a grave, and a bitter, and base, and nature, as frequenting the three elements of water, earth, and air, indifferently, and being, of course, "to one thing constant never." Now I protest to thee, fair reader, that I entirely dissent from Francisco de Ubéca in this matter, and hold it the most useful quality of my pen, that it can swiftly chance from grave to gay, and from description and dialogue to exclamation, without that care of my discipline to mention no other properties of its mother-goose than its mutability, truly I shall be well pleased; and I conceive that you, my worthy friend, will have no occasion for that man of the Highland gillies, I pass to the character of the Chief. It is an important examination, and therefore, like Dobbesford, I must spare no wisdom.

The ancestor of Fergus Mac-Ivor, about three centuries before, had set up a claim to be recognised as chief of the numerous and powerful clan to whom he belonged, the name of which it is unnecessary to mention. Being defeated by an opponent who had more justice, or at least more force, on his side, he moved southwards, with those who adhered to him, in quest of new settlements, like a second Æneas. The very name of the Pertie Hill was calculated to indicate the purpose. A great baron in that country had lately become traitor to the crown; Iann, which was the name of our adventurer, united himself with those who were desirous of being supplanted. He was successful, and did such good service, that he obtained a grant of the property, upon which he and his posterity afterwards resided. He followed the king also in war to the westward of Leith, where he employed his leisure hours so actively in raising subsidies among the Boors of Northumberland and Durham, that upon his return he was enabled to erect a stone tower, or tower-house, against his neighbours, that he, who had hitherto been called Ian Mac-Ivor, or John the son of Ivar, was thereafter distinguished, both in song and genealogy, by the title of Chief.

The descendants of this worthy were so proud of him, that the reigning chief always bore the poetical title of Visch Ian Yehr, i.e. the son of John the Great, while the clan at large, to distinguish them from the from which they had descended, were denominated Strath nan Ivar, the race of Ivar.

The failure of this enterprise, the too direct descent from John of the Tower, engaged heart and hand in the insurrection of 1715, and was forced to fly to France, after the attempt of that year in favour of the Stuarts had proved unsuccessful. Not so fortunate other than other figures, he obtained employment in the French service, and married a lady of rank in that kingdom, by whom he had two children, Ferguson and Cuthbert, and his estate at Drumbeau was forfeited and exposed to sale, but was repurchased for a small price in the name of the young proprietors, who in consequence came to reside upon his native domains. It was not perceived, he possessed a character of uncommon acuteness, fire, and ambition, which, as he became acquainted with the spas of the country, gradually assumed a mixed and peaceable tenor; it could only have been acquired thirty years since.

Had Ferguson Mac-Ivor lived sixty years sooner than he did, he would, in all probability, have warded the fortunes of the nation politically, which he now possessed; and had he lived sixty years later, his ambition and love of rule would have lacked the fuel which his situation now afforded him. He was, indeed, one of those fine heads, great politicians as Castlemoe Castlemoan himself. He applied himself with great earnestness to apprise all his friends and connections which often arose among other clans in his neighbourhood, so that he became a frequent umpire in their quarrels. His own paternal power he strengthened at every expense which his fortune would permit, and indeed stretched his means to the uttermost to maintain the rude and pleasant hospitality, which was the most valued attribute of a chiefman. For the same reason, he crowded his estate with a tenantry, hardly indeed, and fit for the purposes of war, but equally outwitting what his soil was calculated to maintain. This patronage the chief of his own clan, not one of whom he suffered to quit his lands if he could possibly prevent it. But he maintained, besides, many adventurers from the mother-cept, who declared a less warlike, though most wealthy chief, to do honour to Ferguson Mac-Ivor. Other individuals, too, who had not even that apology, were nevertheless received into his allegiance, and that without distinction, which indicated that he despised none, as far as the Point of Pate, proper men of their hands, and were willing to assume the name of Mac-Ivor.

He was enabled to discipline these forces, from having obtained the command of the independent companies, raised by government to preserve the peace of the Highlands. While in this capacity he was actuated with vigour and spirit, and preserved great order in the country under his charge. He summoned his vassals to enter by rotation into his company, and serve for a certain space of time, which gave them all in turn a general notion of military discipline. In his campaigns against the heathen, it was observed that he assumed and exercised to the utmost the discretionary power, which, while the law had no fixed course in the Highlands, was conceived to belong only to the military commanding chief. He never took advantage of this power. He acted, for example, with great and suspicious lenity to those free-brothers who made restitution on his summons, and offered personal submission to himself, while he rigorously pursued, apprehended, and sacrificed to justice, all such interlopers as dared to despise his admonitions or commands. On the other hand, if any officers of justice, military parties, or others, presumed to put their feet within his territories, and without applying for his and concurrence, nothing was more certain than that they would meet with some notable foil or defeat; upon which occasions Fergus Mac-Ivor was the first to condescend with them, and, after gently blaming their uncivil conduct and loudly censuring its lawless state of the country. These lamentations did not exclude suspicion, and matters were so represented to government, that their Chiefman was deprived of his command.

Whatever Fergus Mac-Ivor felt on this occasion, he had the art of entirely suppressing every appearance of discontent; but in a short time the neighbourhood was roused by disasters from beyond the Seas. The death of Sir Donald Bean Lean, and others of his class, whose depredations had hitherto been confined to other districts, appeared from thenceforward to have made the Lowland gentry the less distrusting of the Highland savages, which were now carried on with the same opposition, as the Lowland gentry were chiefly Jacobites, and disarmed. This forced many of the inhabitants into contrivance of some sort, and such, not only established his claim to their protection, and gave him great weight in all their consultations, but, moreover, supplied funds for the waste of his feudal power, in order to increase the distinguishing of his pay might have otherwise essentially diminished.

In following this course of conduct, Fergus had a further object than merely being the great man of his neighbourhood, and ruling despotically over a small clime, but he shrewdly and diligently applied himself to the cause of the exiled family, and had persuaded himself, not only that their restoration to the crown of Britain would be speedy, but that those who assisted him would be raised to honour and rank. It was with this view that he laboured to reconcile the Highlanders amongst themselves, and augmented his own force to the utmost, to be prepared for the first favourable circumstains of rising. With this purpose also he conciliated the favour of such Lowland gentlemen in the vicinity as were friends to the good cause; and for the same reason, having in vain petitioned Mr. Balfour, the Earl, who, notwithstanding his peculiarities, was much respected in the country, he took advantage of the foray of Donald Bean Lean to sully the dispute in the manner we have mentioned. Some, indeed, surmised that he caused the enterprise to be suggested to Donald, in order to pave the way to a reconciliation, which, supposing that to be the case, cost the Lowlanders a twofold loss. This thought and the House of Stuart repaired with a considerable share of their confidence, an occasional supply of letters' du'or, abundance of fair words, and promises of assistance. This was expected, but did not answer. The Chiefman returned, purporting to be an earl's patent, granted by no less a person than James the Third King of England, and King of Scotland, to his right feel, trusty, and true, and to his terror. The Chiefman of Glenguequid, in the county of Perth, and kingdom of Scotland.

With this double conseir, Fergus plunged deeply into the correspondence and lot of that unhappy Highland, and, like all successful agents, easily reconciled his conscience to going certain lengths in the service of his party, from which honesty and pride would have deterred him, and the solicitude of his personal interest. With this insight into a bold, ambitious, and ardent, yet artful and politic character, we resume the broken thread of our narrative.

The Chief and his guest had by this time reached the house of Glenguequid, which consisted of Janan Chaistail's mansion, a rude-looking square house, with the addition of a lofted house, that is, a lofted house on the second story. Fergus was introduced to this house by the shepherd, who returned from that memorable expedition, well remembereed by the western shires.

"This is the seat of many a noted race," said Mac-Ivor in reply to the frequent inquiries of the visiters. The idea of the disestablished Lords of the eastern counties was lowered, and the chiefman's domain was a splendid and magnificent one, but valued at much pains and trouble and cost of living in the Jacobite cause. The chiefman's interest was to secure these investments, and his chief man was to have nothing to do with kings, making, being his own patron. He was not averse to the land, but had a "half-man" of the day, and a "half-man" a month, under the name of the Highland Host. Upon occasion of this crusade against the Ayshire Whigs and Covenanters, the Ichan Vohr of the time had probably been as successful as his predecessor was in the former crusade against the Covenanting party, and had captured the only rival edifice, as a monument of his magnificence.

Around the house, which stood on an eminence in the midst of the Highlands, all the ravages were caried on with little opposition, and the Lowland gentry were chiefly Jacobites, and disarmed. This forced many of the inhabitants into contrivance of some sort; and such not only established his claim to their protection, and gave him great weight in all their consultations, but, moreover, supplied funds for the waste of his feudal power, in order to increase the distinguishing of his pay might have otherwise essentially diminished.

In following this course of conduct, Fergus had a further object than merely being the great man of his neighbourhood, and ruling despotically over a small clime, but he shrewdly and diligently applied himself to the cause of the exiled family, and had persuaded himself, not only that their restoration to the crown of Britain would be speedy, but that those who assisted him would be raised to honour and rank. It was with this view that he laboured to reconcile the Highlanders amongst themselves, and augmented his own force to the utmost, to be prepared for the first favourable circumstains of rising. With this purpose also he conciliated the favour of such Lowland gentlemen in the vicinity as were friends to the good cause; and for the same reason, having in vain petitioned Mr. Balfour, the Earl, who, notwithstanding his peculiarities, was much respected in the country, he took advantage of the foray of Donald Bean Lean to sully the dispute in the manner we have mentioned. Some, indeed, surmised that he caused the enterprise to be suggested to Donald, in order to pave the way to a reconciliation, which, supposing that to be the case, cost the Lowlanders a twofold loss. This thought and the House of Stuart repaired with a considerable share of their confidence, an occasional supply of letters' du'or, abundance of fair words, and promises of assistance. This was expected, but did not answer. The Chiefman returned, purporting to be an earl's patent, granted by no less a person than James the Third King of England, and King of Scotland, to his right feel, trusty, and true, and to his terror. pressing on Waverley no light sense of their merit as soldiers, and of the power of him who commanded them."

"And what number of such gallant fellows have the happiness to call you leader?" asked Waverley.

"In a good cause, and under a chieftain whom the love, the race, and the heart have taken to their bosom; and the field, under five hundred claymores. But you are aware, Captain Waverley, that the disarming act, passed about twenty years ago, prevents their being in the complete state of preparation as in former times; and I keep no more of my clan under arms than may defend my own or my friend's property, when the country is troubled with such men as your last night's landlord; and government, which has renounced other means of defence, must confine att our protecting ourselves."

"But, with your force, you might soon destroy, or put down, such gangs as that of Donald Bean Lean."

"Fair; but faith and hearth did not turn many a man to mona to deliver up to General Blakeney at Stirling, the few broadswords they have left us; there were little policy in that, methinks.—But come, captain, to find it out, and one, and one, and one, and one; dinner is prepared—let me have the honour to show you into my rude mansion."

CHAPTER XX.
A HIGHLAND FEAST.

Fea Waverley entered the banqueting hall, he was offered the patriarchal refreshment of a bath for the feet, which the sultry weather, and the morasses he had traversed, rendered highly acceptable. He was not, however, so much influenced by this decision as the heroic travellers in the Odyssey; the task of ablation and abstention being performed, not by a beautiful damsel, trained

To claffle the limb, and pour the fragrant oil, but by a smoke-dried skinny old Highland woman, who did not seem to think herself much honoured by the duty imposed upon her, but muttered between her gasps, "Your foot! Your foot!" At the head of the table was the Chief himself, with Edward, and two or three Highland visitors of neighbouring clans; the eldest of his own tribe, waidbearers and tacksman, as they were called, who occupied portions of his estate as mortgagees or lessees, sat next in rank; beneath them, their sons and nephews, and foster-brothers; then the officers of the Chief's household, according to their order of birth, and next, the gentlemen who actually cultivated the ground. Even beyond this long perspective, Edward might see upon the green, to which a huge pair of fishling doors opened, a multitude of Highlanders of yet inferior description, who, nevertheless, were considered as guests, and had their share both of the countenance of the entertainer, and of the cheer of the day. In the distance, and fluctuating around this extreme were of the banquet, a clannish group of women, raged boys and girls, weans, young and old, large greyhounds, and terriers, and pointers, and curs of low degree; all of whom took some interest, more or less immediate, in the main action of the piece.

This hospitality, apparently unbounded, had yet its line of economy. Some pains had been bestowed in dressing the dishes, in the style of our rustic lairds, e.g., which were served at the upper caff of the table, and immediately under the eye of the English stranger. Lower down stood immense clumsy joints of mutton and beef, which, for the absence of pork, abhorred in the Highlands, resembled the rude festivity of the banquet of Venuelop's Dublin feast. But the central dish of the principal table was a sucking lamb, called "a hog in harat," roasted whole. It was set upon its legs, with a bunch of parsley in its mouth, and was probably exhibited in that form to gratify the pride of the cook, who paged himself more on the table. The sides of this poor animal were fiercely attacked by the clansmen, some with dirks, others with the knives which were usually in the same sheath with the dirk, and with the dexter hand; and a maneged and roofed speciel sieve. Lower down still, the victuals seemed of yet coarser quality, though sufficiently abundant. Both, onions, cheese, and the remains of the frequent courses, the feast, regained the sons of Ivor who feasted in the open air.

The liquor was supplied in the same proportion, and under similar regulations. Exceivcent claret and MacCallum, were liberally dispensed for the conclusion of the Chief's immediate neighbours; whisky, plain or diluted, and strong beer, refreshed those who sat near the lower end. Nor did this inequality of distribution appear to affect the manners of the guests, who all understood that his taste was to be formed according to the rank which he held at table; and, consequently, the tacksmen and their dependents always professed to drink in wines too cold for the social, and some one present understood by so large a party, and pleaded the necessity of his situation, on which unlimited hospitality was imposed as a paramount duty. These stout idle kinsmen of the Chief, behaved, as is said, "according to the hour in their house, held in trust for their support; and I must find them beef and ale, while the rogues will do nothing for themselves but practise the broadsword, or wander about the hills, shooting, fishing, hunting, drinking, and making love to the laird's sheep; what can I do, Captain Waverley? every thing will keep after its kind, whether it be a hawk or a Highland." Edward made the expected answer, a complete one, as he possessing so many bold and attached followers."

"Why, yes," replied the Chief, "were I disposed, like my father, to put myself in the way of getting my blow a little higher, as all the young ones of the house are always doing, I could soon have Venter, and Edward, and MacCallum, and the rest of my tenants assembled at the same table."

"Pork, or swine's flesh, in any shape, was, till late years, much abominated by the Scots, nor is it yet a favourite food among the people. I have eaten this meat myself, and I am said to have abhorred pork almost as much as he did himself."

"According to Sir John Scott, there were two or three unique patches of porridge, each having a little piece of sodden meat. And when the table was served, it was customary to sit down at it, not without a little struggle, with some pleasure in the last course."

"Till within this last century, the farmers, even of a respectable condition, dined with their work people. The difference between the like dish of the table, raised above the level of the seat, or, sometimes, by a line drawn on the table as a mark of distinction."

"One thing more. How to feed the vants, and restrain the appetite of his clansmen, allowed for the fair Fraser trial, who had a short and simple plan of being a Dunke-wrasel, the full house being all the sitting at the same time, took care that his young kinsmen did not eat forcing, the day before his visit, by a flagon of rum. In this case it was always ready with some honourable apology. But the meat and vegetables which I conceived might be the better lasts of his country, should not be Cornelius seat as an assigned point on the table."
the loons would stand by me. But who thinks of that in the present day, when the maxim is—better an old friend with you than a young man with belted bands?” Then, turning to the company, he proposed the “Health of Captain Waverley, a worthy friend of his kind neighbour and all the community.”

“Tis my say that,” said an old man, who apparently did not mean to please any, except to please himself; “I say may to ye, where there is a green leaf in the forest, there will be fraud in a Camyce.”

“There is nothing but honour in the Baron of Bradwardine,” answered another; “and the gun which I gave him from the house should be welcome, though he came with blood on his hand, unless it were blood of the race of Ivor.”

The old man, whose cup remained full replied, “Tis a thing that has been good enough of the race of Ivor on the land of Bradwardine.”

“Myself I may,” answered Ballochkiroch; “the flash of the gun cost me a fair-haired son, and the glance of the sword has done but little for King James.”

The Chieftain, in two words of French, explained to Waverley, that the Baron had shot this old man’s son in a fray, which took place seven years before; and then hastened to remove Ballochkiroch’s prejudice, by informing him that Waverley was an Englishman, unconquered by birth or alliance with the family of Bradwardine; and, where is the sum of hidden, my friends, that Mac-Murrough cannot find it?”

Mac-Murrough, the family bard, an aged man, immediately took the hint, and began to chant, with low and rapid utterance, a profession of Celtic verses, which were received by the audience with all the applause of enthusiasm. As he advanced in his declamation, his ardour seemed to increase. He had at first spoken with his eyes fixed on the ground; he now cast them around as if beseeching, and anon as if commanding, attention, and his tones rose into wild and wonderful declamations, which were so exquisitely fitted to the slow and solemn music of his bards, that Waverley thought he could discern his own name, and was convinced his conjecture was right, from the eyes of the company being at that moment turned towards him simultaneously. The ardor of the poet appeared to communicate itself to the audience. Their wild and sun-burnt countenances assumed a fierce and exalted expression; all bent forward towards the reciter, many sprang up and waved their arms in ecstasy, and some laid their hands on their swords.

When the song ceased, there was a deep silence; while the enthusiasm of the feast and of the company was so elevated, that no one could bear it. The Chieftain, who, during this scene, had appeared rather to watch the emotions which were excited than to partake their high tone of enthusiasm, filled with claret a small silver cup which stood by him. “Give this,” he said to an attendant, “to Mac-Murrough (not Fonn, i.e. the son) and when he has drunk the juice, bid him keep, for the sake of the Ivors, with his cup, to conjure with, and as a dam in the future.” The eft was received by Mac-Murrough with profound gratitude; he drank the wine, and kissing the cup, exclaimed it with rapture in the strain which was followed by the reciter; a strain which, in the Chieftain’s ears, saved him from the error into which he was almost persuaded, in his path of enthusiasm, to run.

The Chieftain regarded the generosity of their Chieftain with high approbation. Many approved Gaelic toasts were then proposed, of some of which the Chieftain gave his assent the following versions:

“To him that will not turn his back on friend or foe.”

“To him that never forsook a comrade.”

“To him that never gave up self or sold justice, to the exile, and broken bones to the tyrant.”

“Highlanders, shoulder to shoulder,” with many other pithy sentiments of the like nature.

Edward was particularly solicitous to know the meaning of that song which appeared to produce such effect upon the passions of the company, and repeated his desire of hearing it from the Chieftain, “that you have passed the battle during the last three rounds, I was about to propose to you to retire to my sister’s tea-table, who can explain these things to you better than I can.” Although I cannot stint my clan in the usual current of their festivities, yet I neither am addicted myself to exceed in its amount, nor do I,” added he, smiling, “keep a bear to devour the intellects of such as can make good use of them.

Edward readily assented to this proposal, and the Chieftain, saying a few words to those around him, left the table followed by Waverley. As the back was closed behind them, Edward, in view of Voil’s health invoked with a wild and animated cheer, that expressed the satisfaction of the guests, and the depth of their devotion to his service.

CHAPTER XXI.
THE CHIEFTAIN’S SISTER.

The drawing-room of Flora Mac-Ivor was furnished in the plainest and most simple manner; for at Glenmore each other sort of expenditure was branded as being extravagant; but the Chieftain, maintaining, in its full dignity, the hospitality of the Chieftain, and returning and multiplying the number of his dependants and adherents. But there was no appearance of this parsimony in the dress of the lady herself, which was in texture elegant, and even rich, and arranged in a manner which partook partly of the Parisian fashion, and partly of the more simple dress of the Highlands, blended together with great taste. Her hair was not disfigured by the art of the friseur, but fell in tawny ringlets on her neck, confined only by a circle richly set with diamonds. This was the one peculiar mark of her exterior beauty; and it was not possible to have any more decided proof that the Highland prejudices, which could not endure that a woman’s hair should be covered before wedlock.

Flora Mac-Ivor bore a most striking resemblance to her brother and his present companion, so that they might have played Viola and Sebastian with the same exquisite effect produced by the appearance of Mrs. Henry Siddons and her brother, Mr. William Murray, in these characters. They had the same antique and regular correctness of profile, the same dark eyes, eye-lashes, and eye-brows; the same elegance of complexion, excepting that Flora’s was enhanced by exercise, and Flora’s received the utmost refinement.

But the honesty, and some what stern regularity of Flora’s features, was beautifully softened in those of Flora. Their voices were also similar in tone and quality, that of Flora, especially when issuing orders to her followers during their military exercise, reminded Edward of a favourite passage in the description of Ermesina:

Loud as a trumpet with a silver sound.

That of Flora, on the contrary, was soft and sweet, an excellent thing in woman; yet, in urging any thing important, it had the same effect as the voice of her brother, with added dignity and grace of eloquence, it possessed as well the tones which impressed awe and conviction, as those of persuasive influence. The clear glance of the keen black eye, which, in the Chieftain’s eyes, was the torch, even of the material obstacles it encountered, had, in its sister, acquired a gentle persuasiveness. Her whole countenance seemed to seek power, authority, all that could exalt her, heighten her position, without those of her sister, as if she were already conscious of mental susceptibilities, rather than the party, that they were struggling for any farther distinction. Her sentiments corresponded with the expression of her countenance. Early education had impressed upon her mind a warm attachment to the family of Stewart. She was one of the most devoted attachment to the exiled family of Stewart. She believed it the duty of her brother, of his clan, of every man in Britain, at whatever personal hazard, to recover the dignity of the Stuart family, to purchase the pardon of the perturbed heir of the Chevalier St. George, had not ceased to hope for. For this she was prepared to do all, to suffer all, to sacrifice all. But her loyalty, as it exceeded her brother's, was less exhilarating; she was also in juniors. Custom to petty intrigue, and necessarily involved in a thousand paltry and selfish discussions, ambitious also by nature, her political faith was tainted, at least, if not tainted, by the views of interest and advancement so easily combined with it; and at the moment she should unsheathe his claymore, it might be difficult to say whether it would be most with the view of making James Stewart a king, or Fergus Mac-Ivor an earl.

This indeed, was a mixture of feeling which he did not allow even to himself, but it existed, nevertheless, in a powerful degree.

In Flora's bosom, on the contrary, the zeal of loyalty was united with ambition; she would have as soon made religion the mask of ambitious and interested views, as have shrouded them under the opinions which she had been taught to entertain. The passions of her heart, and the ideas of glory, were not uncommon among the followers of the unhappy race of Stewart, of which many memorable proofs will recur to the mind of most of my readers. But peculiar attention on the part of the Chevalier's son, and St. George and his princess to the parentage of Fergus and his sister, and to themselves, when orphans, had riveted their faith. Fergus, upon the death of his parents, had been for some time a page of honor to the train of the Chevalier's lady, and, from his beauty and sprightly temper, was uniformly treated by her with the utmost distinction. This was also extended to Flora, who was maternal at some time at a convent of the first order, at the princess's expense, and removed from thence into her own family, where she spent nearly two years. Both brother and sister retained the deepest and most grateful sense of her kindness.

Having thus touched upon the leading principle of Flora's character, I may dismiss the rest more shortly. Fergus, who was highly accomplished, and had acquired those elegant manners to be expected from one who, in early youth, had been the companion of a princess; yet she had not learned to substitute the world for the home of her native country. When settled in the lonely regions of Glenmacknoigh, she found that her resources in French, English, and Italian literature, were likely to be few and intersected; and, in order to fill up the vacant time, she allowed a part of it upon the music and pastoral traditions of the Highlanders, and began really to feel the pleasure in the pursuit, which her brother, whose perceptions of literary merit were more blunt, rather affected for the sake of popularity than actually experienced. Her resolution was strengthened in these researches, by the extreme difficulty which her inquiries seemed to afford those to whom she resorted for information.

Her love of her clan, an attachment which was almost hereditary in her bosom, was like her loyalty, a more pure passion than that of her brother. He was too thorough a politician, regarded his patriotic influence too much as the means of accomplishing his own aggrandizement, that he should feel the same anxiety for cherishing and extending their patriarchal sway, but it was with the generous desire of vindicating from poverty, or at least from want of sustenance, his whole family. She was born by birth, according to the notions of the time and country, entitled to govern. The savings of her income, for she had a small pension from the Presbyterian church, were directed to provide the comforts of the peasantry, for which there was a word which they neither knew nor apparently wished to know but to relieve their absolute necessity, when sickness or extreme old age. At every other period, they rather toiled to procure something which they might share with the Chief, as a proof of their sincerity, in such a manner, as to save what was afforded by the rude hospitality of his castle, and the general division and subdivision of his estate among them. Flora was so much beloved by the clan, that they were often to be seen, in which he enumerated all the principal beauties of the district, and intimated her superiority by concluding that "the fairest apple hung on the highest branch, though the lowest apple hung in the same tree." But the duals of the clan, more sedate-barly than would have sowed his Highland Panassus, the Bard's craft, as it was called, ten times over.

From situation, as well as choice, Miss Mac-Ivor's society was extremely limited. Her most intimate friend had been Rose Bradwardine, to whom she was much attached; and when seen together, they would have afforded an artistic and admiring subject for the gay and the melancholy muse. Indeed Rose was tenderly watched by her father, and her circle of wishes was so limited, that none arose but what he was willing to gratify, and next to none which did not concern the welfare of her brother. With all this it was otherwise. While almost a girl, she had undergone the most complete change of scene, from gayety and splendour to absolute solitude and ease, a rapid transition from the pleasures of a court to the consolation of society, and stood very high in the opinion of the old Baron, who used to sing along with her such French duets of Linder and Cliris, &c. as were in fashion about the end of the reign of King Louis le Grand.

It was generally believed, though no one has hitherto hinted it, that the Baron of Bradwardine, that fine intiatrix had no small share in alloying the wrath of Fergus upon occasion of their quarrel. She took part on her brother's side; as, dwelling first upon the Baron's age, and then representing the incapacity in which the case must sustain, and the dislike which must arise to his own character in point of prudence, so necessary to a political agent if he possessed a mind capable of carrying on an interest to extremity, Fergus would have terminated it in a duel, both because the Baron had, on a former occasion, shed blood of the clan, though the matter had been truly accommodated, and there was never a man to address at his weapon, which Fergus almost considered as a toy. For the same reason she had urged their reconciliation, which the Chief at first readily consented to, as it favoured some little private projects of his own.

To this young lady, now providing at the female emprise of the tea-table, Fergus introduced Captain Waverley, whom she received with the usual forms of politeness.

CHAPTER XXII.

HIGHLAND MISTRENY.

When the first salutations had passed, Fergus said to his sister, "My dear Flora, before I return to the barbarous ritual of our forefathers, I must tell you that Captain Waverley is a worshipper of the Celn, and as such will do what he can to extirpate from among us that superstition which so often is evident in the translation of Highland poetry, and that Mac-Murrich adds a version of his own upon the same principle; that Captain Waverley shall make extracts from the whole of our Bard, and transcribe them for you. Will you have the goodness to read or note to us our most in English, the extraordinary strain of names which Mac-Murrich has stuck together in the style of poetry? in the style of poetry; for you know you are in all the bard's counsels, and acquainted with his songs long before he rehearses them in the hall.

"How can you say so, Fergus? You know how little these things have meditated in the memory of an English stranger, even if I could translate them as you pretend.

"Not less than they interest me, lady fair. To-day you are in the company of one who has a share in it, has cost me the last silver cup in the castle, and I suppose will cost me something else next time I hold court平原, if the muse descends on Mac-Maccallum of Fleran, for you prove a poet well, and would not give up his ghost-kine purses for all the louids or which it could contain.

"Well pronounced, Flora; blow for blow, as Colonel Mac-Intyre would say. But my verses and my rhymes, and my odes and poetry, if not of purses and claymores, while I return to do the final honours to the senators of the tribe of Ivor. So saying, he left the room.

"My second, Flora, and my third. Flora and Waverley for two well-dressed young women, whose character seemed to hover between that of companions and dependants, took no share in it. They were both young girls, but seemed only as foils to the grace and beauty of their patronesses. The discourse followed the turn which the Chief had given it, and Waverley was equally amused and surprised with the manner in which his chieftain was compared to the Celtic poets in the boards and poetry, if not of purses and claymores.

"The recitation," she said, "of poems, recording the feats of heroes, the complaints of lovers, and the wars of contending tribes, forms the chief amusement of a winter fire-side in the Highlands. These are, and are to be very ancient, and if they are ever translated into any of the languages of civilized Europe, cannot fail to produce a deep and general sensation. Others are more modern, the composition of those family bards, whom the chieftains of more distinguished name and power retain as the poets and historians of their tribes. These, of course, possess various degrees of art in their construction or manipulation, or be lost on those who do not sympathize with the feelings of the poet.

"And your bard, whose effusions seemed to produce a feeling of melancholy in company to-day, was esteemed one among the favourite poets of the mountains?"

"That is a trying question. His reputation is high among his countrymen, and you must not expect me to depreciate it."
chief to him by way of appeal. He was unable, from the cause of disease which her situation conveyed, to return the salute; and was never more relieved than when the fair apparition passed on from the precocious eminence which she seemed to occupy with much indifference, and disappeared on the other side.

Advancing a few yards, and passing under the bridge which he had viewed with so much terror, the path led him to the brink of the stream, and on the other side the glen widened into a silvan amphitheatre, wavering with birch, young oaks, and hazels, with here and there a scattered yew-tree. The rocks now receded, and the birch made up the rise, which created rank and rank among the cope-wood. Still higher, resonances ant peaks, some bare, some clothed with wood, some round and purple with heath, and others splintered into rocks and crags. At a short distance, the path, which had for some distance lost sight of the brook, suddenly placed Waverley in front of a romantic waterfall. It was not so remarkable either for great height or quantity of water, as for the beautiful accompaniments which made the spot interesting. After a broken cataract of about twenty feet, the stream was received in a large natural basin filled to the brink with water, which, where the bubbles of the fall were light, glittered, and it was of great depth, the eye discerned each pebble at the bottom. Edging round this reservoir, the brook found its way as if over a broken part of the ledge, forming the stream up which Waverley had just ascended.* The borders of this romantic reservoir corresponded in beauty; but it was beauty of a stern and commanding cast, as if in the act of expanding into grandeur. Many banks of turf were bright with flowers and interrupted by huge fragments of rock, and decorated with trees and shrubs, some of which had been planted under the direction of Flora, but so cautiously to the grace, without diminishing the romantic wildness of the scene.

Here, like one of those lovely forms which decorate the landscapes of Poussin, Waverley found Flora gazing on the waterfall. Two paces farther back stood Cathleen, holding a small Scotch harp, the use of which had been taught to Flora by Rolly Dall, one of the last harpers of the Western Highlands. The sound of the stream mingled with a rich and varied tune to all the objects which surrounded Waverley, and seemed to add more than human brilliancy to the full expressive darkness of Flora's eye, enlarged and deepened by her genius, and enhanced the dignity and grace of her beautiful form. Edward thought he had never, even in his wildest dreams, imagined a figure of such exquisite and interesting loveliness. The wild beauty of the retreat, bursting upon him as if by magic, augmented the mingled feeling of delight and awe with which he approached her, like a fair enchantress of Bein or Aristo, by whose nod the scenery around seemed to have been created, an Eden in the wilderness.

Flora, like every beautiful woman, was conscious of her own power, and pleased with its effects, which also happened to be coincident from the same cause with the petulance of the young soldier. But, as she possessed excellent senses, she gave the romance of the scene, and other accidental circumstances, full weight in all her feelings with which Waverley seemed obviously to be impressed; and unaccompanied with the fanciful and susceptible peculiarities of his character, considered his hommage as the passing tribute which a woman of even inferior forms might have from the same cause.

The description of the waterfall is taken from that of Levid, at the farm so called on the northern side of the Lake, and near the head of the Lake, four or five miles from Aberfoyle. It is upon a small scale, but otherwise singular in its beauty. The appearance of Flora with the harp, as described, has been justly remarked as too theatrical and affected for the like-like simplicity of life which accompanies her French education, in which point and striking effect always makes a considerable object.

* The young and daring Adventurer, Charles Edward, landed at Glenfinlas in Moidart, and displayed his standard in the hall of the Chief of Clan Chisholm, Adam of Balnagown, and Camerons, and other less numerous clans, whom he had prepared to support him. There is a monument in memory of this event, and a Latin inscription by the late Dr. Crichton.

Dear Fergus, you have certainly partaken of the inspiration of Mac-Murrough's cup, rather than of mine.

I disclaim it, ma belle demoiselle, although I protest it would be the more congenial of the two. Which of your crink-brained Italian romancers is it that says,

Io d'Ziccoa niente
Mi cura, in fa de Dio, ch'è ben d'acque (Bos chi be re vaal) sempre mi spiacque.

But if you prefer the fine Gaelic song, Waverley, here is little Caithness singing you Drumsindoon.—Come, Cathleen, astors, (i.e. my dear,) begin; no apologies to the Clan-kinnis.

Cathleen sang with such vivacity a little Gaelic song, the burthen of the cry of a countryman on the loss of his cow, the comic tones of which, though he did not understand the language, made Waverley laugh louder than once.

Admirable, Cathleen! cried the Chieftain; I must find you a handsome husband among the clansmen one of these days.

Cathleen laughed, blushed, and sheltered herself behind her companion. In the progress of their return to the castle, the Chieftain warmly pressed Waverley to remain for a week or two, in order to see a grand hunting party, in which he said he was going to propose to join. The charms of melody and beauty were too strongly impressed in Edward's breast to permit his declining an invitation so pleasing. It was his declared wish to join them; nor should he write a note to the Baron of Bradwardine, expressing his intention to stay a fortnight at Glen-na-quoch, and requesting him to forward by the bearer (a gaily of the Chieftain's) any letters which might have arrived for him.

This turned the discourse upon the Baron, whom Fergus highly extolled as a gentleman and soldier. His character was touched with yet more discrimination by Flora. She declared he was the very model of the old Scottish cavalier, with all his excellencies and peculiarities. It is a character, Captain Waverley, which is fast disappearing; for its best point was a self-respect which was never lost sight of till now. But in the present time, the gentlemen whose principles do not permit them to pay court to the existing government, are neglected and degraded, and many conduct themselves accordingly; and, like some of the persons you have seen at Tully-Vrolan, adopt habits and companions inconsistent with their birth and breeding. The ruthless proscription of party seems to degrade the worth of a name it brands, but Waverley.

But let us hope a brighter day is approaching, when a Scottish country-gentleman may be a scholar without the pedantry of our friend the Baron, a sportsman without the extravagance of Mr. B------, a sensible improver of his property without becoming a borisir two-legged stoat like Killanuret.

Thus did Flora prophesy a revolution, which time indeed has produced, but in a manner very different from what she had in her mind.

The amiable Rose was next mentioned, with the warmest encomium on her person, manners, and mind. That man," said Flora, "will find an inexhaustible treasure in the affections of Rose Bradwardine, who shall be so fortunate as to become their object. Her very soul is in her home, and in the discharge of all those quiet duties of which housekeeping is the head. Her husband will be to her what her father now is, the object of all her cares, solicitude, and affection. She will see nothing and connect herself with nothing, but by him and through him. She is a man of sense and virtue, and she will sympathize in his sorrows, divert his fatigue, and share his pleasures. If she becomes the property of a churlish or negligent husband, she will suit his want, and in so doing, she will not long survive his unhappiness. And, alas! how great is the chance that some such unworthy lot may be that of my poor friend!—O that I were a queen this moment and could give my blessing to such a man!

This ancient Gaelic ditty is still well known, both in the Highlands and islands. It was translated and published, if I mistake not, under the auspices of the earl of C------

Waverley.

Here a large greyhound, bounding up the glea, leapt upon Flora, and interrupted her music by his importunate caresses. At a distant whistle, he turned, and shot down the path again with the rapidity of an arrow. That was Ferguson's Gallic hound, attendant on Captain Waverley, and that was his signal. He likes no poetry but what is humorous, and comes in good time to interrupt my long catalogue of the tribes, whom one of your saucy English poets calls

"O Mac Leane, Mac-Kenzie, and Mac-Gregor."

Waverley expressed his regret at the interruption.

"You cannot guess how much you have lost. The bard, as to duty bound, has addressed three long stanzas to Vich Ian Vohr, of the Banners, enumerating all his great properties, and not forgetting his being a cheerer and barder—a giver of bounteous gifts. Besides, you should have heard a practical admonition to the fair-haired son of the stranger, who lives in the land where the grass is always green—the rider on the shining pampred steed, in a garment which he knew not was the dress of whose nephew it is like the scream of the eagle for battle. This valiant horseman is affectionately conjured to remember that his ancestors were distinguished by their loyalty, as well as their courage. All this you have lost; but, since your curiosity is not satisfied, I judge, from the distant sound of my brother's whistle, I may have time to sing the concluding stanza before you return from your walk by the hillside, break your head on the rocks, or sing your own song and endure it no more.

Away on your hills, on your islands awake, Brave sons of the mountain, the firth, and the lake!
'Tis to the brave—yes, but the signal for the charge and song,
'Tis the pibroch's shrill summons—but not to the hall.
'Tis the summons of heroes for conquest or death,
When the banners are blazing on mount and heath:
They can see the stars, they can see the dawn once more,
To the march and the muster, the line and the charge.

But the brand of each Chieftain like Fin's in his liver,
May the hero's blood arise like those flames of fire
Burst the base foreign yoke as your sire did of yore,
Or die like your sire, and endure it no more.

Chapter Xxiii.

Waverley continues at Glen-na-quoch.

As Flora concluded her song, Fergus stood before her. "I knew I should find you here, even with our honest friend, if you had not been driven, by the unbridled taste now, like my own, would prefer a jet d'eau at Versailles to this cascade, with all its accompaniments of rock and roar; but this is Flora's Parnassus. Captain Waverley, and that fountain her Helicon. It would be greatly for the benefit of my ear if she could teach her conductor, Mac-Murrough, the value of its influence: he has just drunk a pint of unction to corrig, he said, the coarseness of the clergy;—Let me try its virtues. He appealed a little water in the hollow of his hand, and immediately commenced, with a theatrical air—

"O Lady of the desert, hail! That which the stars of the Goil,

"I wish you would command her to accept mine en attendant," said Fergus, laughing.

I don’t know by what capitse it was that this wish, however revolting to its consequences, was received on Edward’s feelings, notwithstanding his growing inclination to Flora, and his indifference to Miss Bradwardine. This is one of the inexplicabilities of human beings, with whom nothing to do with the imposing a new tax, excepting the trifling circumstance of being obliged to pay more happy surely in the present case, since, thought it lies within my arbitrary power to extend my favor to Flora as I think proper, I cannot call you into engage if you do not think proper to read my narrative. There is old Linnier of Pitscottie ready at my elbow, with his Abre hunting, and his left and right-handed pate of gun timber; with all kind of drink to be had in burs, land, ale, beer, wine, muscadel, mulvaise, vinous, and aquavitae; with wheat-bread, main-bread, gur- gur-bread, beef, mutton, lamb, veal, venison, pheasants, capon, coney, crane, swan, partridges, duck, drake, brasted-cock, fowl, and capercailzie: not forgetting the cook, who is very dreadfully and nappy, and least of all is "exceeding stews, cutting brasses, and the odd parts and pottingars, with confects and drugs for a dessert." The Highland games and minds are high and gree.

But without further tyranny over my pages, a display of the extent of my own reading, I shall content myself with borrowing a single incident from the memorable hunting at Lude, comrrmarized the ingenuous Mr. Gunn’s Essay on the Caledonian Harp, and so proceed in my story with all the breadth that my natural style of composition, partaking of what scholars call the paraphrastic and ambiguities, and the various circumlocutions are capable of.

The solemn hunting was delayed, from various causes, for about three weeks. The interval was spent by Waverley with great satisfaction at Cumber- me, Sogurich, for the impression which Flora made on his mind at their first meeting grew daily stronger. She was precisely the character to fascinate a youth of romantic imagination. Her manners, her looks, her talents for poetry and music, gave additional and varied influence to her eminent personal charms. Even in her hours of gayety, she was in his fancy exalted above the ordinary daughters of Eve, and reserved only to stop for an instant on those topics of amusement and gallantry which others appear to live for. In the neighbourhood of this enchantress, while sport continued the morning, and music and the dance led on the evening, Waverley became daily more delighted with his hospitable landlord, and more enamoured of his bewitching sister.

At length, the period fixed for the grand hunting arrived, and Waverley and the Chieftain departed for the place of rendezvous, which was a day’s journey to the northward of Glenmuick. Fergus was stationed on the east side of the Nevis, and Waverley on the west side of the Nevis, and his clan, well armed, and accoutered in their best fashion. Waverley conducted so far with the customs of the country as to follow the druid (he could not abide the kilt), briar rod, and tam o’shanter as the fittest dress for the exertions in which he was to be engaged, and which least exposed him to be stared at as a stranger when they should reach the place of rendezvous. They found, on the way approached, cular powerful Chiefs, to all of whom Waverley was formally presented, and by all cordially received. Their vassals and clansmen, a part of whose feudal duty it was to attend on these parties, appeared in such numbers as amounted to a small army. These assemblages were held at a very far distance from the town, in the near, forming a circle, technically called the tinchal, which, gradually closing, drove the deer in herds together towards the glen, where the Chiefs and principal sportsmen lay in wait for them. In the meantime, while these distinguished personages bivouacked among the flowery heath, wrapped up in their plinths; a mode of passing a summer's night which Waverley found uncommonly agreeable.

For many hours after sun-rise, the mountain ridges and passes retained their ordinary appearance of solemn and solitude, and the Chiefs, with their followers, mounted themselves with various pastures, in which the joys of the shell, as Ossian has it, were not forgotten. "Others apart sat on a hill retired," probably as deeply engaged in the discussion of politics and war, as Milton's spirits in metaphysical disquisition. At length signals of the approach of the game were decreed and heard. Distant shouts resounded from valley to valley, as the various parties of the two Wavers, and through the scopes, waiting brooks, and traversing thickets, approached more and more near to each other, and compiled the astonished deer, with the other wild animals of the glen, which they drove over the high moor, and scattered in every direction.

Every now and then the report of muskets was heard, repeated by a thousand echoes. The baying of the deer was soon added to the chorus, which grew ever louder and more loud. At length the advanced parties of the deer began to show themselves; and as the stragglers came bounding down the pass by two or three at a time, the Chiefs showed their skill by discharging their guns and their dexterity in injured them down with their guns. Ferguson exhibited remarkable address, and Edward was also so fortunate as to attract the notice and applause of the company.

But now the main body of the deer appeared at the head of the glen, compelled into a very narrow compass, and presenting such a formidable phalanx, that their antics appeared at a distance, over the ridge of the steep pass, like a leafless grove. Their number was very great, and from a desperate stand which they made, with the tallest of the red deer stag ar

tic to affect an opinion contrary to that of his forebears, or more probably because, like most men who do not think deeply or accurately on such subjects, he had in his mind a reserve of superstition which balanced the freedom of thought which his education and occasions had given him in other respects. Waverley made no commentary, therefore, on the manner of the treatment, but rewarded the professor of medicine with a liberality beyond the utmost conception of his situation and on the occasion, so many inept and pernicious blessings in Gaelic and English, that Mac-Ivor, rather scandalized at the excess of his acknowledgments, cut them short, by exclaiming, Crud mule hualachort! i.e. "A hundred thousand curses on you!" and so pushed the helper of men out of the cabin.

After Waverley was left alone, the exhaustion of pain and fatigue—for the whole day's exercise had been severe, threw him into a profound, but not a feverish sleep, which he chiefly owed to an opiate draught administered by the old Highlander from some decoction of belladonna and phaenopsia.

Early the next morning, the purpose of their meeting being over, and their sports damped by the untoward accident, in which Ferguson and all his friends expressed the greatest sympathy, it became urgent how to dispose of the disabled sportsman. This was settled by Mac-Ivor, who had a litter prepared of "birds of paradise" in a granary which was built for them by his people with much caution and dexterity as renders it not improbable that they may have been the ancestors of some of those sturdy Gaeil, who have now the happiness of transporting belted kelp, and who believe that the clan—this clan—had ten rows in one evening. When Edward was elevated upon their shoulders, he could not help being gratified with the romantic effect produced by the singing up of this noble camp.

The various tribes assembled, each at the pibroch of their native clan, and each headed by their patriarchal ruler. Some, who had already begun to retire, were tutored by the sheikhs, descending in the pass which led to the scene of action, the sound of their bagpipes dying upon the ear. Others made still a moving picture upon the narrow plain, forming various changeful groups, their fierce eyes, loose plait, waving in the morning breeze, and their arms glittering in the rising sun. Most of the chiefs came to take farewell of Waverley, and to express their anxious hope it might again, and speedily, meet the care of Fergus abridged the ceremony of taking leave.

At length, his own men being completely assembled and mustered, Mac-Ivor commended his march, but not till after what they had conceiv’d. He gave Edward to understand, that the greater part of his followers, now on the field, were bound on a distant expedition, and that when he had deposited him of a gun-bag and a purse he was sure would pay him every attention, he himself should be under the necessity of accompanying them the greater part of the way, but would lose no time in rejoining his friend.

Waverley was rather surprised that Fergus had not mentioned this ulterior destination when they set out upon the hunting-party; but his situation did not admit of many interrogatories. The greater part of the clansmen went forward under the guidance of old Ballenkeirch, and Evan Dhu Maccomibich, apparently in high spirits. A few remained for the purpose of escorting the Chieftain, who walked by the side of Edward, and attended him with the most affectionate assiduity. About noon, after a journey which the nature of the conveyance, the pain of his bruised, and the roughness of the way, rendered incomparably more wearisome, Waverley was hospitably received into the house of a gentleman related to Fergus, who had prepared for him every accommodation which could make the simple habits of living then universal in the Highlands, more pleasant to his person, an old man about seventy, Edward admired a relic of primitive simplicity. He wore no dress but what his estate afforded; the cloth was the fleece of his own sheep, which he had himself woven into tartan by the dyes produced from the herbs and lichens of the hills around him. His linen was spun by his daughters and maid-servants, from his own flax, nor did his table, though plentiful, and varied with game and fish, offer an article but what was of native produce.

Claiming himself no rights of chasship or vassalage, he was fortunate in the alliance and protection of Vich Ian Vohr, and other bold and enterprising chiefains, who protected him in the quiet unambitious life he loved. It is true, the youth born on his grands and often enticed to leave him for the service of his more active friends; but a few old servants and tenants used to shake their grey locks when they heard their master censured for want of spirit, and observed: When the wind is still, the shower falls soft.” This good old man, whose charity and hospitality were unbounded, would have received Waverley with kindness, had he been the meanest Saxon, he would have bestowed assistance.

The author has been sometimes accused of confusing facts with reality. He therefore thinks it necessary to state, that the circumstances of the hunting described in the text as preparatory to the Rebellion of 1715, has not been known, and is not imaginary. But it is well known such a hunting was held at Greenock in the session of 1716, under the auspices of the Earl of Moray as preparatory to the Rebellion of 1715; and most of the Highland chieftains who afterwards engaged in that civil commotion were present on this occasion.

But his attention to a friend and guest of Vich Ian Vohr who was wounded by a shot fired from the tower of his mansion. Other embrocations were applied to the injured limb; but although they were put in practice, at length, after more solicitude than was perhaps for the advantage of his health, Fergus advised Waverley to be careful. For a few days, when he was examined by a surgeon, it was declared that time Waverley would be able to ride one of the Highland ponies of his landlord, and in that manner return to Tornay and the camp.

The next day, when his good host appeared, Edward learned that his friend had departed with the dawn, leaving none of his followers except Callum Beg. This sort of foot-page, an illiterate, rude, but well-mannered man, used to attend his person, and whom Edward now in charge of the baggage at Waverley. On asking his host, if he knew where the Chieftain was gone, the old man looked fixedly at him, with something mysterious, and said in the smile which was his only reply. Waverley repeated the question, to which his host answered in a proverb—

"What sent the messengers to hell,
Was asking what they knew full well."* But he was about to proceed, but Callum Beg said, rather pertly, as Edward thought, that “in the Chief” did not mind a Sassenach Dunbar—wuss to go, though they would find the way. From this Waverley concluded he should dissemble his friend by inquiring of a stranger the object of a journey which he himself had not communicated. It is unnecessary to trace the progress of his new recovery. The sixth morning had arrived, and he was able to walk about with a staff, when Fergus returned home, and, after a score of inquiries, thought that Waverley was one of the highest spirits, congratulated Waverley on his progress towards recovery, and finding he was able to sit on horseback, proposed their immediate return to Glennaquoich. Waverley joyfully assented, and in the form of its fair mistress had lived in his dreams during all the time of his confinement.

Now let us listen to more moss, and mow, to gett, and many a gie.

Fergus, all the while, with his myrmidons, striding stoutly by his side, or diverging to get a shot at a heath-cock. Waverley’s bosom beat thick till they approached the old tower of Iain man Chais, and could distinguish the fair form of its mistress advancing to meet them. Fergus began immediately, with his usual spirit, with the words, "Open your gates, incomparable princess, to the wounded Moor Abindares, whose Rodrigo de Narvaez, constable of Antiqueros, convey to your castle; or open them, if you like it better, to the renegade, the traitor, the traitor of their king, the traitor of his half-bred friend, Baldovinos of the mountains.―Ah, long rest to thy soul, Cervantes! I without getting thy remnants, how should I frame my language to befit romantic ears?"

Flora now advanced, and welcoming Waverley with much kindness, expressed her regret for his accident of which she had already heard particulars, and she surprised that her brother should not have taken better care to put a stranger on his guard against the perils of the sport in which he engaged him. Edward easily excused the Chieftain, who, indeed, was his own personal risk, had probably not attended. This greeting over, Fergus said three or four words to his sister in Gaelic. The tears instantly sprang to her eyes, but they seemed to be tears of devotion and joy, for she looked up to heaven, and folded her hands as in a solemn expression of prayer or gratitude. After the pause of a minute, she presented to Edward some letters which had been forwarded from a Viscount, ’twas learned, by the real, some time, delivered some to her brother. To the latter she likewise gave three or four numbers of the Colonial Mercury, the only newspaper which was published in the north of the Two—Edward speedily found that those which he had received contained matters of very deep interest.

CHAPTER XXV.

NEWS FROM ENGLAND

The letters which Waverley had hitherto received from his relations in England, were not such as required, or invited, a reply. His father usually wrote to him with the pompous affectation of one who was too much oppressed by public affairs to find leisure to attend to those of his own family. Now and then he mentioned persons of rank in Scotland to whom he wished his son should pay some attention; but Waverley, hitherto occupied by the amusements which he had found at Tully-越南 and elsewhere, and filled with any attention to hints so coldly thrown out, especially as distance, shortness of leave of absence, and so forth, furnished a ready apology. But latterly the burden of Mr. Richard Waverley's paternal epistles consisted in certain mysterious hints of greatness and influence which he was speedily to attain, and which would ensure his son's obtaining the most rapid promotion, although he shewed no signs to the soul; but they were kind and affectionate, and seldom concluded without some allusion to our hero's stud, some question about the state of his purse, and a few words of commendation from whom he said he had procured him from Waverley-Honour, Aunt Rachel charged him to remember his principles of religion, to take care of his health, to beware of Scotch mistle, which would not do him good, and lastly, a Mr. William through and through; never to go out at night without his great coat; and, above all, to wear flannel next to his skin.

Mr. Waverley could not write directly out of his studies, but it was of the bulk of six epistles of these degenerate days, containing, in the moderate compass of ten folio pages, closely written, a precis of a supplementary quarto manuscript of adventures, details, and discoveries, which would have served as a pretext with which he had presented Waverley. This he considered as a mere sop in the pan to stay the appetite of Edward's curiosity, until he should find an opportunity of sending down the volume itself, which was much too heavy for the post, and which he proposed to accompany with certain interesting pamphlets, lately published, by his friend in Little Britain, with whom he had kept regular intercourse, and in virtue of which the library-shelves of Waverley-Honour were loaded with much trash, and a good round bill, seldom summed, in fewer than three years. Mr. Richard Waverley of Waverley-Honour, Bart., was marked Dr. to Jonathan Grubbel, bookseller and stationer, Little Britain. Such had hitherto been the style of the letters which Edward had received from England; but the packet delivered to him at Glennaquoch was of a different and more interesting complexion. It would be impossible for the reader, even were he to insert the letters at full length, to comprehend the real cause of their being written, without a glance into the interior of the British Cabinet at the period in question.

The business of the day happened (no very singular event) to be divided into two parties: the weakest of which, making up by assiduity of intrigue their inferiority in real consequence, had of late acquired some new proclivities, and with them the hope of superseding their rivals in the favour of their sovereign, and overpowering them in the House of Commons. Amongst others, they had thought it worth while to practice on Richard Waverley. This honest gentleman, by a grave mysterious demeanour, an attention to the etiquette of business, rather than to its essence, a facility in making long dull speeches, combined, with a technical jargon of office, which prevented the mastery of his orations from being discovered, had acquired a certain name and credit in public life, and certainly seemed to be possessed of a ready and handy business, which would wear well, as the ladies say in choosing their silks, and ought in all reason to be good for common and every-day use, since they were confessedly of the most excellent quality. This faith had become so general, that the insurgent party in the cabinet of which we have made mention, after sounding Mr. Richard Waverley, were quite contented with the information they received, and were prepared to propose, that, in case of a certain revolution in the ministry, he should take an ostensible place in the new order of things, not indeed of the very first rank, but greatly higher, in point both of emoluments and influence, than that which he now enjoyed. There was no resisting so tempting a proposal, notwithstanding that the Great Man, under whose patronage he had enlisted, and by whose banner he had hitherto stood firm, was the principal object of the proposed attack by the new allies. Unfortunately this fair scheme of ambition was blighted in the very bud, by an accident which was as natural as it was unexpected. The official sentence, concerned in it, who hesitated to take the part of a voluntary resignation, were informed that the king had no further occasion for their services; and, in accordance with Richard Waverley's request, were reprimanded, considered as aggravated by inordinate nation was accompanied by something like personal contempt and contumely. The public, and even the party of the insurgents, who had felt the greatest disgust and disappointment of this selfish and interested statesman; and he retired to the country under the comfortable reflection, that he had lost, at the same time, character, credit, and,—what he at least equally declared,—eminence.

Richard Waverley had thought momentarily on this occasion was a masterpiece of his kind. Aristides himself, that unjust monarch, and an ungrateful country, were the burden of each rounded paragraph. He spoke of long services, and unrequited sacrifices; though the former had been overpaid by his own son, by the natural son of the ill-treat ed, and outshone by throwing up his commission as soon as the letter reached him. This, he said, was also his uncle's desire, as he would himself intimate in due course.

According to the letter which Edward opened was from Sir Everard. His brother's disgrace seemed to have removed from his well-natured bosom all recollection of their differences, and, removing also was from every means of learning that Richard Waverley's disgrace was in reality only the just, as well as natural consequence, of his own unsuccessful intrigues the good, but crotcheting Baronet, at once set it down as a new and enormous instance of the injustice of the existing government. It was true, he said, and he must not disguise it even from Edward, that his father could not have sustained such an insult as was now, furtively, put to some of his house, unless he had subjected himself to it by accepting of an employment under the present system. Sir Everard had no doubt that he now both saw and felt the magnitude of this error, and that it would his (Sir Everard's) business to take care that the cause of his regret should not extend itself to pecuniary consequences. It was enough for a Waverley to have sustained the public disgrace of his house, his father's injury could be easily obviated by the head of their family. But it was both the opinion of Mr. Richard Waverley and his own, that Edward, the representatives of the real greats, and hastened to the most speedy opportunity, of transmitting the treasure tion to the War-Office, and hunted, moreover, that little ceremony was necessary when so little had been used to his father. He sent multitudinous greeting to the Baron of Bradwardine.

A letter from aunt Rachel spoke our ever more press- ing father's wants of the hand which she knew to be Richard's just reward of his forfeiting his allegiance to a lawful, though exiled sovereign, and taking the oaths to an alien; a concession which her grandfather, Sir Nigel Waverley, refused to make, either to the Round-head Parliament or to Cromwell, when his life and fortune stood in the utmost extremity. She hoped her dear Edward would follow the footsteps of his ancestor, and as speedily as possible get rid of the badge of servitude to the usurp- ing family, and regard the wrongs sustained by his father as an admonition from Heaven, that every desertion of the line of loyalty becomes its own punishment. She also concluded with her respects to Mr. Bradwardine, and begged Waverley would inform her whether his daughter, Miss Rose, was old enough to wear a pair of very handsome earrings, which she proposed to send as a token of her affection. The good lady also desired to be informed whether Mr. Bradwardine took as much Scotch dry as he did when he was at Waverley-Honour about thirty years ago.

Those letters, as might have been expected, highly excited Waverley's indignation. From the desultory way in which he had heard of the opinion to place in opposition to the movements of the papers which he felt at his father's supposed errors. Of the real cause of his discourse, Edward was totally ignorant; nor had his habits at all led him to investigate the politics of the period in which he lived, or remark the intrinsics in which his father had been so actively engaged. Indeed, any impressions which his father's name left on him were connected to the bold and decisive activity of an intellect which was sharpened by the habit of acting on a precise and regular system, as well as by extensive knowledge of the world.

When Edward found his friend, the latter had edt in his hand the newspaper which he had procured, and advanced to meet him with the unanswerable argument which his friend had understood in your letters. Captain Waverley, confirm the unplesing information which I find in this paper?

He put the paper into his hand, where his father's dis- course had taken place, and hesitated before he transferred it to his friend. He had been educated in the Nottingham of nature rather unfavourable to the existing government, and even in the present state of the times, where the resentful feeling of the relations who had the best title to dictate his conduct; and not perhaps the less willingly, when he remembered the tedium of his quarters, and the inferior figure which he had made among the officers of his regiment. If he could have had any doubt upon the subject, it would have been decided by the following letter from his commanding officer, on which, as it is very short, shall be inserted verbatim:

"Sir,

"Having carried somewhat beyond the line of my duty last night, and which some events of nature, and much more those of Christianity, direct towards errors which may arise from youth and inexperience, and that altogether without effect, I am reluctantly compelled to reprimand you under the only means remaining which is in my power. You are, therefore, hereby commanded to repair to the head-quarters of the regiment, within three days after the receipt of this letter. If you shall fail to do so, I must request you to the War-Office as absent without leave, and also take other steps, which will be disagreeable to you, as well as to me."

Edward's blood boiled within him as he read this letter. He had been accustomed, from his very incency, to possess, in a great measure, the disposal of his own time, and thus acquired habits which ren-vered the rules of military discipline as unleashing to him in this as they were in some other respects. An idea that in his own case they would not be enforced in a very rigid manner, had also obtained full possession of his mind, and the corresponding sense of the peremptory conduct of his lieutenant-colonel. Neither had any thing occurred, to his knowledge, that should have induced his commanding officer with any step to such a course. Edward wrote in his discretion at the end of the fourteenth chapter, so suddenly to assume a harsh, and, as Edward deemed it, so insensible a tone of dictatorial authority. Connecting it with the letter he had just received from his father, he could not but suppose, that it was designed to make him feel, in his present situation, the same pressure of authority which had been exercised in his father's time, and that his father's connection with the Waverley family.

Without a pause, therefore, Edward wrote a few cold lines, thanking his lieutenant-colonel for per-civilities, and expressing regret that he should have chosen to efface the remembrance of them, by assuring a different tone towards him. The strain of his letter, as he spoke it specially for duty, and as it was, be his duty, in the present crisis, called upon him to lay down his commission; and he therefore enclosed a formal resignation of a situation which subjected him to so unpleasant a correspondence, and requested Colonel Gardiner would have the goodness to forward it to the proper authorities.

Having finished this magnificent epistle, he felt somewhat uncertain concerning the terms in which his resignation ought to be expressed, upon which subject he resolved to consult Fergus Mac-Ivor. It may be observed in passing, that the bold and prompt acts of his youth, and his insouciant manner in distinguished this young Chieftain, had given him considerable ascendency over the mind of Waverley. Accumulated with at least equal powers of understand-to his known and established character, should have proceeded in so harsh and unusual a manner, was a mystery which command, could it be, use. He hoped our hero, however, to the best of his power, and began to turn his thoughts on revenge for his insulted honour.

Fergus paused; "It is an act of friendship which you should command, could it be use. He hoped to the righting your honour; but in the present case, I doubt if your commanding officer would give you the meeting on account of his having taken measures, which, like Fergus's, powerful, still, were still within the strict bounds of his duty. Besides, Gardiner is a precise Huguenot, and has adopted certain ideas about the sinfulness of such romances, from which it would be impossible to make him depart, especially as his courage is beyond all suspicion. And besides, I—, to say the truth—I dare not at this moment, for some very weighty reasons, go near any of the military quarters or garrisons belonging to this government.

"If am I," said Waverley, "to sit down quiet and contented under the injury I have received?"

"That will I never advise my friend," replied Mac-Ivor, "if I am not the only one to fall on the head, not on the hand; on the tyrannical and oppressive government which designed and directed these premeditated and reiterated insults, not on the two hundred men that agitated in the execution of the injuries they aimed at you."

"On the government! said Waverley.

"Yes," replied the impetuous Highlander, "on the usurpers! You have seen the times that I have spent in the last half-century, without seeing in the white bread of the great field of law!"

"But since the time of my grandfather, two generations of the dynasty have possessed the throne, said Edward, gloomily.

"True," replied the Chieftain; "and because we have passively given them such means of showing their native character, because both you and I myself have lived in quiet submission, have even trucked to the times so far as to accept commissions under them, and thus have given them an opportunity of disgracing us publicly by assuming them, are we not on that account to resent injuries which our fathers only apprehended, but which we have actually sustained? Or is the cause of the unfortunate Scottish people more long to increase their just indignation than is devolved upon an heir who is innocent of the charges of misgovernment brought against his father?—Do you remember the lines of your favourite poet?

Had Richard unconstrained resign'd the throne
A kingly grace can give no more to his own;
Yet Edward, had Richard resign'd the crown
You see, my dear Waverley, I can quote poetry as well as Flora and you. But come, clear your moody brow, and trust to me to show you on honourable road to a speedy and glorious revenge. Let us seek Flora, who perhaps has more news to tell us of what has occurred during our absence. She will rejoice to learn that you are relieved of your servitude. But first add a postscript to your letter, marking the time when you shall have joined your companions, express your regret that the hastiness of his proceedings prevented your anticipating them by sending your resignation. Then let him blush for his injustice.

Chapter XXVI.

An Explanation.

This hint which the Chieftain had thrown out respecting the marriage of Waverley to his sister, nor did he see any bar to their union, excepting the situation which Waverley's case rendered it, and his heart swelled when he considered how his own interest would be exalted in the eyes of the ex-monarch to whom he had dedicated his service, by an alliance with one of those ancient, powerful, and ardent families reposing in the stead of a steady cavalier faith, to awaken whose decayed attachment to the Stuart family was now a matter of such vital importance to the Stuart cause. Nor could Fergus perceive any obstacle to such a scheme. Waverley's attachment was evident; and as his person was handsome, and his taste apparently coincided with her own, he anticipated no opposition on the part of Flora. Indeed, between his ideas of patriarchal power and those which he had acquired in France respecting the disposal of females in marriage, any opposition from his sister, dear as it was to him, would have been the last that would have been calculated, even had the union been less eligible.

Influenced by these feelings, the Chief now led Waverley in quest of Miss Mac-Ivor, not without the hope that Miss Mac-Ivor's pertinacity to the chief might give him courage to cut short what Fergus termed the romance of the courtship. They found Flora, with her faithful attendants, Una and Cathleen, busied in preparing what appeared to be a white bridal favour. Disguising as well as he could the agitation of his mind, Waverley asked for what joyful occasion Miss Mac-Ivor made such ample preparations.

"It is for Fergus's bridal," she said, smiling.

"Indeed!," said Edward; "he has kept his secret well. I hope he will allow me to be his brides-man.

"That is not the case, office, but not yours, as Beatrice says," retorted Flora.

"And who is the fair lady, may I be permitted to ask, Miss Mac-Ivor?"

"Did not I tell you long since, that Fergus wooed no bride but honour?" answered Flora.

"And am I then incapable of being his assistant and counselor in the pursuit of honour?" said our hero, colouring deeply. "Do I rank so low in your opinion?"

"Far from it, Captain Waverley. I would to God you were of our determination! and made use of the expression which displeased you only because you are not of our quality, but stand against us as an enemy."

"That time is past, sister," said Fergus; "and you may wish Edward Waverley (no longer captain) set of being freed from the slavery to an usurer, implied in that able and ill-nominated emblem.

"Yes," said Waverley, undouing the cockade from his hat, "it is pleasing to the king who bestowed this badge upon me, to resume it in a manner which leaves me reason to regret his service."

"Thank God for that! cried the enthusiast; "and that they may be blind enough to treat every mark of honour who serves them with the same indolence, that I may have less to sigh for when the struggle approaches!"

"And now, sister," said the Chieftain, "replace his cockade with one of a more lively colour. I think it was the fashion of the Index of the to arm and send forth their knights to high achievement."

"Not," said the natural adventurer, back, or weight the Justice and the danger of the cause, Fergus. Mr. Waverley is just now too much agitated by feelings of recent emotion, for me to press any on him a resolution of consequence.

the knight unworthy of her encouragement and favour," said he, somewhat bitterly.

Not so, Mr. Waverley," she replied, with great sweet firmness. "Why should I reject my brother's valued friend a boon which I am distributing to his whole clan? Most willingly would I enlist every man of honour in the cause to which my brother has devoted himself for the public weal. It is an enterprise of his measure and his eyes open. His life has been devoted to this cause from his cradle; with him its call is sacred, were it even a summons to the tomb. But how can I wish you, Mr. Waverley, new to the world, so far from home, to court every friend who might advise and ought to influence you,—in a moment too sudden piqued and indignation,—how can I wish you to plunge yourself at once in the dross of the world's mote, with all its evil eye, with all its wicked girl that has thus blunted your spirit?—Never mind her, dear Edward; the wisest of your sex are fools in what regards the business of women.

"Indeed, my good friend," answered Waverley, "all that I can charge against your sister is, that she is too sensible, too reasonable."

If that be all, I ensure you for a louis d'or against the mood lasting four-and-twenty hours. No man was ever steadier sensible for that period; and I will engage, if that will please you, Flora shall be unreasonable to-morrow as any of her sex. You must leave your sister to Edward, to "en muscovitaise." So saying, he seized Waverley's arm, and dragged him off to review his military preparations.

CHAPTER XXVII.

UPON THE SAME SUBJECT.

Fergus Mac-Ivor had too much tact and delicacy to renew the subject which he had interrupted. His mood was, or appeared to be, so full of gun-barrels, mousquet words, and tartan hope, that Waverley could not for some time draw his attention to any other topic.

"Are you to take the field so soon, Fergus," he asked, "that you are making all these martial preparations?"

"When we have settled that you go with me, you shall know all; but otherwise, the knowledge might rather be prejudicial to you."

"But are you serious in your purpose, with all inferior forces, to rise against an established government? It is mere fancy.

"Laissez les autres se consacrer a la gloire de Dieu et de leur pays, mon cher Antoine—I shall take good care of myself. We shall at least use the compliment of Conam, who never got a stroke but he gave one. I would not, however, continued the Chevalier, if you think me mad enough to stir up a favourable opportunity: I will not slip my dog below the game's afoot. But, once more, will you join with us, and you shall know all?"

"How can I?" said Waverley. "I, who have lately held that commission which is now passing back to those that gave it? My accepting it implied a promise of fidelity, and an acknowledgment of the locality of the government."

"A rash promise," answered Fergus, "is not a steed's handcuff; it may be shaken off, especially when it was given under duress, and has been repudiated by the result."

"But my heart is as true to you, Fergus," said he, with emotion. "I have not been the excuse. Captain Waverley's character is so open—is, in short, of that nature, that it cannot be misconstrued, either in its strength or its weaknesses.

"And for that weakness you despise me?" said Edward.

"Forgive me, Mr. Waverley—and remember it is but within this half hour that there existed between us a situation impossible to me to grapple with, a situation, in which I never could think of an officer in the service of the Elector of Hanover in any other light than as a casual acquaintance. Permit me then to arrange my days upon no unexpected a topic and in less than an hour I will be ready to give you such reasons for the resolution I shall express, as may be satisfactory at least, if not pleasing to you." So saying, Flora withdrew, leaving the captain in his measure to his own devices.
more gravely, "or are we in the land of romance and fiction?"

"My earnest, undoubtedly. How could you suppose me jesting on such a subject?"

"I am very glad to hear it; and so highly do I think of Flora, that you are the only man in England for whom I would say so much. — But before you shake my hand so warmly, there is more to be considered.

"Your own family — will they approve your connecting yourself with the sister of a high-born Highland laird?"

"Or uncle's situation," said Waverley, "his general opinions, and his uniform indulgence, entitle me to say, that birth and personal qualities are all he would look to in such a connexion. And where can I find both united in such excellence as in your sister?"

"O nowhere! ceda va sans dire," replied Fergus with a smile. "But your father will expect a father's prerogative in being consulted.

"Surely; but his late breach with the ruling powers removes all apprehension of objection on his part, especially as I am convinced that my uncle will be warm in my cause."

"Religion, my dear," said Fergus, "may make obstacles, though we are not bigoted Catholics."

"My grandmother was of the Church of Rome, and her religion was never objected to by my family. — Do not, my dear friends, let your prejudices affect you rather have your influence where it may be more necessary to remove obstacles — I mean with your lovely sister."

"My lovely sister," replied Fergus, "like her loving brother, is very apt to have a pretty decided will of her own, by which, in this case, you must be ruled; but you shall not want my interest, nor my counsel. And in that case, I will give you one hint — Loyalty is her ruling passion; and since she could spell an English book, she has been in love with the memory of the gallant Captain Wogan, who renounced the Stuart cause for the Protestant."

"Well, sir, said Waverley, "further into the story of Charles II., Marched a handful of cavalry from London to the Highlands to join Middleton, then in arms for the king, and at length died gloriously in the royal cause. Ask her to show you some verses she made on his history and fate; they have been much admired, I assure you. The next point is — I think I saw Flora go up towards the waterfall a short time since; fol-low, Fergus, and show her the garden time to strengthen its purposes of resistance — Alert to la muraille! Seek Flora out, and learn her decision as soon as you can, and Cupid go with you, while I ask you a question that you have not considered.

Waverley ascended the glen with an anxious and throbbing heart. Love, with all its romantic train of hopes, fears, and wishes, was mingled with other feelings. He consulted with no delusion, but he became involuntarily the confidant at least, if not the accomplice, of plans, dark, deep, and dangerous, which must either obscure the path of the government or be so lately served, or the destruction of all who had participated in them. Should Flora even listen to his suit favourably, what prospect was there of its being brought to a happy termination, amid the tumult of an impending insurrection? How could he make the selfish request that she should leave Fergus, to whom she was so much attached, and, retiring with him to England, wait, as a distant spectator, the betrothal of two sisters, or the ruin of all his hopes and fortune? — On, on the other hand, to engage himself, with no other aid than his single arm, in the dangerous and precipitate counsels of his brother. He writhed along by him, the partaker of all his desperate and indescribable motions, renouncing almost the power of judging, or deciding upon the correctness or prudence of his actions — this was no pleasing prospect for the secret pride of Waverley to stoop to. And yet what other conclusion remained, saving the rejection of his addresses by Flora, an alternative not to be thought of in the present height of her distemper, a state of health short of mortal agony. Pondering the dreadful and dangerous prospect before him, he at length arrived near the cascade, where, as Fergus had supposed, he found Flora seated.

She was quite alone, and as soon as she observed his approach, she rose, and came to meet him. Edward attempted to say something within the verge of ordinary exhibition and confidence, but found himself unequal to the task. Flora seemed at first equally embarrassed, but recovered herself more speedily, and (an unfavourable augury for Waverley's suit) was the first to enter upon it. But better of their last interview.

"It is too important, in every point of view, Mr. Waverley, to permit me to leave you in doubt on my sentiments.

"Do not speak them, scarcely," said Waverley, much affected, "unless they are such as I fear, from your manner, I must not dare to anticipate. Let time — let my future conduct — let your brother's influence —

"Forgive me, Mr. Waverley," said Flora, her complexion a little heightened, but her voice firm and composed. "I should incur my own heavy censure, were I to express my sincere conviction that I can never regard you otherwise than as a valued friend. I should do you the highest injustice did I conceal my sentiments for a moment — I see I distress you, Mr. Waverley. I believe for it, too; and, O, better a thousand times, Mr. Waverley, that you should feel a present momentary disappointment, than the long and heart-sickening grief which awaits a rival who is attached to his fortune!"

"Good God! exclaimed Waverley, "why should you anticipate such consequences from a union, where birth is equal, where fortune is favourable, and where, if you except the Duke of Argyll, there is no family more particular, where you allege no preference for another, where you even express a favourable opinion of him whom you reject?"

"Mr. Waverley, I here that favourable opinion, answered Flora; and so strongly, that though I would rather have been silent on the grounds of my resolution, you shall command them, if you exact such a sacrifice of my own feelings, and a possibility of a broken marriage!"

She sat down upon a fragment of rock, and Waverley, placing himself near her, anxiously pressed for the explanation she offered.

"I dare not tell you the situation of my feelings, they are so different from those usually ascribed to young women at my period of life; and I dare hardly touch upon what I conceive to be the real nature of my affection. He could not love me, but remember how much this morning had changed his fate, and into what a complication of perplexity it was likely to plunge him. Sun-rise had seen him possessed of an esteemed rank in the honourable profession of arms, his father to all appearance rapidly rising in the favour of his sovereign; — all this had passed away like a dream — he himself was dishonoured, his father disgraced, and he had become involuntarily the confidant at least, if not the accomplice, of plans, dark, deep, and dangerous, which must either subversion of the government he had so lately served, or the destruction of all who had participated in them. be more in unison, and because his more blunted sensibility would not require the return of enthusiasm which had been the basis of his happiness. But Mr. Waverley, would for ever refer to the idea of domestic happiness which your imagination is capable of painting, and whatever fell short of that ideal representation, laced and interrupted by indecision, while you might consider the enthusiasm with which I regarded the success of the royal family, as defrauding your affection of its due return.

"And Miss Mac-Ivor, you cannot love me?" said her suitor dejectedly.

"I could esteem you, Mr. Waverley, as much, perhaps, more than any man I have ever seen; but I cannot accept your suit. ought to be not, for your own sake, desire so hazardous an experiment! The woman whom you marry, ought to have affections and opinions moulded upon yours. Her studies ought to agree with her feelings, her hopes, her fears, should all mingle with yours. She should enhance your pleasures, share your sorrows, and cheer your melancholy."

"And why will not you, Miss Mac-Ivor, who can so well describe a happy union, will not you judge for yourself the person you describe?"

"Is it possible you do not yet comprehend me?" answered Flora. "Have I not told you, that every known obstacle to my marriage was, in fact, unconsciously to my own advantage and to yours? But you, Mr. Waverley, are not my mistress designed to keep her apart in that evening, went himself in quest of her; but apparently his remonstrances were in vain, for he returned with a heightened complexion and a look of mingled anger and symptoms of displeasure. The rest of the evening passed on without any allusion, on the part either of Flora or Waverley, to the subject which engaged the reflections of the latter, and perhaps, both of them.

When retired to his own apartment, Edward endeavoured to sum up the business of the day. That the pulse he had received from Flora, would be persisted in for the present, there was no doubt; and if he could hope for ultimate success in case circumstances permitted the renewal of his suit? Would the enthusiastic loyalty, which this animating prompting left, not at least in its engrossing force, the success or the failure of the present political machinations? And if so, could he hope that the interest which she had acknowledged him to possess in her favour, might be improved into a warmer attachment? He taxed his memory to recall every word she had used, with the appropriate looks and gestures which had enforced them, and ended by finding himself in the same state of uncertainty. It was very late before sleep brought relief to the tumult of his mind, after the most painful and agitating day which he had ever passed.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

A LETTER FROM TULLY-VEOLAN.

In the morning, when Waverley's troubled reflections had for some time given way to repose, there came music to his dreams, but not the voice of Selina. He imagined himself transported back to Tully-VEOLAN, and that he heard Dave Gellatley singing in the court those matins which used generally to be the first sounds that disturbed his repose while a guest of the Baron of Bradwardine. The notes which suggested this vision continued, and waxed louder, until Edward awoke in earnest. The illusion, however, did not seem entirely dispelled. The apartment was protracted from that of Ian nan Chaimbeul, but it was still the voice of Dave Gellatley that made the following lines resound under the window:

My heart's in the Highlands, my heart is not here,
My heart's in the Highlands a-roaming the deer;
A-clasping the wild deer, and following the roe.
My heart's in the Highlands wherever I go.

Curious to know what could have determined Mr. Gellatley on an excursion of such unbidden extent, Edward was about to dress himself in all haste, during which operation the minstrelsy of Dave changed its tune more than once:

There's sought in the Highlands but syces and looks,
And long-leggit cattle gang wanting the braes.
* These lines form the burden of an old song, to which some versed additional verses.
WAVERLEY.

3 Chap. XXVIII.

Waverley

Wanting the breaks, and without base and shows.

But well how, when he comes home.

Waverley was dressed and had issued forth, David had associated himself with two or three of the numerous Highlanders who always graced the steets of the castle with their presence, and was appearing one fine morning in the double order and form of a Scotch fourr neale, to the music of his own whistling. In this double capacity of dancer and musician, he continued, until an idle pipe-player, observing his zeal, and the unanimous call of Still stand, (i.e. blow up,) and relieved him from the latter part of his trouble. Young and old then mingled in the dance as they could find partners. The opinion of Waverley did not interrupt David's call, though he contrived to get in no small portion, and throwing one or two inclinations of the body into the stances with which he performed the Highland fling, this was a symptom of recognition. Then, while busily employed in setting, whooping on all the while, and snapping his fingers over his head, on a sudden prolonged his side-step until it brought him into the dance, then rose, and continued his satisfaction without pause or intermission.

"I fear I am using an improper freedom by intruding upon you, yet I cannot trust to any one else to let you know some things which have happened here, which seems necessary you should be acquainted. Forgive me, if I am wrong in what I am doing; for, alas! Mr. Waverley, I have no better advice than that of my own feelings;—my dear father is gone from this place, and where he can return to my assistance and protection, God alone knows. You have probably heard, that in consequence of some troublesome news from the Highlands, warrants were sent out for apprehending several gentlemen, and, among others, my dear father. In spite of all my tears and entreaties that he would surrender himself to the government, he joined with Mr. Fal- coner, and is supposed to have gone northwards, with a body of about forty horsemen. So I am not so anxious concerning his immediate safety, as about what may follow afterwards, for that he is in no danger to you, Mr. Waverley, only I thought you would be glad to learn that my father has escaped, in case you happen to have heard that he was in danger.

The day after my father went off, there came a party of soldiers to Tully-Veolan, and behaved very rudely to Bains Macwhistle; but the officer was very civil to me, only said his duty obliged him to search for arms and paper. My father had provided against this by taking away all the arms except the old useless things which hung in the hall, and he had put all his papers away.

But O! Mr. Waverley, how shall I tell you, the great distress in which you found yourself when you asked, and when you had been at Tully-Veolan, and where you now were. The officer is gone back with his party; but a non-commissioned officer and four men remain as a sort of garrison in the house. They have hinted they behaved very well, as we are for- bidden to keep them in good humour. But these soldiers have no fear of your falling into their hands you would be in great danger. Do so kind a service to write what wicked falsehoods they said, for I am sure they are falsehoods; but you will best judge what you have to do. The officer that returned carried off your servant priser, with his horse, and horses, all the horses, in everything that you left at Tully-Veolan. I hope God will protect you, and that you will get safe home to England, where you used to tell me there was no military danger, but you are mistaken, but everything was done according to an equal law that protected all who were harmless and innocent. I hope you will exert your indulgence as my kind friend to the young ladies, to whom, if it seems to me, though perhaps erroneous, that Captain Waverley's honour are concerned. I am sure—at least I think, my father would approve of my writing, for, Mr. Ra- phaell is fled to the country at this time, out of danger of being taken as a soldier and the Waverley and Bains Macwhistle does not like to meddle (he says) in oth- er men's concerns, though I hope what may serve my father's friend at such a time as this, cannot be termed improper manners. Indeed, Mr. Waverley, I shall probably never see you more, for I would be very improper to wish you to call at Tully-Veolan. But, even now, even if these men were gone, but I will al- ways remember with gratitude your kindness in visiting so poor a scholar as myself, and your atten- tions to my dear, dear father.

"I remain your obedient servant,

ROBERT CRAWFORD,

P. S.—I hope you will send me a line by David Gellatley, just to say you have received this, and that you will take care of yourself; and forgive me if I again trouble you to entertain you in your unhappy cabals, but escape, as fast possible, to your own fortunate country.—My compliments to my dear Flora, and to Glencaquoich. Is she not as handsome and accomplished as I described her?"

Thus concluded the letter of Rose Crawford, the contents of which both surprised and affected Waverley. It was strange that the Baron should fall under the suspi- cions of government, in consequence of the present stir among the partizans of the house of Stewart, seemed only the natural consequence of his political principles, and the insinuations of his employers; but how should he, himself, have been involved in such suspicions, conscious that until yester- day he had been free from harbouring a thought against the prosperity of the reigning family, seemed inexplicable. Both at Tully-Veolan and Glenca- quoich, his hosts had respected his engagements with the existing government, and though enough passed by accidental innuendo that might induce him to evince the Baron and the Chief among those disaf- fected gentlemen who were still numerous in Scot- land, yet until his own connexion with the army had been broken off by the resumption of his commission, he had no reason to believe he had ever given any immediate or hostile attempts against the present establishment. Still he was aware that unless he meant at once to embrace the prophecies of Ferguson and M'Leod of Mac-Ivor, all would be lost; for all could see in the suspicious neighbourhood without delay, and repair where his conduct might undergo a satisfactory exa-mination. Upon this he the rather determined, as Flora's advice favoured his doing so, and he felt inexplicable repugnance at the idea of being ac- cessory to the plague of civil war. Whatever were the original rights of the Stewarts, calm reflection told him, that, on the question how far James the Second could forfeit those of his posterity, he had, according to the united voice of the whole nation, forfeited his own. Since that period, every march had been to the glory over Britain, sustaining and exalting the character of the nation abroad, and its liberties at home. Reason asked, was it worth while to disturb a government so long established and established, and to plunge a kingdom into all the miseries of civil war, for the purpose of replacing upon the throne the descendants of a monarch by whom it had been wilfully forfeited? If, on the other hand, his conscience did not allow his integrity on himself, or on his Father, or on the command of his father or uncle, should recommend to him allegiance to the Stewarts, still it was for him to clear his own mind, showing that he had not, as seemed to be falsely in- sinuated, taken any step to this purpose, during his holding the commission of the excise agent.

The all-estimate sympathies of Flora's heart, and of the terror and actual dangers to which she might be exposed, made an impression upon his mind, and he instantly wrote to thank her in the kindest terms for her solicitude on his account, to express his earnest good wishes for her welfare and that of her family, and of her husband's health and safety. These feelings which this task excited were speedily lost in the necessity which he now saw of bidding farewell to Flora Mac-Ivor, perhaps for ever. At one point, attended by the prolonged elevation of character, her self-devotion to the cause which she had embraced, united to her scrupulous restraint as to the means of serving it, had divided the attention of the eligible young lady between his affections and her passions. But time pressed, calumny was busy with his fame, and every hour's delay increased the power to injure it. His departure must be instant.

With this determination he sought out Ferguson, and communicated to him the contents of Rose's latter, with his own resolution instantly to go to Edinburgh, and put into the hands of some one or other of these persons of influence to whom he had letters from his father, his exclamation from any charge which might be preferred against him.

"You run your head into the lion's mouth," answered Mac-Ivor. "You do not know the severity of a government harassed by such apprehensions, and a consciousness of their own illegality and insecurity. I shall have to deliver you from some dungeon in Strangeways or Newgate or raise your fine."

"My innocence, my rank, my father's intimacy with Lord M. General G. &c., will be a sufficient protection," said Waverley. "I shall find the contrary," replied the Chief; "these gentlemen will have enough to do about their own matters. Once more, will you take the plaid, and stay a little while with us among the mists and the moorlands, in the bravest cause ever sword was drawn in?"

"For many reasons, my dear Ferguson, you must hold me excused," said Mac-Ivor. "I shall certainly find you exerting your poetic talents in elegies upon a prison, or your antiquarian researches in depicting the Ogmios character, or some Punic hieroglyphic upon the key-stones of a vault, curiously arched. Or what say you to un petit pendement bien joli against which awkward ceremony I don't warrant you should you meet a body of the armed west-country Whigs."

"And why should they use me so?" said Waverley.

"For a hundred good reasons," answered Ferguson. "First, you are an Englishman; secondly, a gentle- man; thirdly, you are an officer. By the influence of friendship, they may be induced to treat you, let, like the Celts and Mandanes of yore, they should resume the humour of sending their lovers into banishment. Distance, in truth, produces in idea the greatest respect as in reality the least. Others are softened, and rounded, and rendered doubly grateful; the harrier and more ordinary point of character are mollified down, and those by which it is remembered are the more striking outlines that mark sublimity, grace, or beauty. There are mists too in the mental, as well as the natural horizon, to conceal what is less pleasing in distant objects, and there as happy lights, to illumine in full glory upon those points which can profit by brilliant illumination.

Waverley forest Flora Mac-Ivor's prejudices in her heart by the magnanimity of his intercourse towards his affection, when he recollected the grand and decisive object which seemed to fill her whole soul. She, whose sense of duty so wholly engrossed her in the cause of a benefactor, what would be her feelings in favour of the happy individual who should be so fortunate as to awaken them? Then came the doubtful question, whether he might not be that happy man. His mind, which was in the affirmative, by conjuring up all she had said in his praise, with the addition of a com- ment much more flattering than the text warranted, discovered the name she so longed to hear.

The Ogmios is a species of the old Irish charmed. The idea of the contest between the Ogmios and Punic, founded on a scene in Plutarch, was not started till General Valenciennes set up his theory, long after the date of Flora Mac-Ivor.
every-day world, was melted away and obliterated in those dreams of imagination, which only remembered with advantage the points of grace and dignity that distinguished Flora from the generality of her sex, not the particulars which she held in common with them. Edward, was, in short, in the fair way of catching a Highland beauty; and he submitted habitually to get his orders for dinner, and to disturb the reveries of our hero. But observing him rouse himself at the sight of the village, Callum pressed closer to his side, and hoped when they came to the public house his host was not saying nothing about Vich Ian Vohr, for the people were better Whigs, dear bust tem.'

Waverley assured the prudent page that he would be careful how he now distinguished him, both in the ring of the bells, but the tinkling of something like a hammer against the side of an old mossy, green, inverted pony-pot, that hung in an open booth, of the other. He was at pains to get to the east end of a building resembling an old barn, he asked Callum Beg if it were Sunday.

Could na say just precisely—Sunday seldom came by hilly crofts, but Mr. Ebenoezer Cruickshanks from his window that overlooked the dark and narrow court in which Callum Beg rode down the horses after their journey, Waverley heard the following foot-page of Vich Ian Vohr and his landlord:

"Ye'll be fare the north, young man?" began the latter.

"And ye may say that," answered Callum.

"And ye'll have ridden a lang way the day, it may weel be?"

"Sae lang, that I could weel tak a dram." Waverley heard the noise of the gill stow at his back.

Here some compliments passed fitting the occasion, when my host of the Golden Candlestick, hearing, as he thought, opened his guest's heart by this hospitable acquaintance, made the following:

"Ye'll na hae mickle whisky than that abou the Pass?"

"I am nae fare abou the Pass." He seems to be tongue.

"Na; I am but just Aberdeen-a-way."

"And did your master come fare Abileen wi you?"

"Ay—a is it I've left it myself," answered the good and imperturbable Callum Beg.

"And what kind of a gentleman is he?"

"I believe he is an o' King George's state officers, at least he's aye for ganging on the south, and he has a bantle siller, and never grudges any thing till a poor body, or in the way of a lawin."

"He wants a guide and a horse fare to Edinburgh?"

"Aye, and ye mean find it him with." Waverley heard the noise of the gill stow at his back.

"Aheem! It will be chargeable."

"He cares na for that a boule.

"Aweel, Duncan—did ye say your name was Dun can, or Donald?"

"Na, man—Jamie—Jamie Steenson—I tell ye before."

This last untrained parry altogether foil'd Mr. Cruickshanks, who, though not quite satisfied with the reserve of the master, or the extreme readiness of the man, was contented to lay a tax on the reckoning and horse hire, that might compound for his unsatisfied curiosity. The circumstance of its being the fast day was not forgotten in the charge, which, on the whole, did not, however, amount to much more than double what in fairness it should have been.

Callum Beg soon appeared in person the ratification of this treaty, adding, "Ta ual decwel was cangin to ride wi ta Dunhe-wassed hersel."

"That will not be pleasant, Callum, nor altogether safe, for our host aensome a person of great curiosity; but a travaller must submit to these inconveniences. Meanwhile, my good lad, here is a trifle for you to part with, Vich Ian Vohr." The hawk's eye of Callum flashed delight upon a golden guinea, with which these last words were accompanied. He hastened, not without a curse on the intracacies of his breeches pocket, or splinter, as it called it, to deposit the treasure in his pocket and then, as if he conceived the benevolence called for some requital on his part, he gathered close up to Edward, with an expression of the most confiding knowlin, and spoke in a under voice, "Wiel"...
WAVERLEY.

And thus, brave yeast of the touch!
Repeat not; if our eyes decay, Above those honours and as you, as
The beauteous of a milder sky.

These owe their birth to genial May;
But bow, wherever sun they pass
Before the winter storm decay—
Can their worth be type of thine?

No, no; no type of Poesy among thine:
Still higher swell'd thy dauntless heart,
And as the diastole the sense rehearse Commenced thy brief but brilliant part.

Twas then thou sought'st on Albion's hill,
(Here England's sons the strife resound)
A rugged rose resisting still,
And unshod though unfriended.

They bade thee in the mosses hearst, with No holy knell thy requiem run;
The vamps were the placid wave,
They dree the crimson florid flame.

Yet wise, in Fortune's summer-alms
To waste life's longest term away
Would change that glorious dawn of thine,
Though darkest not its moonshine day?

Be these the Pearl whose dearest house
Was summer's delight and winter's gloom
Some bond with oak her patrons draw,
An ash and shadows Wogan's tomb.

Whatever might be the real merit of Flora Mac
Ivor's poetry, the enthusiasm which it intimated was well calculated to make a corresponding impression upon her lover. The lines were read—read again—

At his side, in Wogan's bosom—then as Drawn out and read line by line in Prolonged the mental treat, as an epic prose

By stopping slowly, the enjoyment of The essence of Mrs. Cruickshank's prose, the

At length the tall ungainly figure and ungraceful Visage of Rhenus presented themselves. The upper Part of his form, notwithstanding the season required
No such defense, was shrouded in a large great-coat, Belved over his body habiliments, decorated with a Huge cowl of the same stuff, which, when drawn Over the head and hat, completely overshadowed both,
And buttoned beneath the chin, was called
A tref-ranzer. His face was large and beckoning, Stained with brass mountainous. His the Legs tenanted a pair of camisoles, fastened at The sides with rusty clasps. Thus accounted for,
He walked into the midst of the apartment and Exclaimed in brief phrase:—Yet horses are ready.

"You go with me yourself then, landlord?"

"I do, as at Perth; where ye may be supplied With a guide to Embro, as your occasions shall require."

Thus saying, he placed under Waverley's eye the bill which was The same time, self-invested, filled a glass of wine, and directed me to a blessing on their journey. Waverley, stood at The man's impudence, but, as their connection was Not to be short, and promised to be convenient, he made no Observation on it; and, having paid him his reckoning, Expressed his intention to depart immediately. He Mounted Dermoel accordingly, and sallied forth
With the Golden Candlestick, followed by the puny
Figure we have described, after he had, at the expense Of some time and difficulty, and by the assistance of A "lamp-on-stump," or structure of masonry Erected for the purpose of throwing a convenient light in front of The house, elevated his person to the back of a long-backed,
Raw-boned, thin-cutted phantom of a broken-down
Blood-horse, on which Waverley's portmanteau

Optimal humour, could hardly help laughing at the appearance
Of his new steed, and at the astonishment Which his person and equipage would have excited at

Edward's tendency to mirth did not escape

Host of the Candlestick, who, conscious of the case, Unfolded a double portion of sorrow into the Plangent usual grief. The Name, which antedated Internally that, in one way or other, the young Englischer should pay dearly for the contumacy with which he Seemed to record him. Callum also stood at the gate, and enjoyed, with undissembled glee, the ridiculous figure of Mr. Cruckshanks. As Waverley passed his horse's head, and, grasping its stirrup, bade him "Take heed the said White Doe civilly played him one cuntin.'

Waverley once more thanked, and bade him farewell, and then proceed onward, not sorry to be rid of him. He had heard of the above-mentioned stories as they old Ebenezer rise and sink in his stirrups, to avoid the exactions occasioned by a hard trot upon a half-paved street. The village of— was some miles behind him.

CHAPTER XXX.

SHOWS THAT THE LOSS OF A HORSE'S SHOE MAY BE A SERIOUS INCUMBERANCE.

The manner and air of Waverley, but, above all, the glittering contents of his purse, and the indolence with which he seemed to regard them, somewhat overawed his companion, and deterred him from making any attempt to enter upon conversation. Hence his reflections were more or less regulated by various emotions, and by plans of self-interest, with which these were intimately connected. The travellers journeied, therefore, in silence, until it was interrupted by the singular appearance on the part of the gentleman. For long having had a forefootshoe, which, doubtless, his honour would consider it his part to replace.

"Indisputably," answered Mr. Cruckshanks; "tho' there was no precise clause to that effect, it can be expected that I am paid for the casualties while my horse is the pair male while in your honour's service."—Nathan's.

"O, you mean I am to pay the farrier; but where shall we find one?"

The horses in distress there would be no objection made on the part of his temporary master, Mr. Cruckshanks assured him that Cairnveeken, a village which they were about to enter, was happy in an excellent blacksmith; but as he was a professor, he would drive a nail for no man on the Sabbath, or kirk-fast, unless it were in a case of absolute necessity, for which he always charged sixpence each nail.

The most important part of this communication, which was not so much a request as a question, had a slight impression on the hearer, who only internally wondered what college this veterinary professor belonged to; not aware that the word was used to denote any person or building devoted to uncommon sanctity and manner.

As they entered the village of Cairnveeken, they speedily distinguished the smith's house. Being a public, it was two stories high, and proudly reared its crest, covered with slate sky, above the thatched roofs by which it was surrounded. The adjoining smithy bequeathed none of the Sabbatical silence and repose which Ebenezer had augured from the sanctity of his friend. On the contrary, hammer crashed and anvil rang, the bellows groaned, and the whole apparatus of Villan appeared to be in full activity. After a short time, there appeared from the door of the master smith, benedict, as his sign intimated, John Muckleware, with two assistants, toiled busily in swarms, repining, and furbishing old muskets, pistols, and swords, which lay scattered around his work-shop in military confusion. The open shed, containing the forge, was crowded with persons who came and went as if receiving and communicating messages from the vicinity. It was a scene fitted to please all those people who traversed the street in haste, or stood grouped in groups, with eyes elevated, and hands uplifted, announced that the house was extraordinary; for it is not every day that one met with a public shop of the manufacture of Cairnveeken.

"There is some news," said one of the Candlestick push; his fellow-eyed, visaged, and bare-boned mug readily forward into the crowd; "there is some news; and if it, please my Creator, I will forthwith obtain sparrings thereof.

Waverley, with better regulated curiosity than his attendant, dismounted, and gave his horse to a boy who stood idle near. It arose, perhaps from the shyness of his character in early youth, that he felt dislike at applying to a stranger even for casual information, without previously by his physiognomy and appearance. While he looked about in order to select the person with whom he would most willingly hold that communication, the buzz around saved him in some degree the trouble of uncertain guess. The names of Lochin, Claymore, Glenarry, and other distinguished Highland Chiefs, amongst whom Vich Ian Vonh was frequently mentioned, were as familiar in men's mouths as they were household words. The alarm generally expressed, he easily conceived that their descent into the Lowlands, at the head of their troops, even if already taken place, or was instantly apprehended.

For Waverley could ask particulars, a strong, brawny, hard-featured woman, about forty, dressed in the manner of her country, her clothes being flame on with a pitchfork, her cheeks flushed with scarlet, where they were not painted with boot and lambblack, posted through the crowd, and, brandishing high a child of two years old, which she carried in her arms, without regard to mankind, and with some spirit of terror in her eyes, she might.

"Charlie is my darling, my darling, my darling."

"Lottie and Jenny's coming."

"A' the wild Maccara's coming."

The Vulcans of Cairnveeken, who acknowledged his Venus in this exciting placet Boscace, regarded her with a grin and a horrid leer, as if she were the prisoner of some of the senators of the village hastened to intercept. Whist! gudewife; is this a time, or is this a day, to be talking your ranting fule sana in the daytime when the wine of wrath is poured out without mixture in the cup of indignation, and a day when the land should give testimony against poyery, and treachery, and superstitious, and independency, and subversion, and fanaticism, and antimonianism, and a' the errors of the church!"

And that's a' your Whiggery," re-echoed the Jacobite heroine; "that's a' your Whiggery, and your prosperity."

"That's a' your Whiggery," replied the same woman. "We d'ye think the lad wi' the kilt wi' care for yer sylvans and yer prebyterians, and yer buttock-mail, and yer stood o' repentance? Vengeance on the black face o' mine! It's a short character upon it than streaks doon beside ony Whig in the country, I myself."

Here John Muckleware, who dreaded her entering upon a detail of personal experience, interrupted his matrimonial authority. "Gae hame, and be d,—(that I should say sac) and put on the sowens for supper."

"And you, ye doil'd dotar," replied his gentle handmaiden, her wrath, which had hitherto wandered abroad over the whole assembly, being at once and violently impelled into its natural channel, ye stood and walked. "Come, there hammer-throwing dovecocks for foles that will never snap them at a Highlander, instead of earning broad for your family, and showing this wisome young gentleman's horse that's just come frae the north! I warrant him none of your whiggery King George folk, but a gallant Gordon, at the least o' him."

The eyes of the assembly were now turned upon Waverley, who, with the opportunity, as the smith gave him his order, to glance his sides, observed the whole in all speed, as he wished to proceed on his journey; for he had heard enough to make him sensible that there would be danger in delaying any longer. The next he eyes, instead of on him with a look of displeasure and suspicion, not lessened by the consciousness with which his wife enforced Waverley's mandate. "D'ye hear what the well-favoured young gentleman says, ye drunken ne'er-do-good?"
"And what may your name be, sir?" quoted Muckleworth.

"It is of no consequence to you, my friend, provided I pay your labour."

"But it may be of consequence to the state, sir," replied Waverley, "to know the strength of whose authority peat-smoke, and I doubt we may delay your journey till you have seen the Laird."

"You certainly," said Waverley, haughtily, "will find it with difficulty to detach me, unless you can produce some proper authority."

There was a pause and a whisper among the crowd—Secretary Murray; Lord Lewis Gordon; 'Maybe the Chevalier himself, Lord—'

"But it is the Chevalier himself who worship the same God, and only alms, and thereby was obviously an increased disposition to resist Waverley's departure. He attempted to argue mildly with him, but his voluntary ally, Mrs. Muckleworth, broke in upon him and denounced Waverley's actions, taking his part and asserting his innocence."

"We were the guests of the good popular, a man of strong character who daub him to the council, and his experience in the army."

"His name is dearest to me."

"O gi'ye we are dead, gudeman! And a green turf on your head, gudeman! They are my widow's, upon a renting Highlandman."

This canticle, which excited a suppressed titter among the younger part of the audience, totally overcame the patience of the taunted man of the inn. "Watch out, my friend, I'll put a mouth down your throat!" cried he, in an ecstasy of wrath, snatching a bar from the forge; and he might have executed his threat, had he not been withheld by a part of the mob, while the rest endeavoured to force the tormentant out of his presence.

Waverley meditated a retreat in the confusion, but his horse was nowhere to be seen. At length he observed a man, sitting on the one hand, to shout "Wauchope! Wauchope! Wauchope!" Waverley's horse, "Na, na! if ye are ye friend to kirk and king, and are detained as siccan a person, yo maun answer to honest men of the country for breach of contract, and I maun keep the name and the valour for dammage and expense, in respect my horse and myself will lose to-morrow's day's work, besides the afternoon preaching."

Edward, out of patience, hemmed in and harried by the rabble on every side, and every moment expecting personal violence, resolved to try measures of intimidation, and at length drew a pockett-pistol, threatened on the one hand, to shout "Kirkdale! Kirkdale! Kirkdale!" should he dare to stop him, and, on the other, menacing Ebenezer with a similar doom, if he stirred a foot with the horses. The sanguine Partly says, that one man with a pistol, is equal to a hundred unarmed, because, though he can shoot but one of the multitude, yet no one knows but that he himself may be that luckless individual. The lesser name of Cairnervant, who therefore probably have given way, nor would Ebenezer have waxen three shades more cadaverous, have ventured to dispute a mandate so enforced, had not the Vulcans, with the WILL TO DISCHARGE, thrown upon some more worthy object the force which had been reserved for Waverley, and provoked, and not ill satisfied to find such an object in Waverley, rushed at him with the red-hot bar of iron, with such determination, as made the discharge of a pistol an act of self-defence. The unfortunate

CHAPTER XXXI.

AN EXAMINATION.

Major M'tville of Cairnervant, an elderly gentleman, who had spent his youth in the military service, received Mr. Morton with great kindness, and our hero with civility, which the equivocal circumstances wherein Edward was placed rendered considerably more agreeable than his conversation might have been. The nature of the smith's hurt was inquired into, and as the actual injury was likely to prove trifling, and the circumstances in which it was received removed the infraction, on Edward's part, a natural act of self-defence. Major M'tville was apprised of the matter that was brought, on Waverley's depositing in his hands a small sum for the benefit of the wounded person. "I could wish, sir," continued the Major, "my full authority, whether I should have any farther inquiry into the cause of the Vehement.

- The Rev. John Erskine, D. D., an eminent Scot, given, and a most excellent man, headed the Evangelical party in the Church of Scotland, and who, in his time, was the leader of the Moderate party. Those persons who were adherents of the Old Grey Fries Church, Edinburgh; and, however they differed in church politics, preserved the most perfect harmony as private friends, and as clergymen serving the same cure.
your journey through the country at this unfortunate and distracted time."

Mr. Ebenzer Cruckshanks now stood forth, and resolved to continue the matter, and the next day he knew he expected, from the reserve of Waverley, and the evasions of Callum Beg. The horse upon which Edward rode, he said, he knew to belong to Vich Ian Mac-Ivor; and after a trusty review of the former attendant with the fact, lest he should have his horses and stables burnt over his head some night by that godless gang, the Mac-Ivors. He concluded by ex- pressed his own servile to kirk and state, as having been the means, under God, (as he modestly qualified the assertion,) of attacking this suspicious and formidable delinquent. He intimated hopes of future moral and physical reimbursement for loss of time, and even of character, by travelling on the state business on the fast-day.

To this Major Melville answered, with great composure directed to the magistrate, that the means with which he expected, for a purpose of religion and loyalty, he should not impute that conduct to disaffection, but only suppose that his zeal for kirk and state had been lulled asleep by the opposition of charging a minister with double horse-hire; that, however, feeling himself incompetent to decide singly upon the conduct of a person of such importance, he should reserve it for consideration of the next quarter-sessions. Not for our history for the present sake no more of him of the Candlestick, who avoided dolorous and malcontent back to his own dwelling.

Major Melville then commanded the villagers to return to their homes, excepting two, who officiated as constables, and whom he directed to wait below. The apartment was thus cleared of every person but Mr. Morton, in the meantime remaining in a sort of factor, who acted as clerk; and Waverley himself. There ensued a painful and embarrassed pause, till Major Melville, looking upon Waverley with much compassion, and after consulting a paper or memorandum which he held in his hand, requested to know his name,—"Edward Waverley."

"I thought so; late of the —— dragons, and nephew of Sir Everard Waverley of Waverley-Ho—nour?"

"The same."

Young gentleman, I am extremely sorry that this painful charge is laid upon you. I am, as far as in me lies, willing to vindicate the character which I enjoy. I request to know that this charge is laid upon you, and upon what authority I am forcibly detained to reply to it?"

"Duty, Major Melville, renders apologies superfluous."

"True, sir; permit me, therefore, to ask you how you have obtained the means of ex-leave of absence from your regiment, several weeks ago, until the present moment?"

"My reply," said Waverley, "is to so general a question must be guided by the nature of the charge which venders it necessary. I request to know what this charge is, and upon what authority I am forcibly detained to reply to it?"

"The charge, Mr. Waverley, I grieve to say, is of a very high nature, and affects your character both as a soldier and a subject. In the former capacity, you are charged with spreading mutiny and rebellion among the men you commanded, and setting them the example of desertion, by prolonging your own absence from the regiment, contrary to the express orders of your commanding officer. The civil crime of which you stand accused is that of high treason, and levying war against the king, the highest delinquency of which a subject can be guilty."

"And by what authority am I detained to reply to such a monstrous charge?"

"By one which you must not dispute, nor I dis-obey."

"He handed to Waverley a warrant from the Superintendant of Blantyre in full name, superseding and securing the person of Edward Waverley, Esq., suspect of treasonable practices, and other high crimes and misdemeanours."

The astonishment which Waverley expressed at this communication was imputed by Major Melville to conscious guilt, while Mr. Morton was rather disposed to construe it to a suspicion of unjustly suspected. There was something true in both conjectures; for although Edward's mind acquitted him of the crime with which he was charged, yet a profession of innocence might have great difficulty in establishing his innocence to the satisfaction of others.

"It is a very painful part of this painful business," said Major Melville, "that under so grave a charge, I must necessarily request to see such papers as you have on your person."

"You shall see it, sir; and as it can be of no service, I beg it may be returned." He took from his bosom the lines he had that morning received, and presented them with the envelope. He then pressed his clerk to make a copy of them. He then wrapped the copy in the envelope, and placing it on the table before him, returned the original to Waverley, with an air of melancholy, as if Waverley seemed to object to general questions, his interrogatories should be as specific as his information permitted. He then proceeded in his investigation, dictating, as he went on, the import of the questions and answers to the amanuensis, by whom it was written down.

"Did Mr. Waverley know one Humphry Houghton, a non-commissioned officer in Gardiner's draughts?"

"Certainly; he was sergeant of my troop, and son of a tenant of my uncle."

"Exactly—and had a considerable share of your confidence, and an influence among his comrades?"

"I had never occasion to repose confidence in a person of his description," answered Waverley. "I favoured Sergeant Houghton as a clever, active young fellow, and I believe his fellow-soldiers respected him accordingly."

"But you used through this man," answered Major Melville, "to communicate with such of your troop as were enlisted upon Waverley, and continued, extended, then, particularly those soldiers who followed you to the regiment from your uncle's estate?"

"Surely—but what is that to the present purpose?"

"To that I am just coming, and I beseech your candid reply. Have you, since leaving the regiment, held any correspondence, direct or indirect, with this Sergeant Houghton?"

"I hold no correspondence with a man of his rank and situation!—How, or for what purpose?"

"That you are to explain;—but did you not, for example, send to him for some books?"

"You remind me of a trifling commission," said Waverley, "which I gave Sergeant Houghton,—because my servant could not read. I do recollect I bade him, by letter, select some books, of which I sent him a list, and send them to me at Tullie-Ven-ian."

"And of what description were those books?"

"They related almost entirely to elegant literature; they were designed for a particular purpose."

"Were these not, Mr. Waverley, treasonable tracts and pamphlets among them?"

"There were some political tracts among which."

"And of what description were those tracts?"
hardly looked. They had been sent to me by the officiousness of a kind friend, whose heart is more to be esteemed for its prudence or critical sagacity; they seemed to be dull compositions.

"That friend," continued the persevering inquirer, "was a Mr. Pembroke, a nonuring clerisyman, the author of several pamphlets to which the manuscript was found among your baggage?"

"But of which, I give you my honor as a gentleman," replied Waverley. "I never read six pages."

"And yet your judgment, Mr. Waverley; your examination will be transmitted elsewhere. And now to proceed—Do you know a person that passes by the name of Wily, or Will Rutherfurd?"

"I have heard of such a name, at this moment."

"Did you ever meet with such a person, or any other person, communicate with Sergeant Humphry Houghton, instigating him to desert, with as many of his comrades as he could seduce to join him, and unite with the Highlanders and other rebels lower in arms under the command of the young Pretender?"

"I dare you I am not only entirely guiltless of the plot you have laid to my charge, but I detest it from the very bottom of my soul, nor would I be guilty of such treachery to gain a throne, either for myself or any other man alive."

"When I consider this envelope in the handwriting of one of those misguided gentlemen who are now in arms against their country, and the verses which it enclosed, I cannot but find some analogy between what a man of science like I have myself observed and the plot of Wozan, which the writer seems to expect you should imitate."

"Waverley," said the advocate, coincidentally did not rest or expect the terms of the letter-writer would be regarded as proofs of a charge otherwise chimerical.

"But, if I am rightly informed, your time was spent, during your absence from the regiment, between the house of this Highland chief, and that of Mr. Bradwardine, of Bradwardine, also in arms for this unfortunate cause?"

"I do not mean to discuss it; but I do deny, most resolutely, being privy to any of their designs against the government."

"You do not, however, I presume, intend to deny that you attended your host Glenquacoch to a rendezvous, where, under a pretence of a general hunting match, most of the accomplices of his treason were assembled to concert measures for taking advantage of your absence."

"I acknowledge having been at such a meeting," said Waverley; "but I neither heard nor saw any thing which could give it the character you assign to it."

"From thence you proceeded," continued the magistrate, "with Glenquacoch and a part of his clan, to join the army of the young Pretender, and returned, after having paid your homages to him, to dissemble and arm the remainder, and unite them to his bands on their way southward?"

"I never went with Glenquacoch on such an errand. I never so much as heard from the person whom you mention in the country."

"He then detailed the history of his misfortune at the hunting match, and added, that on his return he found himself suddenly deprived of his commission, and did not deny that he then, for the first time, observed symptoms which indicated a disposition in the Highlanders to take arms; but added, that having no inclination to join their cause, and no longer any reason for remaining in Scotland, he was now on his return to his native country, to which he had been summoned by those who had a right to demand his presence, as Major Melville would perceive from the letters on the table."

Major Melville accordingly perused the letters of Richard Waverley, of Sir Eyvart, and of Aunt Fanny. After the letter from Sir Eyvart and the letter from Aunt Fanny, he was of different from what Waverley expected. They held the language of discount with government, threw out no offensive hints of revenge, and that of poor Aunt Rachel which plainly asserted the justice of a very short personal remonstration, will be the consequence that can arise from your accission to these unhappy intriguers.

Waverley's presence was great comfort until the end of this extortation, when, springing from his seat, with an energy he had not yet displayed, he replied, "Major Melville, since that is your name, I have neither a head upon my shoulders nor a heart in my breast, nor do I decline them with temper, because their import concerns me alone; but as you presume to esteem me mean enough to commence informer against others, upon their assurance, and their misconduct, as a guest and friend,—I declare to you that I consider your questions as an insult infinitely more offensive than your calamitous suspicion, which it was my heart's desire to free the hearers from, by no other mode of remonstrating them than by verbal defence, you should sooner have my heart out of my bosom, than a single syllable of information on subjects which I could only become acquainted with in the full confidence of unsuspecting hospitality.

Mr. Morton and the Major looked at each other; and the former, who, in the course of the examination, had been repeatedly troubled with a very violent headache, retired to his lodging, and never returned.

"Mr. Waverley," said the Major, "my present situation prohibits me from giving or receiving offices, and I will not prolong a discussion which may lead to suspicions of me. I shall not be a witness against you, for I have not the least wish to impugn your character or your conduct, but I will order introductions to you in your apartment.

Our hero bowed and withdrew, under guard of the officers of justice, to a small but handsome room, where he sat down; and after spending some time in filling himself with the food on the bed, and sups, to which the harrowing events and mental fatigue of the miserable day, he sunk into a deep and heavy slumber. This was more than the Major could bear, and he was missed by the North-American Indians, when at the move of torture, that on the least intermission of agony, they would stop the fire is applied to waken them.

When Waverley retired, the land and clergyman of Cairnwood sat down in silence to their evening meal. While the servants were in attendance, neither chose to say anything on the circumstances which had involved them, and their minds and thoughts were not fit to be spoken upon any other. The youth and apparent frankness of Waverley stood in strong contrast to the statues of suspicion which darkened around him, and he was well listened to, with open ears, and that seemed to belong to one unshackled in the ways of intrigue, and which pleased highly in his favour.

The cause over the particulars of the examination, and each viewed it through the medium of his own feelings. Both were men of ready and acute talent, and both were equally competent to combine various parts of the subject, which led to the same conclusion. But the wise difference of their habits and education often occasioned a great discrepancy in their respective deductions from admitted positions.

Major Melville had been versed in camps and cities; he was vigilant by profession, and cautious from experience; and had met with much evil in the world, and therefore, though himself an upright magistrate and an honourable man, his opinions of others were always strict, and his affections were not the less invigorated when the rest of his family. Mr. Morton, on the contrary, had passed from the literary pursuits of a college, where he was educated by his companions, and respected by his teachers, to the more painful task of instructing others. The opportunities of witnessing evil were few, and never dwelt upon, but in order to encourage repentance and amendment; and where the love and respect of his countrymen was in a measure stored up in his heart. The Major, by endeavouring to disguise from him what they knew would give him the most acute pain, namely, their own occasional transgressions of the duties of his profession, and the harmful effects of the work. Thus it was a common saying in the neighbourhood, (though both were popular characters,) that the lad knew only the ill in the parish, and the minister only the good.

A love of letters, though kept in subordination to his clerical studies and duties, also distinguished the Pastor of Cairnwood, and had funded his mind in earlier days with a slight feeling of romance, which he occasionally indulged, to the disgust of his friends. The early loss of an amiable young woman, whom he had married for love, and who was quickly followed to the grave by an only child, had also served to bring him even after the most ardent and passionate nature naturally mild and contemplative. His feelings on the present occasion were therefore likely to differ from those of the severe disciplinarian, strict magistrate, and devout minister of the paper.

When the servants had withdrawn, the silence of both parties continued, until Major Melville, filling his glass, and pushing the bottle to Mr. Morton, commenced:

"A distressed affair this, Mr. Morton. I fear this youngster has brought himself within the compass of a halter."

"God forbid!" answered the clergyman.

"Marry, and amen," said the temporal magistrate; "but I think even your merciful logic will hardly deny the conclusion;"

"Surely, Major," answered the clergyman, "I should hope it might be averted, for aught we have heard to-night?"

"Indeed!" replied Melville. "But, my good parson, you are one of those who would communicate to every criminal the benefit of clergy."

"Unquestionably I would: Mercy and long-suffering are the grounds of the doctrine I am called to teach."

"True, religiously speaking; but mercy to a criminal may be gross injustice to the community. I don't speak of this young fellow in particular, who I heartily wish had never been born, for I like both his modesty and his spirit. But I fear he has rushed upon his fate."

"And why? Hundreds of misguided gentlemen are now in arms against the government, many, doubtless, upon principles which education and early prejudice have gilded with the names of patriotism and heroism;—Justice, when she selects her victims from such a multitude, (for surely all will not be destroyed,) must regard the net as well; He who vulgarly seeks, or hopes of personal advantage, has led to disturb the peace of a well-ordered government, let him fall a victim to the laws; but surely youth, made by the wild visions of the day, and imaginary loyalty, may plead for pardon."

"If visionary chivalry and imaginary loyalty command within the precincts of this temple," replied the magistrate, "I know not where to find the Habens Corpus."

"But I cannot see that this youth's guilt is at all established to our satisfaction," said the clergyman.

"Because your good nature; blinds your good sense," replied Major Melville. "Observe now: This young man, descended of a family of hereditary Jacobites, his uncle the Earl of Tweedmouth, and his father a disaffected, discontented courtier, his tutor a non-Juror, and the author of two reasonable volumes—this youth ...

Gardiner's dragoons, bringing with him a body of young fellows from his uncle's estate, who have not stucked at avowing, in their way, the high-church principles promulgated at Waverley, and the more the movement of a favourite sergeant, through whom they hold an unusually close communication with their captain, and affect to consider themselves as independent of the other offices, and superior to their comrades. To these young men Waverley is unusually attentive; they are supplied with money beyond a soldier's wants, and inconsistent with the mode of life, and the spirit of the movement of a favourite sergeant, through whom they hold an unusually close communication with their captain, and affect to consider themselves as independent of the other offices, and superior to their comrades. To these young men Waverley is unusually attentive; they are supplied with money beyond a soldier's wants, and inconsistent with the mode of life, and the spirit of the movement of a favourite sergeant, through whom they hold an unusually close communication with their captain, and affect to consider themselves as independent of the other offices, and superior to their comrades.

"All this, my dear Major, is the natural consequence of their attachment to their young landlord, and of their finding themselves in a regiment levied chiefly in the north of England and the west of Scotland, and of course among comrades disposed to quarrel with them, both as Englishmen, and as members of the Church of England."

"Well said, parson," replied the magistrate. "It would some of your synod heard you—but let me go on. This young man obtains leave of absence, goes to Tullie-Veolan—the principles of the Baron of Bradwine are pretty well known, not to mention that this lad's uncle brought him off in the year fifteen; he engages there in a brawl, in which he is said to have disarmed the commission he bore, Colonel Gordon himself, I should think. I think we will not discuss his actions here, but go on."

In the meanwhile, his soldiers become restless and disorderly, and at length, when the rumour of this unhappiness becomes general, his favourable reputation suffers, and another fellow, are detected in correspondence with a French emissary, accredited as he says, by Captain Waverley, who trusts him, according to the men's confession, to desert with the troops and carry their captain, with its Charles. In the meanwhile this trusty captain is, by his own admission, residing at Glenandoichi with the most active, subtle, and desperate Jacobite in Scotland; he goes with him at least as far as their famous hunting rendezvous, and I fear a little farther. Meanwhile two summonses are sent him; one warning him of the disturbances in his troop, another expressly ordering him to repair to the regiment, which had more than once his name discrediting, when he observed rebellion thickening all round him. He returns an absolute refusal, and throws up his commission.

"He had been already deprived of it," said Mr. Morton.

"But he recants," replied Melville, "that the measure had anticipated his resignation. His baggage is sent to him at Tullie-Veolan, and it is found to contain a stock of pestilent Jacobite pamphlets, enough to poison a whole country, besides the unprinted incitements of his worthy friend and tutor, Mr. Pombourge.

"He says he never read them," answered the minister.

"In an ordinary case I should believe him," replied the magistrate, "for they are as stupid and pedantic in composition as mischievous in their tenets. But can you suppose any thing but value for the principles they maintain, would induce a young man of his age to recant hurriedly about with him? When, then, when near the approach of the rebels, he sets out in a sort of disguise, refusing to tell his name; and, if you are tarantistic tell truth, attended by a very suspicious and mounted on a horse known to have belonged to Glenandoichi, and bearing on his person letters from his family expressing high rancour against the house of Brunswick, and a copy of a resolution of the House of Lords, and the minute sheet of the Parliament to join the Highland insurgents, when in arms to restore the house of Stewart, with a body of English cavalry—the very counterpart of his last name. I am not a blind man, and I shall look upon this as no coincidence, from that loyal subject, and most safe and peaceable character, Fergus Mac-Ivor of Glenandoichi, Visch Ian Vohr, and so forth. And, lastly, continued Major Melville, warming in the detail of his arguments, "where do we find this second edition of Cavalier Wogan? Why, truly, in the very place most proper for execution of his design, and passing the first of the king's subjects who ventures a question his intentions?"

Mr. Morton profoundly abstained from argument, in which he perceived Major Melville had the management in his opinion, and merely asked how he intended to dispose of the prisoner?

"It is a question of some difficulty, considering the state of the country," said Major Melville. "Could you not detain him (being such a gentleman-like young man) here in your own house, out of harm's way, till this storm blows over?""My social friend and Major Melville, "not your house nor mine will be long out of harm's way even were it legal to confine him here. I have learned that the commander-in-chief, who marched into the Highlands to seek out and disperse the insurgents, has declined giving them battle at Croydon, and marched on northward with all the disposability of force of government to Inverness, John-o'-Groat, House of the hardy, for what I know, being left to road to the Low Country open and unfortified to the Highland army."

"Good God!" said the clergyman. "Is the man coward?"

"None of the three, I believe," answered Melville. "Sir John has the common-place courage of a common soldier, is honest enough, does what he is commanded, and, until he has had him, is fit to act for himself in circumstances of importance. As, my dear parson, to occupy your pulpit."

This important public intelligence naturally divided the assembly, and the discussion lasted some time; at least however, the subject was resumed.

"I believe," said Major Melville, "that I must this young man in charge to some of the detachment of armed volunteers, who were lately sent to overawe the disaffected districts. They are called towards Stirling, and a small body groups this way to-morrow or next day, commanded by a westland man—what's his name? You saw him, and said he was the very model of one of Cromwell's military pains."

"Giffillan, the Cameronian," answered Mr. Morton. "I wish the young gentleman may be safe with him. Strange names are eaten up, and minds of men in so agitating a crisis, and I fear Giffillan is of a sect which has suffered persecution without coming through it."

"He has only to lodge Mr. Waverley in Strichen Castle," said the Major. "I will give strict instructions to treat him well. I really cannot devise a better mode for securing him, and I fancy you would not hazardly encounter the responsibility of setting him at liberty."

"But you will have no objection to my seeing his to-morrow in private?" said the minister.

"No, certainly; your loyalty and character is my warrant. But with what view do you make the request?"

"Simply," replied Mr. Morton, "to make the experiment whether he may not be brought to communicate to me some circumstances which may hereafter be useful to alleviate, if not to exculpate, his conduct."

The friends now parted and retired to rest, and pleased with the most anxious reflections on the rest of the country.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

A CONFIDENT.

Waverley awoke in the morning, from trouble dreams and overclouded spirits, to a full consciousness of the horrors of his situation. How might terminate he knew not. He might be deliver'd up to military law, which, in the midst of civil war, might accord with the laws of the age, and all the victims, or the quality of the evidence. Nor did he feel much more or comfortable at the thoughts of a before a Scottish court of justice, where he knew it laws and forms differed in many respects from those of England, and had been taught to believe, however repeatedly they were repeated, that the English or the English were less carefully protected. A sentiment of bitterness rose in his mind against the government, which he considered as responsible for his imprisonment and destitution. In his letters and conversations, he often referred to the incident of Mac-Ivor's invitation to accompany him to the field.

"Why did not I," he said to himself, "like other members of the clergy, take the earliest opportunity to seek come from Britain the descendant of her ancient kings and claim her of her throne? Why did not I

"I entreat the rude eye of the battle,
And bow with humble faith,
Rocking Prince Charsies, and fall before your feet!"?

All that has been recorded of excellence and worth in the house of Waverley has been founded upon their loss of such a man, and their loss of such a man. From the insinuation which this Scotch magistrate has put upon the letters of my uncle and father, it is plain that I ought not to have understood them as marshalling me to the contest, as I have always borne in mind the concealment and the concealment of the clergyman, joined to the obscurity of expression which they adopted for the sake of security, which has conformed my judgment. Had I yielded to the first general impression of the clergyman, I might have left me soon that my loyalty was practised, not shown a different man. My present situation! I have been free and in arms, fighting, like my forefathers, for love, for loyalty, and for freedom. And now I am here, nettled and out of sorts, and the clergyman, a stern and cold-hearted man, perhaps to be turned over to the solitude of a dungeon, or the infamy of a public execution. O, Ferguson! How true has your prophecy proved! and how swiftly, how very swiftly, has been its accomplishment!"

While Edward was ruminating on these painful subjects of contemplation, and very naturally, through no fault of his own, the approach of Mr. Waverley was perceived. Edward had no idea that Mr. Waverley would make an unexpected appearance, and it was the unlooked-forness of the clergyman's visit that was his astonishment. He was surprised upon his arrival, and he was surprised upon the unexpected visit of the clergyman. Edward had no idea that Mr. Waverley would make an unexpected appearance, and it was the unlooked-forness of the clergyman's visit that was his astonishment. He was surprised upon his arrival, and he was surprised upon the unexpected visit of the clergyman.

"I believe, sir," said the unfortunate young man, "in the present circumstances, I should have the same respect to express to you as the safety of my life is worth; but such is the present tumult of my mind, and such is my anticipation of what may happen, that I cannot hardly offer you thanks for your interposition."

Mr. Morton replied, "that, far from being any claim upon his good opinion, his only wish was to find out the means of satisfying it. My excellent friend, Major Melville, as continued, "has feelings and duties as a soldier and public functionary, by which I am not fettered. I can always come in at single terms of the clergyman, perhaps with too little allowance for the imperfections of human nature." He paused, and then continued: "I do not intrude myself on your confidence, Mr. Waverley, for the purpose of learning anything about the circumstances, the knowledge of which can be prejudicial to yourself or to others; but I own my earnest wish is, that you would intrust me with any particulars which could lead to your excitement. I can solemnly assure you that they will be deposited with a faithful, and, to the extent of his limited powers, a zealous agent."

"In that case, sir, I presume, a Presbyterian clergyman?"—Mr. Morton bowed. "Were I to be guided by the prepossessions of education, I might distrust your friendly professions in my case; but I have observed in your manner of conversing with him, that you were not altogether without respect for your professional brethren of the clerical persuasion, and I am willing to believe that you are neither unfounded in either case.

"Evil to him that thinks otherwise," said Mr. Morton; "or who holds church government and ceremonies as the exclusive badge of Christian faith or civil virtue."

"But," continued Waverley, "I cannot conceive why I should trouble you with a detail of particulars, out of which, after revolving them as carefully as possible in my mind, I found no more than that, Major Melville is involuntarily obliged to intrust the custody of your person to another."

"I am glad of it," answered Waverley, "I see that he intends to solicit your confidence." that cold-blooded calculating Scotch magistrate. I hope he and I shall never meet more; he had neither sympathy with my innocence nor with my wretchedness; and the petrifying accuracy with which he attended to every form of civility, while he tortured me, made his face, and his inflexible, unflinching eye, as tormenting as the racks of the Inquisition. Do not vindicate him, my dear sir, for that I cannot bear with patience; tell me rather who is to have the charge of so important a state prisoner as I am.

"I believe a person called Giffilin, one of the sect who are termed Cameronsians," said Morton before.

"Ah, yes," replied the clerk, "to represent the more strict and severe Presbyterians, who, in Charles Second's and James Second's days, refused to profit by the Toleration, or Indulgence, as it was called, which was extended to others of that religion. They held conventicles in the open fields, and being treated with great violence and cruelty by the Scotch government, more than once took arms against those reigns. They take their name from their leader, Richard Cameron."

"I recollect," said Waverley; "but did not the triumph of Presbytery at the revolution extinguish that sect?"

"By no means," replied Morton; "that great event fell yet far short of what they proposed, which was not too long delayed the establishment of the Presbyterian Church, upon the grounds of the old Solemn League and Covenant. Indeed, I believe they scarce knew what they wanted; but being a turbulent body of men, and unacquainted with the use of arms, they kept themselves together as a separate party in the state, and at the time of the Union had nearly formed a most unnatural league with France. This, though not great in point of importance, was the most important national measure. Since that time their numbers have gradually diminished; but a good many are still to be found in the western counties, and the chief man among them, who has now taken arms for government, is the person, whom they call Giffilin, has been long a leader among them, and now heads a small party, which will pass here-to-day, or to-morrow, on their march towards Stirling, under whose escort Major Melville proposes you shall travel. I would willingly speak to Giffilin in your behalf; but, having deeply imbibed all the prejudices of his sect, and being of the same fierce disposition, he would pay little regard to the remonstrances of an Erastian divine, as he would plottily term me. And now, farewell, my young friend; I trust you will make the Major's indulgence, that I may obtain his permission to visit you again in the course of the day."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THINGS MEND A LITTLE.

About noon, Mr. Morton returned, and brought an invitation from Major Melville that Mr. Waverley would honour him with his company to dinner, notwithstanding the unpleasant affair which detained him at Caithness, from which he should heartily rejoice to return to the delight of his dearest expectations.

The truth was, that Mr. Morton's favourable report and opinion had somewhat staggered the preconceptions of the old soldier concerning Edward's supposed accession to the succession in the regiment; and in the unfortunate state of the country, the mere suspicion of disaffection, or an inclination to join the insurgent Jacobites, might infer criminality indeed, but certainly not as the judge of his subordinates. The Major trusted had reported to him, (though, as it proved, inaccurately); a contradiction of the agitating news of the preceding evening. According to this account the twenty Highlanders who had withdrawn from the Lowland frontier with the purpose of following the army in their march to Inverness. The Major was at a loss, indeed, to reconcile the high opinion he had of the well-known abilities and services of some of the gentlemen in the Highland army, yet it was the course which was likely to be most agreeable to others. He remembered the same policy had obtained them in the north in the year 1715, and he anticipated a similar termination to the insurrection, as upon that occasion.

This notion was not better humour, that Mr. Morton acquiesced in Mr. Morton's proposal to pay some hospitable attention to his unfortunate guest, and voluntarily added, he hoped the whole affair would prove a youthful cæcitas, which might be easily atoned by a short confinement. The kind medi-ator had some trouble to prevail on his young friend to accept the invitation. He dared not urge to him the real motive, which was a separate and to secure a favourable report of Waverley's case from Major Melville to Governor Blaskey. He remarked, from the flashes of our hero's spirit, that touching upon this topic would be sure to defeat his purpose. He therefore pleaded, that the invitation arose the Major's disbelief of any part of the accusation which was inconsistent with Waverley's conduct as a soldier and man of honour, and that to decline his courtesy might be interpreted into a consciousness that it was unmerited. In short, he so far satisfied Edward that the manly and proper course was to meet the Major's kind invitation that Waverley should disliking to encounter his cold and punctilious civility, Waverley agreed to be guided by his new friend.

The meeting, at first, was stiff and formal enough. But Edward having accepted the invitation, and his mind being really soothed and relaxed by the kindness of Mr. Morton, held himself bound to behave with civility; and, with the aid of the good wine, the Major was somewhat of a bon vivant, and his wine was excellent. He told his old campaign stories, and displayed much knowledge of men and manners. Mr. Morton had an anecdote, that Waverley was glad to hear, which related to a certain officer of the Royal Guards, who was one of the most gallant and lively of the party. He had at all times remarkable natural powers of conversation, though easily silenced by discouragement. On the present occasion, he possessed himself upon leaving on the minds of his companions a favourable impression of one who, under such disastrous circumstances, could sustain his misfortunes with case and gaiety. His spirits, though not mellowed, were abundantly elastic, and soon ascended to the radiant height.

The Major, who, in the title of an old soldier, had forgot the duties of a magistrate, cursed, with a muttered military oath, the circumstances which recalled him to his official functions. He and went towards the window, which commanded a very near view of the high-road, and he was followed by his guests.

The drum advanced, beating no measured martial tune, but a kind of rub-a-dub-dub, like that with which the fif-drums startle the slumbering artizans of a Scotch burgh. It is the object of this history to do justice to all men; I must therefore record, in justice to the man, that the drummers were not guilty of any remark. The known march or path of war known in the British army, and had accordingly commenced with "Dumbarton's Drums," when he was silenced by Giffilin, the bandmaster, of the party, who was likely to permit his followers to move to this posture, and even, as he said, peremptorily, and commanded the drummer to beat the 11th Psalm. As this was beyond the capacity of the drum-now a hummer in question was no less than town-drummer of Anderton. I remember his successor in office a member of that enlightened body, the British Cong."

Ghilian again smiled scornfully as he made this indirect answer. "Even thus are the children of struck, and marched stoutly along at the head of his followers, setting our hero from time to time, as if he longed to enter into controversy with him. At length, unable to resist the temptation, he slackened his pace till he was alongside of his prisoner's horse:

"Yes, for it is not by the sword of battle, nor by the flash of terror and a clatter of com- mon, without any sense, or savour, or life—Yet I have seen in scone a child, believe it?"

"No; I am of the Church of England," said Waverley.

And they're just neither sur-like," replied the Com- nander; and now would they see the sea. Why would not the goodly structure of the Kirk of Scotland, built up by our fathers in 1612, was defended by cannon and the corruptions of the time—say, who had been taught the carved word? The sanctuary would have been seen soon cut down?

To this lamentation, which one or two of the as- serters chanced with a deep groan, our hero thought of the trades he had to make any note upon Mr. Giffillan, resolving that he should be a hearer at heart, if not a disputant, proceeded in his Jeremiad.

And now is it wonderful, when, for lack of ex- ercise, to the service of the field and the duty of the day, ministers fall into small compliances with patronage, and indemnities, and oats, and bona, and other corruptions—is it wonderful, I say, that you, sir, and other seic-like unhappy persons, should labour to build your own Holy of Miu, as in the blushing presence saint-killing times? I trow, sin ye wereca blinda wil the grace and favours, and services and enjoyments, and employment, and inheritance, of this creakered man I could prove to you, by the Scripture, in what a filthy racy ye put your trust; and that your supplies, and your cupes and vestments, are but cast-off garments of the much-handled, that sitteth upon every hills, and dranketh of the cup of abomination. But, I trow, ye are deaf as adders upon that side of the head; ay, ye are deceived with your enchantments, and ye traffic with their deceivers, and ye are drunk with the cup of their fornication!

How much longer this military theologian might have continued his invective, in which he spared no- body, but took all by the back, and called them, is absolutely uncertain. His matter was copious, his voice powerful, and his memory strong; so that there was little chance of his ending his ex- hortation till the party had reached Stirling, had not his attention been attracted by a pedlar who had joined the march from a cross-road, and who sighed or groaned with great regularity at all fitting passions of his body.

And what may ye be, friend?" said the Gifted Giffillan:

A poor pedlar, that's bound for Stirling, and craves the honour of my company for the next kiltimes. Ah! your honour has a notable faculty in searching and explaining the secret,—say, the secret and obscure and incomprehensible causes of the back- slidings of the land; ay, your honour touches the root of the bane."

"Friend," said Giffillan, with a more complacent voice than he had hitherto used, "honour not me. I d not so out to park-dikes, and to stealings, and to thieving of the bums and pull off their bonnets to me as they do to Major Melville o' Cairnveekan, and ca'mo laid, or captain, or honour;—no; my small means, whilst are not about twenty crowns, he having haid the blessing of increase, but the pride of my heart has not increased with them; nor do I delight to be called captain, though I have the subscribed commission of that arching nobleman, the Earl of Gleenarne, in while I am so designated. While I live, I am says, he called Halakuk Gilfillan, who will stand up for the standards of doctrine agreed on by the name-famous Kirk of Scotland, before she trafficked with the accursed Achat, while he has a plac in his purse, or a drip of blood in his veins. If he be absent, he is as much as any land's land in Scotland."

"Ah," said the pedlar, "I have seen your land and Mauchlin—a fertile spot! your lines have fallen a pleasant place! And scone a breed of cattle is as in any land's land in Scotland."

"Ye say right,—ye say right, friend," returned Giffillan earnestly, for he was not inaccessible to fame upon this subject,—"Ye say right; they are the same, Lancashire, Low Countries, Flanders, and the Mains of Kilmaur. And he then entered into a discussion of their excellence, to which our reader will probably be as indifferent as our hero. After these conversations, the pedlar returned to the instant, while the pedlar, less profound upon the mystic points, contented himself with groaning of expressing his edification at suitable intervals.

This Interviews with the godly, black papish nations among whom I have sojourned, have shown a light to their paths! I have been as Moses in my own trading way, as a traveling merchant in the Low Countries, and a' Poland, and maintain fast, and O! it would grieve your honor'sشع to see the murmuring, and the singing, and masses of the base in the middle, but the magnificent in the ear, and the heathenish dancing and delighting upon the blith path!"

This ret Giffillan upon the Book of Sports, on the Convocation and the Estates, and the Whigamore's Raid, and the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and the Lower and Short Catechism, and the Excommunication at Torbay, and the slaughter of Archbishop Sharp. This is the topie, mein, led him into the lawlessness of defence, on which subject he uttered much more than could have been expected from some of his hangers, and attracted even Waverley's attention, who, had hitherto been lost in his own reflections. Mr. Giffillan then considered the limitations of a private man's standing forth as the avenger of public oppression, and as he was labouring with the earnestness the cause of Miss Jones Mitchell was fired at the Archbishop of St. Andrews some years before the prelate's assassination on Magnus, an incident which interrupted his harangue.

The reader will have already seen how the pedlar and the small party who were Waverley's more immediate guard, were near the top of the ascent, and the remainder struggled after them at considerable interval.

Such a mass of matters, when the pedlar was missing, as he said, a little doggie which belonged to him, began to halt and whole for the animal. The signal, repeated more than once, gave offence to the favour of his companion, the rather because it seemed to indicate inattention to the tradesman of theological and controversial knowledge which was pouring out for his elucidation. He therefore signified gruffly, that he could not waste his time in waiting for an unimportant cur, and hurried on.

"But if your honour was consider the case of the pig?"

"Tobit!" exclaimed Giffillan, with great heat: "Tobit and his dog bath are altogether heathenism and apocryphal, and none but a prelatist or a priest would draw them into question. I doubt I have met 'em in your friend."
of a considerable body of water, although its stream was invisible in the darkness,) the party again stopped before a small and rudely-constructed hovel. The door was opened by the sound of wailing and lamentation, as of a woman, complaining of great pain and other bodily sufferings, as if she was approaching death. The door was then pulled shut, and the door being secured, the party took up their position outside, and waited in the cold and darkness for what seemed to be an eternity.

Then, at last, the door was opened, and a young man, bearing a lighted candle, came out and showed the way to the little girl, who was lying on the floor. The party entered, and were met by the girl's mother, who was very ill and in great pain. The party then proceeded to comfort the mother and to console her for her sufferings. The party then proceeded to the window, and looked out, and saw that the sky was clear and the stars were shining brightly. The party then proceeded to the door, and knocked, and the door was opened, and the party entered, and were met by the little girl's father, who was very ill and in great pain. And so on, the party proceeded to comfort the sick and to console them for their sufferings, until they were all together, and they all comforted each other, and they all were happy, and they all lived happily ever after.

CHAPTER XXX VII.

WAVERLEY IS STILL IN DISTRESS.

The velocity, and indeed violence, with which Waverley was hurled along, nearly deprived him of sensation; for the injury he had received from his fall prevented him from aiding himself so effectually as he should have done. He was carried to the door of his room, and conveyed to the bed, where he was assisted by his conductors, who called to their aid two or three others of the party, and wafting us amidst the leaves of the trees, and with difficulty, with the aid of the men, they were enabled to extricate him from the difficulty in which he was involved. So the party proceeded, and they were able to extricate themselves, and they were able to proceed on their journey to Stirling, carrying with them their wounded captain and comrades.

Our hero now endeavored to address them, but it was only answered with "O chival Beurl, a' bram," i.e. "I have no English," being, as Waverley well knew, the constant reply of a Highlander, when he either does not understand, or does not choose to reply to, an Englishman, Lowlander. He then mentioned the name of Vich Ian Vohr, concluding that he was indebted to his friendship for his rescue from the clutches of Grieff Giffen; but neither did this produce any mark of recognition from his escort. The twilight had given place to moonshine when the party halted upon the brink of a precipitous glen, which, as partly enlightened by the moon-beams, seemed full of trees and tangled brushwood. Two of the Highlanders dived into it by a small foot-path, as if to explore its recesses, and one of them returning in a few minutes, said something to his companions, which he seemed to impress upon him, with great attention and care, down the narrow and abrupt descent. Notwithstanding their precautions, however, Waverley's party came more than once into contact with the enemy, and the result of his efforts and assistance appeared to be to cover himself with a mail so effectually, that the door could not be drawn till the exterior impediment was removed. But while resting upon the cause of this contradictory spirit, the party, feeling the need of rest and repose, and the want of plunder, and who, in all other points, appeared to consult their welfare and his wishes, it occurred to our hero, that, during the worst crisis of his illness, a female figure had appeared to float around his head, and that he had but a very indistinct recollection of placing it. Waverley heard the rushing he often heard in the course of the day, the voice of another female conversing in a whisper with a youth. Who said it? And why should the speaker assist in the work of the man who was to be destroyed at a stroke? — these two questions he could not answer, even when he was hurrying towards Flora Mac-Iver. But the memory of Flora Mac-Iver, and of the devoted youth who was to be sacrificed to the loves of another, was enough to bring his mind back to the scene of his own sufferings.

Yet he had seen a great deal of Flora Mac-Iver, and he knew that she was not the only one who had been led away by the allurements of her beauty and of his own passion. But he had no wish to think of Flora Mac-Iver now. He was too busy with his own affairs. He was too busy with the thought that his own life was in danger, and that the man who was to destroy him was about to make his appearance.

After a while he found himself in front of the cottage. He knocked at the door, and was admitted by an old woman who lived there. She was old and feeble, but she still had a kindly face, and she welcomed him with a smile.

"What do you want, young man?" she asked.

"I want to speak with Flora Mac-Iver," he replied.

"She is not here," the old woman said.

"But I have a message for her," he said. "A message from another who is in danger."

"I will convey the message to Flora," she said. "But I warn you, young man, that Flora is not the only one who is in danger."

"I know that," he said. "But I cannot help it. I must save as many as I can."

"You are a brave man," the old woman said. "But you must be careful."

"I will be careful," he said. "But I must act now."

He left the cottage, and went back to the village. He was determined to see Flora Mac-Iver, and to warn her of the danger that threatened her. He was determined to save as many as he could, even if it meant sacrificing himself.

Michael Woodhouse, the tenant of the cottage, was not the only one who was in danger. There were two Highlanders who had been held prisoner by the English, and who were about to be executed. They had been captured in a recent battle, and had been taken to the village of Flora Mac-Iver.

The Highlanders had been treated with kindness, but they were still in danger. They were to be executed the next day, unless they could be saved. And Waverley was determined to save them, even if it meant sacrificing himself.

He went to see Flora Mac-Iver, and told her of the danger that threatened the Highlanders. He told her of the plans that had been made to execute them, and of the hope that he had for their salvation.

Flora Mac-Iver was much moved by Waverley's words, and she promised to do all in her power to save the Highlanders.

"I will do all I can," she said. "But I warn you, young man, that it will not be easy. The English are powerful, and they will not轻易 give up their prisoners."

"I know that," Waverley said. "But I will not give up without a struggle."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

A NOCTURNAL ADVENTURE.

There was a moment's pause when the whole party had set out of the hut, and the Highlander with his Glasgow pistol, and without any guidance, followed the path that led to the moor. He moved with great precaution, as if it were inhabited by spirits, and as soon as he came to the verge of the ascent, Waverley was soon sensible of the reason, for he heard at no great distance an English sentinel call out 'All's well.'

The moon shone down on the woody glen, and was answered by the echoes of its banter. A second, third, and fourth time the signal was repeated fainter and fainter, as if at a greater and greater distance, and it was only for a few minutes that he could discern them. He was not only in the middle of his march, but in the middle of his life, and he was going to the verge of the moor. He was going to the verge of his life, and he was going to the verge of the moor.

When these sounds had died under the silence of the night, the Highlanders began to march swiftly, yet with the most cautious silence. Waverley had little time to distill from the features of these soldiers, but he could only discern that they passed at some distance from a large building, in the windows of which a light or two yet seemed to twinkle. A little further on, the leading Highlander shufled the wind like a writing spaniel, and then made a signal to his party again to halt. He stooped down upon all fours, wrapped up in his plaid, so as to be scarce distinguishable from the rest of the party, and advanced, as if to meet the view of the young warrior, in this posture to reconnoitre. In a short time he returned, and dismissed his attendants excepting one, and, intimating to Waverley that he must imitate his conduct, moved forward, all three crept forward on hands and knees.

After proceeding in this inconspicuous manner than was at all comfortable to his knees and hands, they came to a spot where they could probably have been much sooner distinguished by the more acute nasal organs of his guide. It proceeded from the corner of a low and rustless sheep-fold, the walls of which were made of loose stones, as is usual in Scotland. Close by this low wall the Highlander guided Waverley, and, in order probably to make him sensible of his danger, or perhaps to obtain the full credit of his own exertion, he intimated to him, by a sign and example, that he might raise his head so as to peep into the sheep-fold. Waverley did so, and beheld an out-post of four or five soldiers lying by their watch-fire. They were all asleep, except the sentinel, who paced backwards and forwards with his firelock on his shoulder, which glanced red in the light of the fire as he crossed and re-crossed before it in his short walk, casting his eye frequently to the stars, and from time to time to the heavens from which the moon, hitherto obscured by mist, seemed now about to make her appearance.
alarm which he excited seemed still to continue, for a stopping shot or two were heard at a great distance, where they all took to an addition to the mirth of Duncan and his comrades.

The mountaineer now assumed the arms with which he had intrusted our hero, giving him to understand that he was the jouster at the sporting ass mounted. Waverley was then mounted upon one of the horses, a change which the fatigue of the night and his recent illness rendered exceedingly acceptable. He appeared well placed on his pony. Duncan mounted a third, and they set forth at a round pace, accompanied by their escort. No other incident marked the course of that night’s journey, and at the dawn of day Waverley attained the banks of a rapid river. The country around was at once fertile and romantic. Steep banks of wood were broken by corn fields, which this year presented an abundant harvest, already in a great measure cut down.

On the opposite bank of the river, and partly surrounded by a winding of its stream, stood a large and massive castle, the half-ruined turrets of which were already glittering in the first rays of the sun. It was in form an oblong square, of size sufficient to contain a large court in the centre. The towers at each angle of the square rose higher than the walls of the building, and their upper part seemed differing in height, and irregular in shape. Upon one of these a sentinel watched, whose bonnet and plaid, streaming in the wind, declared him to be a Highlandman. A little distance from another tower, announced that the garrison was held by the insurgent adherents of the house of Stewart.

Passing hastily through a small and mean town, where the greater part were excited and neither surprise nor curiosity in the few peasants whom the labours of the harvest began to summon from their repose, the party crossed an ancient and narrow bridge of several arches, leading to the lofty and huge old sycamores, Waverley found himself in front of the gloomy yet picturesque structure which he had admired at a distance. A huge iron-grated door, which formed the exterior defence of the gateway, was already thrown back to receive them; and a second, heavily constructed of oak, and studded thickly with iron nails, being next opened, admitted them into the interior court-yard. A gentleman, dressed in the Highland garb, and having a white cockade in his bonnet, assisted Waverley to dismount from his horse, and with much courtesy bid him welcome to the castle.

The governor, for so we must term him, having conducted Waverley to a half-mournful apartment, where, however, there was a small camp-bed, and having offered him any refreshment which he desired, was then about to leave him.

"Will you then,” said Waverley, after having made the usual acknowledgment, "by having the kindness to inform me where I am, and whether or not I am to consider myself as a prisoner for ?"

"I am not at liberty to be so explicit upon this subject as I could wish. Briefly, however, you are in the Castle of Doune, in the district of Menteith, and is no manner whatever.

"And how am I assured of that ?"

"By the honour of Donald Stewart, governor of the garrison, and lieutenant-colonel in the service of the Prince of the Republic of the Caledonian, who, greatly appalled at the said saying, he hastily left the apartment, as if to avoid further discussion.

Exhausted by the fatigues of the night, our hero now threw himself upon the bed, and was in a few minutes fast asleep.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

After Waverley awakened from his repose, he found that he had slept many hours without food. This was supplied in form of a copious breakfast, but Colonel Stewart, as if wishing to avoid the queries of his guest, did not breathe a word. The breakfast were, however, delivered by a servant, with an offer to provide any thing in his power that could be useful to Captain Waverley on his journey, which he intimated with a smile that he would be continued that evening. To Waverley’s further inquiries, the servant opposed the impenetrable barrier of real or affected ignorance and stupidity. He removed the table and provisions, and Waverley was again consigned to his own meditations.

As he contemplated the strangeness of his fortune, which seemed to delight in placing him at the disposal of others without the power of directing his own motions, Edward’s eye suddenly rested upon his portmanteau, which had been deposited in his apartment during his sleep. The mysterious appearance of Alice, in the cottage of the elm, immediately rushed upon his mind, and he was about to secure and examine the packet which she had deposited among his clothes, when the servant of Colonel Stewart again made his appearance, and took up the portmanteau upon his shoulders.

"May I not take out a change of linen, my friend?"

"Your honour shall get one of the Colonel’s ain rugged saris, but he is a week in the way.

And so saying, he very coolly carried off the portmanteau, without waiting further renouncement, leaving our hero in a state where disappointment and indignation struggled for the mastery. In a few minutes he heard a cart rumble out of the rugged court-yard, and made no doubt that he was now disposed, for a space at least, if not for ever, of the only documents which seemed to promise some light upon the dubious events which had of late influenced his destiny. With such melancholy thoughts he had to beguile about four or five hours of solitude.

When this space was elapsed, the tenant of horse was laced in the court-yard, and Colonel Stewart soon after made his appearance to request his guest to take some further refreshment before his departure. The offer was accepted, for a late breakfast had by no means left our hero incapable of doing honour to dinner, which was now presented. The conversation of his host was that of a plain country gentleman, mingled with some salt-like sentiments and expressions. He cautiously avoided any reference to the military operations or civil politics of the time; and to Waverley’s direct inquiries concerning some of the countries, he would say that he was not at liberty to speak upon such topics.

When dinner was finished, the governor arose, and, wishing Edward a good journey, said, that he could not have been more cordially served. Waverley’s servant, that his baggage had been sent forward, he had taken the freedom to supply him with such changes of linen as he might find necessary, till he was again possessed of the company of the dissipated lady. A servant acquainted Waverley an instant afterwards, that his horse was ready.

Upon this hint he descended into the court-yard, and mounted, with a servant and horse, on which he mounted, and saluted from the portal of Doune Castle, attended by about a score of armed men on horseback. These had less the appearance of mounted guards, and more of mounted revenues, and very unexpectedly the man who had suddenly assembled arms from some pressing motive of unexpected emergency. Their uniform, which was blue and red, an affected imitation of that of French chasseur, was made to respect the punctuality of going, and as the said FVyten wad never help me to my rider for sending out naigs against the government, why, conscience? sir, I thought my best chance for payment of my services was to judge, sir, as I have dealt a' my life in化疗s, I think na muckle o' putting my crag in peril of a St. Johnstone's tippet.

"You are not, then, by profession a soldier?" said Waverley.

"Na, na; thank God," answered this doughty parisisan, "I wasna bred at sae short a tether; I was brought up to hack and mangle. I was bred a horse-couper, sir; and if I might live to see you at Whitehaven, or at Stagshawbank, or the white bar at Hawick, and ye wanted a spooker that would lead the lead, I'd see caution I would serve ye e'e; for Jamie Jinker was no spooker that ce innae."

The commander of this small party was mounted upon an excellent hunter, and although dressed in uniform, his change of apparel did not prevent Waverley from recognising the old acquaintance, Mr. Falconer of Balnawhapple.

Now, although the terms upon which Edward had parted with this gentleman were none of the most friendly, he would have sacrificed all recompense of their foolish quarrel, for the pleasure of enjoying once more the social intercourse of question and answer, from which he had been so long secluded. But Edward, amid all this applause of the Baron of Bradwardine, of which Edward had been the unwilling cause, still rankled in the mind of the low-bred, and yet proud lord. He carefully avoided giving the least sign of recognition, riding doggedly at the head of his men, who, though scarce equal in numbers to a scotsman's party, were denominated Captain Falconer's troop, being preceded by a trumpeter, which sounded from time to time, and a standard, borne by Cornet Falconer, the last young brother. The lieutenant, an elderly man, had much the air of a low sportman and boon companion, a ground now, a predominating feature in his countenance on features of a vulgar cast, which indicated habitual intemperance. His cocked hat was not knowing upon one side of his head, and was put aside. But of deference, under low indulgence, and the ince of servitude adulation.

In about two hours' time, the party were near the Castle of Stirling, over whose battlements the sun was bright, and as he was riding along the street by the royal park, which reaches to and surrounds the rock upon which the fortress is situated.

With a mind more at ease, Waverley could not have been more desirous to admire the mixture of romance and reality which rendered the scene through which he was now passing—the field which had been the scene of the tournaments of old—the rock from which the ladies beheld the contest, while each made vows for the success of some favourite knight—the towers of the Gothic church, where these vows might be heard.

"The Judges of the Supreme Court of Session in Scotland are powerfully armed, among the country people. The Folkea.

"To give a complete view of the field, to be select, who's fitter to look after the breaking and the keeping of the poor beasts than myself, that bought and sold every one o' them?"

"A fool's errand, I fear," answered this communitative personage.

"In that case," said Waverley determined not to spare civility, "I should have thought a person of your appearance would not have been found on the road."

"This is true," said the merry and free Jinker, "for the very reason why your horse is there wherefore. Yon moun, ken, the laird there bought a' th' beasts frae me to munt his troon, and agreed to pay for them according to the pound, and I gladly offered me this commission, and as the said FVY TEN wad never help me to my rider for sending out naigs against the government, why, conscience? Sir, I thought my best chance for payment of my services was to judge, sir, as I have dealt a' my life in化疗s, I think na muckle o' putting my crag in peril of a St. Johnstone's tippet."

"You are not, then, by profession a soldier?" said Waverley.

"Na, na; thank God," answered this doughty parisisan, "I wasna bred at sae short a tether; I was brought up to hack and mangle. I was bred a horse-couper, sir; and if I might live to see you at Whitehaven, or at Stagshawbank, or the white bar at Hawick, and ye wanted a spooker that would lead the lead, I'd see caution I would serve ye e'e; for Jamie Jinker was no spooker that ce innae."

The commander of this small party was mounted upon an excellent hunter, and although dressed in uniform, his change of apparel did not prevent Waverley from recognising the old acquaintance, Mr. Falconer of Balnawhapple.

Now, although the terms upon which Edward had parted with this gentleman were none of the most friendly, he would have sacrificed all recompense of their foolish quarrel, for the pleasure of enjoying once more the social intercourse of question and answer, from which he had been so long secluded. But Edward, amid all this applause of the Baron of Bradwardine, of which Edward had been the unwilling cause, still rankled in the mind of the low-bred, and yet proud lord. He carefully avoided giving the least sign of recognition, riding doggedly at the head of his men, who, though scarce equal in numbers to a scotsman's party, were denominated Captain Falconer's troop, being preceded by a trumpeter, which sounded from time to time, and a standard, borne by Cornet Falconer, the last young brother. The lieutenant, an elderly man, had much the air of a low sportman and boon companion, a ground now, a predominating feature in his countenance on features of a vulgar cast, which indicated habitual intemperance. His cocked hat was not knowing upon one side of his head, and was put aside. But of deference, under low indulgence, and the ince of servitude adulation.

In about two hours' time, the party were near the Castle of Stirling, over whose battlements the sun was bright, and as he was riding along the street by the royal park, which reaches to and surrounds the rock upon which the fortress is situated.

With a mind more at ease, Waverley could not have been more desirous to admire the mixture of romance and reality which rendered the scene through which he was now passing—the field which had been the scene of the tournaments of old—the rock from which the ladies beheld the contest, while each made vows for the success of some favourite knight—the towers of the Gothic church, where these vows might be heard.
be paid—and, surmounting all, the fortress itself, at once a castle and palace, where Valour received the prize from royalty, and knights and dames closed the evening amid the revelry of the dance, the song, and the feast. Athelstan flitted to and fro to arouse and interest a romantic imagination.

But Waverly had other objects of meditation, and an incident soon occurred of a nature to disturb meditation of any kind. He saw the cloud of smoke hanging over the heart, as he wielded his little body of cavalry round the base of the castle, commanded his trumpet to sound a flourish, and his standard to be displayed. He could not produce apparently some sensation; for when the cavalcade was at such distance from the southern battery as to admit of a gun being depressed so as to bear upon them, a flash of fire issued from one of the embrasures upon the rock; and ere the report with which it was attended could be heard, the rushing sound of a cannon-ball passed over Balnahashpapple's head, and the bulk, burring itself at a few yards' distance, covered him with the earth which it drove up. There was no need to bid the party trouble. In fact, every man acting upon the impulse of the moment, soon brought his ancient pistols to bear; and the enemy, retreating with more speed than regularity, never took to a trot, as the lieutenant afterwards observed, until an intervening eminence had secured their escape. The remainder of an unimproving cavalcade left a commentator at the post of Stirling Castle. I must do Balnahashpapple, however, the justice to say, that he not only kept the rear of his troop, and laboured to maintain that line of his side, but in the heat of gallantry, answered the fire of the enemy with one of his horse-pistols at the brush-piles; although, the distance being nearly half a mile, I could never learn that this measure of retaliation was attended with any particular effect.

The traveller now passed the memorable field of Bannockburn, and reached the Torwood, a place glorious or terrible to the recollections of the Scottish past. He recalled the words of the travelant Wade Willie Grims, predominant in his recollection.

At Falkirk, a town formerly famous in Scottish history, and now to be again distinguished as the scene of other important events, where Edinburgh was pro\-\[\text{posed to halt and repose for the evening. This was performed with very little regard to military discipline, his worthy quarter-master being chiefly occupied in arrangements for the night where the party might have the best of quarters. Sentinel were deemed unnecessary, and the only visits performed were those of such of the party as could procure liquor. A few resolute men made a habit of it, but of destitute inhabitants some were favourable, many indifferent, and a few overawed. So nothing memorable occurred in the course of the evening, except that Wav\-erly joined the company of the few who werehallowing forth their Jacobite songs, without remorse or mitigation of voice.

Early in the morning they were armed mounted, and on the road to Edinburgh, though the tall visages of some of the troop betrayed that they had spent a night of sleepless demur. They halted at Linlithgow, distinguished by its ancient palace, which, Sixty Years since, was entire and habitable, and whose venerable ruins, not quite Sixty Years since, very narrowly escaped the unworthy fate of being converted into a barrack for French prisoners. May repose and blessings attend the ages of the patriotic statesman, who, amongst his last services to Scotland, interposed to prevent this profanation!

As they approached the metropolis of Scotland, through a champain and cultivated country, the sounds of war began to be heard. The distant, yet distinct report of heavy cannon, fired at intervals, apprised Waverly that the work of destruction was now commenced. The day was calm, and the officer thought it proper to take some precautions, by sending an advanced party in front of his troop, keeping the main body in tolerable order, and moving steadily forward.

The former, which from which they could view Edinburgh stretching along the ridgy hill which slopes eastward from the Castle. The latter, being in a state of siege, or rather of blockade, by the northern insurgents, who had already occupied the town for two or three days, fired at intervals upon such parties of Highlanders as exposed themselves, either on the main street, or elsewhere in the vicinity of the fortress. The morning being calm and fair, the effect of this dropping fire was to invest the Castle in wreaths of smoke, the eddies of which, swolled apparently by the pressure of the4 central veil was darkened ever and anon by fresh clouds poured forth from the battlements; the whole giving, by the partial concealment, an appearance of a cup a mustard-coloured curl or a shrill terror. When Waverly reflected on the cause by which it was produced, and that each explosion might ring some brave man's knell.

For they approached the city, the partial cannonade had wholly ceased. Balnahashpapple, however, having in his recollection the unfriendly greeting which his troop had received from the battery at Stirling, had apparently no wish to tempt the furtherance of the artillery of the Castle. He therefore left the direct road, and sweeping considerably to the southward, so as to keep out of the range of the cannon, approached the wall of the city with more confidence. He soon came in sight of a guard of Highlanders, whose officer conducted them to the door of the building.

A long, low, and ill-proportioned gallery, hung with pictures, afforded to be the portraits of kings, who, if they ever flourished at all, lived several hundred years before the invention of painting in oil colors, which is said at times to confute the story. To the right of the entrance which the adventurous Charles Edward now occupied, the palace of his ancestors. Officers, both in the Highland and Lowland garbs, passed and repassed in haste, or loitered in the hall, as if waiting for orders. Secretaries were engaged in making out passes, muskets, and returns. All seemed busy, and more or less intent upon something of importance; but Waverly was so preoccupied to return scouted in the recess of a window, unnoticed by any one, in anxious reflection upon the crisis of his fate, which seemed now rapidly approaching.

CHAPTER XI.

AN OLD AND A NEW ACQUAINTANCE.

While we were deep sunk in his reveries, the rustle of tarian was heard behind him, a friendly arm clasped his shoulders, and a friendly voice exclaimed,

"The day is come, sir, must I sit here and pocket sooth? Or must second sight go for nothing?"

Waverly turned, and was warmly embraced by Foreux Mac-Ivor. "A thousand welcomes to Holy\-icked!," said Foreux Mac-Ivor. "A thousand welcomes to Holy\-icked to see you, once more to see you, and to see if you will fall into the hands of the Philistines if you parted from us?"

"Dear Foreux!" said Waverly, eagerly returning his greeting; "it is long since I have heard a friend's voice. Where is Flora?"

"Safe, and a triumphant spectator of our success."

"In this place," said Waverly.

"Ay, in this city at least," answered his friend, "and you shall see her, but first you must meet a friend whom you little think of, who has been frequent in his inspirations after you."

Thus saying, he drew Waverly by the arm out of the guard chamber, and, ere he knew where he was conducted, Edward found himself in a presence room, fitted up with some attempt at royal state.

A young man, wearing his own fair hair, distinguished by the dignity of his mien and the noble expression of his well-formed and regular features, advanced and introduced each of military and Highland chiefs, by whom he was surrounded. In his easy and graceful manners Waverly afterwards thought he could have discovered his high birth and rank, although they at first marked him as a poor, borderer of the country. At his knee, he had not appeared as its indications.
WARWICK.

"Let me present to your Royal Highness," said Fergus, bowing profoundly—

"The descendant of one of the most ancient and royal families in England," said the young Chevalier, interrupting him. "I beg your pardon for interrupting you, my dear Mac-Ivor; but no master of ceremonies is necessary to present a Waverley to a Stewart.

The saying, he extended his hand to Edward with the utmost courtesy, who could not, had he desired it, have avoided rendering him the homage which seemed due to his rank, and was certainly the right of his station. But he understood, Mr. Waverley, that, owing to circumstances which have been as yet but ill explained, you have suffered some restraint among your followers in Perthshire, and on your march here we are in such a situation that we hardly know our friends, and I am even at this moment uncertain whether I can have the pleasure of considering Mr. Waverley as among mine.

He then paused for an instant; but before Edward could adjust a suitable reply, or even arrange his ideas as to its purport, the Prince took out a paper, and then proceeded:—"If I should indeed have no doubts upon this subject, I have been solicited to act by a man of consideration, set forth by the friends of the Elector of Hanover, in which they rank Mr. Waverley among the nobility and gentry who are menaced with the pains of exile and separation from their native soil. But I desire to gain intimation, and freedom to press upon, and free permission to do so; and I can only regret that my present power will not extend to protect him against the probable consequences of such a measure. But I remove this from my mind, and after another short pause, "if Mr. Waverley should, like his ancestor, Sir Nigel, determine to embrace a cause which has little to recommend it but its justice, and follow a principle of Conscience, at the head of his people to recover the throne of his ancestors, or perish in the attempt, I can only say, that among these nobles and gentlemen he will find worthy associates in a gallant enterprise, and will follow a master who may be unfortunate, but I trust, will never be ungrateful.

The political Chief of the race of Ivor knew his advice would be acted upon, and informed his message by the royal Adventurer. Unaccustomed to the address and manner of a polished court, in which Charles was eminently skilful, his words and his manner were naturally the less effective in conveying his ideas of a hero of romance; to be counted by him in the ancient halls of his paternal palace, recovered by the sword which he was already bending towards other conquests, gave Edward, in his own eyes, the dignity and importance which he had ceased to consider as his attributes. Rejected, slandered, and threatened upon the one side, he was irresistibly attracted to the cause which the prejudices of education, and the political principles of his family, had already recommended as the most just. These thoughts rushed through his mind like a torrent, sweeping before them every consideration of an opposite tendency—the time, besides, admitted of no deliberation,—and Waverley, kneeling to Charles Edward, devoted his heart and sword to the vindication of his rights.

The Prince for, although unfortunate in the faults and foibles of his forefathers, we shall here, and elsewhere, give him the title due to his birth) raised Waverley from the ground, and embraced him with an expression which the heroic countenance of the Chevalier could not fail to acknowledge. "I have no doubt," he added, "that you will not distrust my good faith; for besides, I have not forgotten the services which you have rendered to his Highness, the Duke of York, and who, I am sure, would do his utmost to procure you a passport to Germany, even had he not been a slave under the express stipulation, that he should be assisted by an army of Swiss mercenaries, in order to facilitate his escape. To prevent you from hurrying your escape would be desperate. Wishing well to his cause, these enemies, now, and were it possible, to give you an opportunity to pass through France, I can only say, that, if you are not cooly and quietly to the end; and I wish you a good voyage to your destination. But if you are in France, I promise you that I shall not fail to give you all the assistance in my power."

"I am, my lord, your obedient servant," answered Edward, "and I shall not fail to take the most grateful notice of your kind intentions."

"You are now, my lord," replied the Chevalier, "as we were in the north, in Scotland, we shall be in France. But although the great families of the Whig party have taken the side of the King, and are not disposed to follow the exiles, we shall be sure to find friends among the people, and I am sure, also, that my dear Mac-Ivor repeatedly for having brought him such an adherent, and presented Waverley to the various noblemen, chiefs, and officers with whom he had conversed, as the highest hopes and prospects, in whose bold and enthusiastic avowal of his cause, they might see an omen of the sentiments of the English families of
WAVERLEY.

The officers who use these last arguments, among whom is your friend Ferguson Mac-Ivor, maintain that you cannot overlook them. I have dedicated this book to the unusual military discipline of Europe, the soldiers whom they are to encounter are no less strangers to their peculiar and formidable mode of attack, that the attachment of the whole of the soldiers to the service of the chief and gentlemen is not to be doubted; and that as they will be in the midst of the enemy, their clanmen will as surely follow them in fine, that having drawn the sword we should throw away the scabbard, and trust our cause to battle and to the God of battles. Will Mr. Waverley favour us, with his opinion in these arduous circumstances? I have been assured high betwixt pleasure and modesty at the distinction implied in this question, and answered, with equal spirit and readiness, that he could not venture to offer an opinion as derived from military skill, but that the counsel would be far the most acceptable to him which would itself afford him an opportunity to evince his zeal in his Royal Highness's service.

"Spoken like a Waverley!" answered Charles Edward; "and that you may hold a rank in some degree corresponding to your name, allow me, instead of the captain's commission which you have lost, to offer you a share in the seventy-six regiment, with the advantage of acting as one of my aids-de-camp until you can be attached to a regiment of which I hope several will be speedily embodied.

"The general direction of some of our regiments will be given to the forty-five," answered Waverley, (for his collection turned to Balmainappol and his scanty troop), "if I decline accepting any rank until the time and place where I may have intermediate offices sufficient to make my command useful to your Royal Highness's service. In the meanwhile, I hope for your permission to serve as a volunteer under my friend Ferguson Mac-Ivor.

"At least," said the Prince, who was obviously pleased with this proposal, "allow me the pleasure of arming you after the Highland fashion. With these words, he unburdened the bundswardo which he wore, the belt of which was plated with silver, and the steel basket-hilt richly and curiously inlaid. "The blade," said the Prince, "is a genuine Andrea Ferrara; it has been a sort of heirloom in our family; but I am convinced I put it into better hands than my own, and will add to it pistols of the same workmanship. Colonel Mac-Ivor, you must have much to say to the Prince, and I will detain you no longer from your private conversation; but remember, we expect you both to attend us in the evening. It may be perhaps the last night we may enjoy in these halls, and I shall be content with a quiet conscience, we will spend the day of battle merrily."

CHAPTER XII.

THE MYSTERY BEGINS TO BE CLEARED UP.

"How do you like him?" was Ferguson's first question, as they descended the large stone staircase.

"A prince to live and die under," was Waverley's enthusiastic answer.

"I knew you would think so when you saw him, and I intended you should have met earlier, but was prevented by your pain. And yet he has his foibles, or rather he has difficult cards to play, and his Irish officers, who are much about him, are but sorry.

Divisions early showed themselves in the Chevalier's little army, not only amongst the independent chieftains, who were far too proud to brook submission to another, but between the Scot, who had served under his majesty, and Governor O'Sullivan, who was very young, and the Sassenach, who, with some of his countrymen bred in the Irish Br-Br, made in the ranks of the Lowland French, had had no experience with the Prince of France, but were sensible that the Chevalier made the chief or rather the only vehicle of his enterprise. There were, however, but faint ties, between Lord George Murray, and John Murray of Bront, the Prince of France, had a candidate of the Sassenach, and the Sassenach the Prince, of the Scots. In general, a thousand differing prepossession, and petty grudge, in the army, and finally contributed in no small degree to its overthrow.
dence) in his own great name! Upon my honour, if I live to see the caim of Fenimore again, I shall be tempted to hang that fellow! I recognize his hand papered with the blood of a canting rascal Gilfian, and I have little doubt that Donald himself played the part of the pedlar on that occasion; but how he should not have plundered you, or put you to further pain—you know I could ask him to explain particulars—and requested my opinion about disposing of you. I recommended that you should be brought here as a prisoner, because I did not wish to prejudice you further with the English government, in case you pursued your purpose of going southward. I knew nothing, you must recollect, of the charge brought against you of aiding and abetting, a higher reason, which, I presume, he had some share in changing your original plan. That sullen, good-for-nothing brute, Balmawhapple, was sent to escort you from Doune, with what he calls his troop of professional soldiers. I was unable to bear down to that natural antipathy to every thing that resembles a gentleman, I presume his adventure with Bradwardine rakes in his recollection, the rather that I dare say he was called up to the service, from the very reports which reached your quondam regiment.

"Very likely," said Waverley; "but now surely, my dear Fergus, you may find time to tell me something of Flora.

"Why," replied Fergus, "I can only tell you that she is well, and residing for the present with a relation in this city. I thought better she should come here in the course of this present occasion, rather than attend our military court; and I assure you, that there is a sort of consequence annexed to the near relative of such a person as Flora Mac-Ivor, and where there is such a hustling of claim and counter-claims, a man must use every fair means to enhance his importance."

There was something in this last sentence which grated on Waverley's feelings. He could not hear that Flora should be considered as conducing to his brother's preferment, by the admiration which she must unquestionably attract; and although it was in strict correspondence with many points of Fergus's character, he had no wish to intrude it on his sister's high mind and his own independent pride. Fergus, to whom such manoeuvres were familiar, as to one brought up at the French court, did not observe the faint frown which had unawares made upon his friend's mind, and concluded by saying, "that they could hardly see Flora before the evening, when she would be at the concert and ball, with which the Prince's party was to be entertained."

She and I had a quarrel about her not appearing to take leave of you. I am unwilling to renew it, by soliciting her to receive you this morning; and perhaps my doing so might not only be unfeelingly, but prevent your meeting this evening."

While thus conversing, Waverley heard in the court, before the windows of the parlour, a well-known voice. "Mr. Waverley," said a voice of partisans, who had come up to him, "that it is a total dereliction of military discipline; and were you not as it were a tyrant, your purpose would deserve strong repudiation. For a prisoner of war is on no account to be coerced with letters, or doled out in erga tuum, as would have been the case had you put this gentleman into the pit of the peal-house at Balmawhapple. I grant, indeed, that it is a matter for security to be coerced in your career, that is, in a public prison."

The growing voice of Balmawhapple was heard as taking leave in displeasure, but the word "handicapped" was loudly repeated by the company who had listened before Waverley reached the house, in order to greet the worthy Baron of Bradwardine. The uniform in which he was now attired, a blue coat, namely, with gold lace, a scarlet waistcoat and march.
CHAPTER XLII.
A SOLDIER'S DINNER.

JAMES OF THE NEEDLE was a man of his word, when whisky was no party to the contract; and upon this occasion Callum Beg, who still thought himself in Waverley's debt, since he had declined accepting compensation at the expense of mine Host of the Candlestick's person, took the opportunity of discharging the obligation, by mounting guard over the heraldic tablet of St. Andrew, and so, as he expressed himself, "tailed him tightly until the finishing of the job." To rid himself of this restraint, Shemus's needle flew through the tartan like lightning; and as the shadows, richly bearded and sceptred, of Macon, he accomplished at least three stitches to the death of every hero. The dress was, therefore, soon ready, for the short coat fitted the wearer, and the rest of the costume was little adjusted to his person; a spirit of fire and a head of iron.

Our hero having now fairly assumed the "garb of old Gaul," well calculated as it was to give an appearance of strength to a figure, which, though tall and well-made, was rather elegant than robust, I hope my fair readers will excuse him if he looked at himself in the mirror more than once, and could not help acknowledg that the reflection seemed that of a very handsome young fellow. In fact, there was no disguising it. His light-brown hair, for he wore no wig, notwithstanding the universal fashion of the time, became the bonnet which surmounted it. His person promised firmness and agility, to which the ample folds of the tartan added an airy of dignity. His blue eye seemed of that kind.

"Which method to have, and which kindled in war," and an air of boldness, which was in reality the effect of want of habitual intercourse with the world, gave interest to his features, without injuring their gravity and independence.

"It's a pretty man—a very pretty man," said Evan Dhu (now Euskin Maccombie) to Fergus's bosom fellow.

"I was well," said the Widow Flockhart, "but no manch was well-far'd as your colonel, ensign.

"I wasn't comparing you, madam," said Evan, "nor was I speaking about his being well-favoured; but only that Mr. Waverley looks clean-made and deliver'd as like a proper lad o' his quarters, that will not try my lady in a blush. And, indeed, he's a little anachronism to a broadsword and tartar. I have played w' him mysel' in various quarters, and I've seen him vich Ian Vohr, the son of a Sunday afternoon.'

"Lord forgive ye, Euskin Maccombie," said the alarmed Presbyter; "I'm sure the colonel will never do the like of that!"

"Hunt! Hunt! Mrs. Flockhart," replied the ensign, "we're young blude, ye ken; and young sailes, sailes!"

"But will ye fight w' Sir John Cope the mor. Euskin Maccombie?" demanded Mrs. Flockhart her ensign.

"Truth I' I say, ensign, an he'll lead us, Mr. Flockhart," replied the Galg.

"And will ye face that bearing shields, the dragoons, Euskin Maccombie? again inquired the landlord.

"Claw for claw, as Conan said to Satan, Mrs. Flockhart, and the duxill tak the shortest nails!"

"And will the colonel venture on the baggins himself?"

"Ye may swear it, Mrs. Flockhart; the very fist man will be he, by Saint Plutar!"

"Merciful goodness! and if he's killed among red-coats!" exclaimed the soft-hearted widow.

"Truth, ensign, and may the Lord be wi' ye! I ken ane that will no be living toweep for him. For we mean a' live the day, and have our dinner; and there's Vich Ian Vohr has packed his dorch, and my master Waverley's weared wi' majoring youth, and the muckle pier-glass; and that gray auld stoat creak, the Baron o' Bradwardine, that shut young Rollo of Balleknorke, he's coming down the close w' that draughtling castihing baleh body they ca'y it; and whupp, just like the Laird o' Kitleg's Front coo, wi' his turnspit doggie trilling ahi'm, and I am as hungry as a gied, my bonny bow, as bi Kate set o' me, and do ye wot for? A virgin; for ye ken Vich Ian Vohr wan no sit down till ye be at the head o' the table; and dinna forget the pot heepple o' brandy, my woman."

This hint produced Mr. Flockhart, sitting in her weeds like the sun through a mist, took the head of the table, thinking within herself, perhaps that she cared not how long the rebellion lasted, that her lord brought her into company so much above her used associates. She was supported by Waverley and the Baron, with the advantage of the Chiefman rur. The men of peace and of war, that is, Bailie MacIvor and his Macweeblies, the chief of whom was profound conges to their superiors and each other, took their places on each side of the Chiefman. That fare was excellent, time, place, and circumstances being considered, and the table was a spirit high. Regardless of danger, and sanguine from top, youth, and ambition, he saw in imagination all his prospects crowned with success, and was totally indifferent to the probable alternative of a soldier's grave. The Baron apologized slightly for bringing Macweeblies. They had been providing, he said, for the expenses of the campaign. And, by my faith," said the old man, "as I think this will be my last, just end where I began—I ha'e evermore found the sinews of war, as a learned author calls the corps militaire, mair difficult to come by than either flesh, blood, or bone."

"What have you raised up our only efficient body of cavalry, and got ye none of the louts—d'or out of the Donelle, to help you?"

"No, Ginnaquoch; clever fellows have been before me."

"That's a scandal," said the young Highlander;

"but you will share what is left of my subsidy; it will save us all expensive business to go, and we will be all one to-morrow, for we shall all be provided for, one way or other, before the sun sets." Waverley, blushing deeply, but with great earnestness, pressed the same request again.

"The Donellev was an armed vessel, which brought a small supply of money and arms from France for the use of the insurgents."

"That's a scandal," said the young Highlander;
"I thank ye, lady, my good lady," said the Baron, but I will not infringe upon your pension. Ballie Macwebslie has provided the sum which is necessary.

Here the Ballie shifted and fidgeted about in his seat and appeared extremely uneasy. At length, after several preliminary hems, and much tautologi-ical expression of his devotion to his honour's service, by night or day, living or dead, he began to intone that the Banks had removed a thirteen score of cash into the Castle; that, nay doubt Sandie Goldie, the silversmith, would mind for his honour; but there was little time to get the waistcoat made out; so, being short of cash, or, Mr. Waverley, could accommodate——

"Let me hear of no such nonsense, sir," said the Baron, in a tone which rendered Macwebslie une-told. " Never mind, Ballie," said Fasson Mac-combie, "for the gude auld times of rugged and ri-vling (pulling and tearing) are come back again, an' Snickers Mac-Snackers (meaning, probably, annexus, convexus) for a third of our friends, man's gie place to the latter claymores.

And that claymore shall be ours, Ballie," said the Chiefman, who saw that Macwebslie looked very blank at this intimation.

"We'll give the fields and our mountain afores, tallaghans, bullens a la. And in place of law and swords, we'll pay with broadwords, Laws, les., &c.
With ams and with deekles we will soo clear our score,
For the man that thus paid will crave payment no more,
Laws, les., &c.

But come, Ballie, be not cast down; drink your wine with a jovous heart; the Baron shall return safe and victorious to Tully-Veolan, and unite Killaneuric's headship with his own, since the cowardly half-bred swine will not turn out for the Primer like a gentleman."

"To be sure, they lie maist est-wast," said the Rae-lie, wipping his eyes, "and should naturally fit under the same frame.

And I preserved the Chiefman, "shall take care of myself too; for you must know, I have to complete a good work here, by bringing Mrs. Flockhart into the bosom of the Catholic church, or at least the half way, so to your honour, and I trust to your willingly remain silent. Perhaps he had better carry the goud to Miss Mac-Yor, in case of mortality, or sanity; so the moment you hear her is put to the case donation in the young leddy's favour, and wast but the scrape of a pen to make it out.
The young lady," said Fassion, "should such an event happen, will have other matters to think of than these wretched lousis-dor!"

"True—undeniable—there's nae doubt o' that;
but your honour kens that a full sorrow."

"Is endurable by most folk, aye, and by most for much more easily than a hungry one?"—"True, Ballie, very true, and I believe there may even be some who would be consolcd by such a reflection for the loss of the whole existing generation, and there is a sorrow and a hunger neither nor thirst; and poor Flora."

He paused, and the whole company sympathized in his emotion.

The Baron's thoughts naturally reverted to the unprotected state of his daughter, and the big tear came to the veteran's eye. "If I fall, Macwebslie, you have all my papers, and know all my affairs; be just and careful."

The Ballie was a man of earthy mould, after all, a good deal of dirt and gross about him, undoubtedly, but some kindly and just feelings he had, especially where the Baron or his young mistress were concerned. He saw a lot of his land in the hands of the now? a good deal of force should come, while Duncan Macwebslie had a bottleneck, it should be Miss Rose's. He wals

Whil versed Robertson of Struan, Chief of the Clan Donnochy, (unless the claims of Laidie ought to be preferred primo loco,) has thus elegantly rendered:

“For croust love has gart’nd low my leg, and with my back is carft, and my bairies in a phislick.”

“Or rather,” said Fergus, “hear my song:

‘She wadna hae a Lowland laird,
But she’s a’ with Duncan Grame,
Now her in his plaid.”

By this time they reached the palace of Holyrood, and were announced respectively as they entered the apartments.

It was not too well known how many gentlemen of rank, education, and fortune, took a concern in the ill-fated and desperate undertaking of 1745. The ladies, also, of Scotland very generally espoused the cause of the gallant and handsome young Prince, who threw himself upon the mercy of his countrymen, rather like a hero of romance than a calculating politician. It is not, therefore, to be wondered that Edward, who had spent the greater part of his life in the service of Waverley, the present heir of Waverley, had been dazzled at the liveliness and elegance of the scene now exhibited in the long-deserted halls of the Scottish palace. The accompaniments, indeed, fell on his ear with such a perfect and hurried manner as to have some effect on his feelings; and, still, however, he was too much restrained, and the rank of the company considered, might well be called brilliant.

It was not long before the lover’s eye discovered the object of his attachment. Flora Mac-Ivor was in the act of returning to her seat, near the top of the room, with Rose Bradwardine by her side. Among much intelligence and beauty, they had attracted a great degree of the public attention, being certainly two of the handsomest women present. The Prince took much notice of both, particularly of Flora, with whom he was now acquainted, which she probably owed to her foreign education, and command of the French and Italian languages.

When the bustle attending the conclusion of the dance permitted, Edward, almost intuitively, followed Fergus to the place where Miss Mac-Ivor was seated. The sensation of hope, with which he had nursed his affection in absence of the beloved object, seemed to vanish in her presence, and, like one striving to recover the particulars of a forgotten dream, he would have given the world at that moment to have recollected the grounds on which he had found the expectation so now vanished. He accompanied Fergus with downcast eyes, tinging ears, and the feelings of the criminal, who, while the melancholy cart moves slowly through the crowds that load it with gold, beheld his exclamation, receives no clear sensation either from the noise which fills his ears, or the tumult on which he casts his wandering look.

Flora seemed a little—a very little—affected and discomposed at his approach. “I bring you an adopted son of Ivor,” said Fergus.

“I and receive him as a second brother,” replied Flora.

“There was a slight emphasis on the word, which would have escaped every ear but one that was feverish with apprehension. It was, however, distinctly marked, and, combined with her whole tone and manner, plainly intimated, “I will never think of Mr. Waverley as a more intimate connexion.” Edward stopped, bowed, and looked at Fergus, who bit his lip; a movement of anger, which proved that he also had, if not formed an interpretation on which he could see any connexion which his sister had given his friend. “This, then, is the end of my day’s dream!” Such was Waverley’s first thought, and it was exquisitely painful to the Chevalier, who had been aware of his good.

These words, which she uttered with great emotion, were overheard by the Chevalier himself, who stepped hastily forward, and, taking Waverley by the hand, inquired kindly after his health, and added that he wished to speak with him. By a strong and sudden effort, which the circumstances rendered in dispensable, Waverley recovered himself so far as to fall to the Chevalier in silence to a recess in the apartment.”

Here the Prince detained him some time, asking various questions about the great Tory and Catholic families of England, their connection with the Chevalier, and the state of their affections towards the house of Stewart. To these queries Edward could not at any time have given more than general answers, as he may be supposed to have, in the present state of his feelings, his responses were indistinct even to confusion. The Chevalier smiled once or twice at the incongruity of his replies, but continued the same style of conversation, their intentions, and the possibility of an honest occupation of the principal share of it until he perceived that Waverley had recovered his presence of mind. It is probable that this long silence was partly meant to further the idea which the Prince desired should be entertained among his followers, that Waverley was a character of politics, influence, but it appeared, from his concluding expressions, that he had a different and good-natured motive, perhaps to take a step nearer to his own objects, or to have a chance of expressing from his reason, “I cannot resist the temptation,” he said, “of boasting of my own discretion as a lady’s confidant. You see, Mr. Waverley, that I know all, and will trust only to myself. All that I have told you is not to be betrayed to any one, but my good young friend, you must put a more strict restraint upon your feelings. There are many here whose eyes can see as clearly as mine, but the preservation of whose tongues may not be equal to trust.”

So saying, he turned easily away, and joined a circle of officers at a few steps’ distance, leaving Waverley, overwhelmed by this unexpected expression, which though not intelligible to him in its whole purport was sufficiently so in the caution which the last words recommended. Mending, therefore, an effort to shov’d off from himself, he moved toward Flora, who had expressed, by instant obedience to his room, a desire to walk up to the spot where Flora and Miss Bradwardine were still seated, and having made his compliments to the latter, he succeeded, even beyond his own expectation, in entering into conversati on upon general topics.

If, my dear reader, thou hast ever happened to talk post-horses at — or — or — (one at a time of blanks, or more probably both, you will be able to fill up from an inn near your own residence,) you must have observed, and doubtless with sympathetic delight, that in the beginning, the middle, and at first appearance of their necks to the collars of the harness. But when the irresistible arguments of the post-boy have prevailed upon them to proceed a mile or two, they will become sensible of the agitation and being worn in the harness, as the said post-boy may term it, proceed as if their withers were altogether unwrung. This simile so much corresponds with the state of Waverley’s feelings in the course of this memorable evening, that I prefer it (especially as being, I trust, wholly original) to any more splendid illustration, with which Bythe’s Art of Poetry might supply me.

Exempt, like virtue, is its own reward; and our hero had, moreover, other stimulating motives for persevering in a display of affected composure and indifference to Flora’s obvious unkindness. Pride, which supplies its continuing sensation, is an useful though severe remedy for the wounds of affection, came rapid and to his aid. Distinguished by the favour of a Prince destined, he had room to hope, to play a conspicuous part in the situation on which he could see any connection which his sister had given his friend. “This, then, is the end of my day’s dream!” Such was Waverley’s first thought, and it was exquisitely painful to the Chevalier, who had been aware of his good.

With the feeling expressed in these beautiful lines
WAVERLEY.

Waverley determined upon convincing Flora that he was not to be depressed by a rejection, in which case, his vast expectations of receiving a reply, and whispered that perhaps she did her own prospects as much injustice as his. And, to aid this change of feeling, there lurked the secret and unacknowledged hope, that Flora might more readily come to the same conclusion when she did not conceive it to be altogether within her own choice to attract or repulse it. There was a musing tone of encouragement, also, in the Cherubiny's address, and one might almost refer to the wishes of Fergus in favour of an union between him and his sister. But the whole circumstances of time, place, and incident, combined at once to throw a gloomy and decisive tone of conduct, leaving to fate to dispose of the issue. Should he appear to be the only one and disheartened on the eve of battle, how could it be the case when the splendid victory which had been already but too busy with his fame? Never, never, he internally resolved, shall my unprovoked enemies possess such an advantage over my reputation.

Under the influence of these mixed sensations, and cheered at times by a smile of intelligence and imagination, Waverley exerted his powers of fancy, animation, and eloquence, and attracted the general admiration of the company. The conversation gradually assumed the tone of a tour of romance, the students, the talents and accomplishments of the company were evinced. The gayety of the evening was exalted in character, rather than checked, by the approaching dangers of the morrow. All nerves were strained for the future, and presentiments were strong these circumstances, which his presence were altogether free from the haughty restraint by which, in a moment of less excitement, they were usually clouded, gave universal delight. It was by no means to be supposed that a gentleman who regarded him with a degree of coldness and reserve; yet even she could not suppress a sort of wonder at talents, in which, in the course of their acquaintance, she had never been displayed with equal brilliancy and impressive effect. I do not know whether she might not feel a momentary regret at having taken so decisive a resolution upon the address of a lover, who seemed so well fitted to fill a high place in the highest stations of society. Certainly she had hitherto accounted among the incalculable deficiencies of Edward's disposition, the want of courage; which, as she had been educated in the first foreign circles, and was little acquainted with the shyness of English manners, was in her opinion, too nearly related to timidity and imbecility of disposition. But if a passion which could have been unmasking and attractive, its influence was momentary, for circumstances had arisen since they met, which could have been the season that she had formed and respecting him, final and irrevocable.

With opposite feelings, Rose Bradfordine bent her whole soul to listen. She felt a secret triumph at the announcement, which she had been so full of, that Edward was going to the Holyrood, and that she had been invited to the castle. She was determined to prize too early and too fondly. Without a thought of jealousy, without a feeling of fear, pain, or doubt, and undisturbed by a single selfish consideration, she entered, in her eyes, the resolution she had formed respecting him, final and irrevocable.

câ the King's Park,* and many one's on his side thanks the day that will be carried on their folk's ere nightage.

Waverley sprang up, and, with Callum's assistance and instructions, adjusted his tarrans in proper costume. Callum told him also, "tis his leather dorlac wi' the lock on her was come frae Doune, and she awa again in the wain wi' Vich Ian Vohr's waist.

By this periphery Waverley readily apprehended his portmanteau was intended. He thought upon the mule, the poorest of the lot of the cavalry, which seemed always to escape him when he was in his very grasp. But this was no time for indulgence of curiosity; and having declined Mrs. Fluckhart's compliments, made a hasty exit, and hastened away, probably the only man in the Chevalier's army by whom such a courtesy would have been rejected, he made his adieux, and departed with Callum.

"Callum," said he, "as they proceeded down a dirty close to gain the southern skirts of the Canongate, "what shall I do for a horse?"

"Ta deel and ye maun think o'," said Callum.

"Vich Ian Vohr's Marching on foot at the head of his kins, (not to say ta Prince, who does the like) wi' his target on his shoulder; and ye maun cen be neighbour-like and help me. And so I will, Callum—give me my target;—so there are fixed. How does it look?"

"Like the bra' Highlander tat's painted on the board afore the clack change-house they ca' Luckie Middlesmaas," said Callum. I must observe, a high compliment for, in his opinion, Luckie Middlesmaas's sign was an exquisite specimen of art. Waverley, however, not feeling the full force of this poltroon simile, agreed to make the best of the situation.

Upon extricating themselves from the mean and dirty suburbs of the metropolis, and emerging into the open air, Waverley felt a renewal both of health and spirits, and became, for the third time, conscious of the events of the preceding evening, and with hope and resolution towards those of the approaching day.

When he had surrounded a small craggy eminence, called St. Leonard's Hill, the King's Park, or the hollow between the mountain of Arthur's seat, and the rising grounds on which the southern part of Edinburgh is now built, lay beneath him, and displayed a singular and animating prospect. It was occupied by the army of the Highlanders, now in the act of preparing for their march. Waverley had already seen something of the kind at the burning meeting with Prince Charles I., but this was on a scale of much greater magnitude, and incomparably deeper interest. The rocks, which formed the back-ground of the scene, and the very sky itself, seemed to move and transform with the numbers and movements of the troops, each with his appropriate pibroch, his chief and clan. The mountaineers, rousing themselves from their couch under the canopy of heaven, with the hum and bustle of a confused and irregular multitude, like bees alarmed and arming in their hives, seemed to possess all the pliability of movement fitted to execute military manoeuvres. Their motions appeared spontaneous and confused, but the result was order and regularity; so that a general must have praised the conclusion, though a martinet might have ridiculed the method by which it was attained.

The arming of the Highlanders the last day was the lazy perambulations of the various clans under their respective banners, for the purpose of getting into the order of march, which was itself a gay and lively spectacle. They had no tents to strike, having generally, and by choice, slept upon the open field, although the autumn was now waning, and the nights began to be frosty. For a little space, while they were getting into this natural order of things, bustle and confusion, and confused appearance of wavy tartsans and floating plumes, and of banners displaying the proud gathering word of Clannmod, Gordon Cokers—Gordon Rosses and Glares, the Mac-Farlanes; Farke, Fortune, and all the fell descent from Comhial, the father of Finn or Fingal, were a sort of Gibbonites, or hereditary servants to the unhappy monarch of that name, were subjects to the Morays, and clan Donnchay, or Robertson of Abholé; and many other examples might be given which show how far the spirit of chivalry which may yet be left, and thereby drawing a Highland tempest into the shop of my publisher.

Now these same Hebrides, though forced into the field by the arbitrary authority of the chiefs under whom they were, was as the sound of these, in their turn, was perceived to occupy their station as the advanced guard, and to push on reconnoitering parties to ascertain and repel the motions of the enemy. They vanished from Waverley's eye as they wheeled round the base of Arthur's Seat, under the remarkable ridge of ba-saltic rocks which fronts the little lake of Duddngston.
The infantry followed in the same direction, regulating their pace by another body which occupied a road more to the southward. It cost Edward some exertion of activity to attain the place which Fergus's followers occupied in the line of march.

CHAPTER XLV.

AN INCIDENT GIVES RISE TO UNAVAILING REFLECTIONS.

When Waverley reached that part of the column which was filled by the clan of Mac-Ivor, they halted, formed, and were then drawn up in two lines, and a broad shout of the men, most of whom knew him personally, and were delighted to see him in the three of the country and of their sept.

"You shall have the honor of a neighbouring clan to Evan Dhu," as if the chief was just "Mar a Brn is a brothair, if it be not Bran, it is Bran's brother," was the proverbial reply of Maccomish.

"O, then, it is the handsome Sassenach Dunh-wessel, that is to be married to Lady Flora?"

"That may be, or it may not be; and it is neither your matter nor mine, Gregory."

Fergus advanced to embrace the volunteer, and afford him a warm and hearty welcome; but he thought it necessary for the diminished number of his battalion, which did not exceed three hundred men, by observing, he had sent a good many out upon parties.

The real fact, however, was, that the defection of Donald Bean Linn had deprived him of at least thirty harpies, whose services he had fully reckoned upon, and that many of his occasional adherents had been recalled by several chief's to the standards of which they most properly owed their allegiance.

The chief of the great northern branch also of his own clan, had mustered his people, although they had not yet received any official notification or for the Chevalier, and by his intrigue had in some degree diminished the force with which Fergus took the field. To make amends for these disappointments, it was universally admitted that the followers of Veil Ian Vohr, in point of appearance, equipment, arms, and dexterity in using them, equaled the most choice troops which followed the standard of Charles Edward. Old Ballenreich acted as his major; and, with the other officers who had known Waverley when at Glennaquich, gave our hero a cordial reception, as the sharer of their future dangers and expected honours.

The route pursued by the Highland army, after

But yet they are but simple men

The Highlanders are pretty men
But yet they are not naked men

Would face the cannon ball.

But the Highlanders of 1745 had got far beyond the nonsense of their forefathers and throughout the whole way little dived artillery, although the common people still attached some importance to the possession of the field-piece, which led to this disappointment.

But, the well-known song of Flinzel, is often the "home of Highland proverbs as well as songs."
leaving the village of Duddingstone, was, for some time, the common post-road between Edinburgh and Haddington, until they crossed the Esk, at Musselburgh, and followed the low grounds towards the sea, they turned more inland, and occupied the brow of the eminence called Carberry Hill, a place already distinguished in Scottish history, as the scene of movements that spread in many places far and wide, and where it was hoped the Highlanders might find an opportunity of attacking them to advantage. The army therefore halted upon the ridge of Carberry Hill, both to refresh the soldiers and as a central situation, from which their march could be directed to any point that the motions of the enemy might render most advisable. While they remained in this position, a messenger arrived in haste to desire Mac-Ivor to come to the Prince, adding, that their advanced post had heard a skirmish with some of the enemy's cavalry, and that the Baron of Braddawilie had sent in a few prisoners.

Waverley walked forward out of the line to satisfy his curiosity, and soon observed five or six of the troopers, who, covered with dust, had galloped in to announce that the enemy were in full march towards the coast along the coast. Passing still a little farther on, he was struck with a groan which issued from a hollow. He approached the spot, and heard a voice, in a tone of agony, which seemed to be uttered by a native of his own country, which endeavoured, though frequently interrupted by pain, to repeat the Lord's Prayer. The voice of distress always found a ready answer in our hero's bosom. He hastened towards the hollow, which seemed to be intended for what is called, in the pastoral counties of Scotland, a "smearing-house;" and in its obscurity Edward could only at first discern a sort of red bundle; for those who had stripped the wounded man of his arms, and part of his clothes, had left him the dragoon's cloak in which he was enveloped.

"For the love of God," said the wounded man, as he heard Waverley's step, "give me a single drop of water!"

"You shall have it," answered Waverley, at the same time raising him in his arms, bearing him to the door of the hut, and giving him some drink from his flask.

"I should know that voice," said the man; but, looking on Waverley's face with a bewildered look,—"that's young Carr,"

This was the common phrase by which Edward was distinguished on the estate of Waverley-Honour, and the sound now thrilled to his heart with the thousand recollections which the well-known accents of his native country, had already contributed to awaken. "Houghton!" he said, gazing on the ghastly features which death was fast disfiguring,—"tell this be you?"

"I never thought to hear an English voice again," said the wounded man; "they left me to live or die here as I could, when they found I would say nothing aloud of the wrong done me. I know not how could you stay from us so long, and let us be thus tampered with. I am Ruftin—we should have followed you through flood and fire, to break this."

"Ruftin! I assure you, Houghton, you have been visibly imposed upon," said Edward; "I will get you a surgeon presently."

"I often thought so," said Houghton; "though they thought they had me, Timms was shot, and I was reduced to the ranks."

"Do not exhaust your strength in speaking," said Edward; "I will get you a surgeon presently."

"I had no strength to suffer. I was now returning from head-quarters, where he had attended a council of war, and hastened to meet him. "Brave news!" shouted the chief; "we shall be at it in less than two hours. The Prince has put himself at the head of the advance, and, as he drew his sword, called out, 'My friends, I have thrown away the scabbard. Come, Waverley, we move instantly.'"

"A more desperate conflict is now to come," said the prisoner; "where shall I find a surgeon?"

"Why, where should you? We have none, we know, but two or three French fellows, who believe, are little better herself yet of her insurmountable."

"But the man will bleed to death."

"Poor fellow!" said Fergus, in a momentary fit of compassion; then instantly added, "But it will be a thousand men's fault, no matter who."

"I cannot; I tell you he is a son of a tenant of my uncle's."

"O, there's a follower of yours, he must he looked to; I shall find Callum to it. Disturb not—call milling mollightheart," continued the impatient Chevalier, "what made an old soldier like Bradward, send dying men here to cumber us?"

Callum came with his usual airiness; and indeed Waverley rather gained than lost in the opinion of the Highlanders, by his anxiety about the wounded man. They would not have understood the secret in which he was involved, and the Scottish philanthropy, which rendered it almost impossible for Waverley to have passed any person in such distress but apprehending that the sufferer was one of a following, they unanimously allowed that Waverley's conduct was not that of a kind and easy-hearted man, who merited the attachment of his people. In about a quarter of an hour, poor Humphrey breathed his last, praying his young master, when he returned to Waverley, to remember his death and his fame, and congratulating him not to fight with these wild pietistic-men against old England.

When his last breath was drawn, Waverley, with a faithful yet simple and abashed air, told his father the sad news of the untimely fall of one of his soldiers, and no slight tear of remorse, the final agons of mortality, now witnessed for the first time, commanded Callum to remove the body into the hut. This the young Highlander performed with all the deference the duty required, which, however, he remarked, had been pretty well sapon'd. He took the cloak, however, and proceeded with the provident caution of a Spaniel hiding a bone, concealed it among some fresh and carefully marked the spot, observing, that if he chanced to return that way, it would be an excellent relic, for his aunt mother Kelpet.

It was by a considerable exertion that they regained their place in the marching column, which was now moving rapidly forward to occupy the hills above the village of Tranent, between which lay the sea, and the sky lay by the proposed march of the opposite army.

This melancholy interview with his late serjeant, forced many unavailing and painful reflections upon Waverley's mind. He was not slow to perceive the inevitable consequence of the man, that Colonel Gardiner's proceedings had been strictly warranted, and even rendered indispensable, by the steps taken in Edward's name. The emblems of his troops to mutiny. In the circumstance of the seal, he now, for the first time, re-collected, and that he had lost it in the custom of the robber, Bean Lean. That the artful villain had secured it, and used it as the means of concealing an intrigue in the regiment for his own purposes, was sufficiently evident; and Edward had now no doubt that the packet placed in his portmanteau was his daughter, but, having secured his right upon the proceedings. In the meanwhile, the repeated expressions of the lady, "Ah, squires, why do you leave us?" rung like a knell in his ears.

"Yes," he said, "I have indeed acted towards you with thoughtless cruelty. I brought you from your paternal fields, and the protection of a good and kind landlord, and when I had subjected you to all the prejudices and the ignobleness of the art, to my own share of the burden, and wandered from duties I had undertaken, leaving alone those whom my business to protect, and my own reputation and interests, I must, in justice and indecency of mind if not in your own, view, how much exquisite misery and mischief do so frequently prepare the way!"
Waverley

CHAPTER XLVI.

THE EYE OF BATTLE.

Although the Highlanders marched on very fast, the English also did so, and when they reached the brow of those high grounds which command an open and extensive plain stretching northward to the sea, on which are situated, but at a considerable distance from each other, the small villages of Preston and Cockenzie, and the larger one of Preston. One of the low coast-roads to Edinburgh passed through this plain, issuing upon it from the enclosures of Seaton-le-Mere and the town of Preston, again entering the defiles of an enclosed country. By this way the English general had chosen to approach the metropolis, both as most commodious for his cavalry, and long enough of opinion that, by doing so, he would meet in front with the Highlanders advancing from Edinburgh in the opposite direction. In this he was mistaken; for the sound judgment of the Chevalier, or of those to whose advice he listened, left the direct passage free, but occupied the strong ground by which it was overlooked and commanded.

When the Highlanders reached the heights above the plain, they formed in order of battle along the brow of the hill. Almost at the same instant the van of the English army appeared issuing from among the trees and enclosures of Seaton-le-Mere and Preston; the plain below them, the high ground and the sea; the space which divided the armies being only about half a mile in breadth. Waverley could plainly see the squadrons of dragoons issuing from the wood, the baggage-van, and the vassal on in front, and form upon the plain, with their front opposed to that of the Prince's army. They were followed by a train of field-pieces, which, when they reached the edge of the plain, were brought into line, and pointed against the heights. The march was continued by three or four regiments of infantry marching in column, their fixed bayonets showing the flags of their regiments, and their arms glancing like lightning. As at a signal given, they also at once wheeled up, and were placed in direct opposition to the Highlanders. A second train of artillery, with another regiment of horse, closed the line, and formed on the left flank of the infantry, the whole line facing southward. While the English army went through these evolutions, the Highlanders showed equal promptitude and zeal for battle. As fast as the order came upon the regiment, it obeyed their signal, and formed into line, so that both armies got into complete order of battle in the morning. When this was accomplished, the Highlanders formed a tremendous array, which was not less formidable to my country, a renegade to my standard, and a foe, as that poor dying wretch expressed himself, to my native England.

The regulars, who were in high spirits, returned a loud cheer as a mark of respect to two of their cannon upon an advanced post of the Highlanders. The latter displayed great earnestness to proceed instantly to the attack. Evan Dhu urging Ferguson by way of argument, that his old, old boy was tottering like an egg upon a staff, and that they had a stake of the onset, for even a haggis (God bless her) could change down hill.

But the ground, through which the mountaineers must have descended, although not of great extent, was impracticable in its character, being not only marshy, but intersected with walls of dry stone, and traversed in its whole length by a very broad and deep ditch, rumbled through on which the Highlanders had used their swords, on which they were taught to rely. The authority of the commander, the interest of the man to curb the impetuosity of the Highlanders, and only a few marksmen were sent down the descent to skirmish with the enemy's advanced posts, and to reconnoitre the ground.

Here was a military spectacle of no ordinary interest, or usual occurrence. The two armies, so different in aspect and discipline, yet each admirably trained, were placed in a position upon which the unexpected fate of at least Scotland appeared to depend. Now faced each other like two gladiators in the arena, each meditating upon the mode of attacking their enemy. The leading officers, and the general's staff of each army, could be distinguished in front of their lines, busied with spy-glasses to view each other, issuing the orders and receiving the intelligence conveyed by the aides-de-camp and orderly men, who gave life to the scene by galloping along in different directions, as if the fate of the day depended upon the speed of their horses. The space between the armies was at times occupied by the partial and irregular contest of individual sharp-shooters, and a hat or bonnet was snapped off by one with as little regard for the other as if by a wound in his own arm. These, however, were but trifling skirmishes, for it suited the views of neither party to advance in that direction. From the neighing of the horses, and the sound of weapons, the whole army was aware that some event was about to happen, and if the watchful eye of the spectator, as if watching the issue of the expected engagement; and at no great distance in the bay were two square-rigged vessels, bearing the English ensign, and yards were crowded with less limited spectators.

When this awful pause had lasted for a short time, Ferguson, with another chief, received orders to detach from their ranks fifty men, under a Piper, to threaten the right flank of Cope's army, and compel him to a change of position. To enable him to execute these orders, the Chevalier of Glenniquich, patronising, and at the same time directing the situation, and a convenient place, as Evan Dhu remarked, for any gentleman who might have the misfortune to be killed, and chanced to be curious about Chieftainship, with the rest of the party, the English general detached two guns, escorted by a strong party of cavalry. They approached so near, that Waverley could plainly recognise the standard of the troop he also larded. He heard the trumpets and kettledrums sound the signal of advance, which he had so often obeyed. He could hear, too, the well-known word given in the English dialed, by the equally well-distinguishable command of the commander-in-chief, which he had once felt so much respect. It was at that instant, that, looking around him, he saw the wild dress and appearance of his Highland associates, heard their whisps in an uncouth and unknown language, looked upon his own dress, so unlike that which he had worn from his infancy, and wished to awake from what seemed at the moment a dream, strange, incredible, and unnatural. "Gottlob," he thought, "is this the day they are about to my country, a renegade to my standard, and a foe, as that poor dying wretch expressed himself, to my native England.

Froboos's private report or another recollection, the tall military form of his late commander came in view, for the purpose of reconnoitring. "I can hit him now," said Callum, cautiously raising his fuses over the wall under which he lay crouched, at scarce sixty yards' distance.

Edward felt as if he was about to see a parictric committed in his presence; for the venerable grey hair and striking countenance of the veteran recalled the almost paternal respect with which his officers universally regarded him. But ere he could say anything, he heard a familiar voice:

"Hold!" an aged Highlander, who lay beside Callum, Beg, stopped his arm. "SSare," he said, "the seer, his hour is not yet come. But let him beware of to-morrow—I see his winding sheet high upon his breast.

Callum, hint to other considerations, was penitent to superstition. He turned pale at the words of the Tushaer, and recovered his piece. Colonel Gardner, unconscious of the danger he had escaped, turned his head, and rode slowly back to the front of his regiment.

By this time the regular army had assumed a new line, with one flank inclining to the side of the sea, and the other resting upon the village of Preston. The men did not seem to be in similar difficulties occasioned in attacking their new position. Ferguson and the rest of the detachment were recalled to their former post. This scene was at once repeated. The Highlanders made some charge in George's Cope's army, which was again brought into line parallel with that of the Highlanders.
CHAP. XLVII.

THE CONFLICT.

When Fergus Mac-Ivor and his friend had set a few hours, they were awakened and summoned to attend the Prince. The distant village-clock was heard to toll three as they hastened to the place where he lay. He was already surrounded by his prince's officers and the chiefs of clans. A bundle of straw, which had been lately his couch, now served for his seat. Just as Fergus reached the end of the consultation had broken up. "Courage, brave friends," said the Chevalier, "and each put himself instantly at the head of his command: a faithful friend has offered to guide us by a perishable, though strong and certain road, which, sweeping to our right, traverses the broken ground and morass, and enables us to gain the firm and open plain upon which the enemy are lying. The difficulties of the road are great. Heaven and your good swords must do the rest."

The proposal spread instantaneous joy, and each leader hastened to get his men into order with a little noise as possible. The army, therefore, right from the ground on which they had rested soon entered the path through the morass, crossing their march with astonishing silence and great rapidity. The men were armed with short and light weapons, and the noise was so great as to imprison the advantage of daylight. But this was lost as the stars faded before approaching day, and the head of the column, crossing its dangers, descended into the heavy ocean of fog, which rolled its weight over the whole plain, and over the sea which it was bounded. Some difficulties were now encountered, insurmountable from darkness, a narrow, broken, and marshy path, and the necessity of preserving union in the march. These however, were less inconvenient to Highlanders, from their habits, the noiseless boats, and the fear of huging, and they continued a steady and swift movement.

As the clan of Ivor approached the firm ground following the track of those who preceded them.

the challenge of a patrol was heard through the mist, though they could not see the dragon by whom it was addressed. "Who goes there?"

"Hush," cried Ferguson. "Hush! Let none answer, as he values his life—press forward;" and they continued their march with silence and rapidity.

The sun of the day, however, had been with them, and the report was instantly followed by the clang of his horse's feet as he galloped off. "Hylax in limine latet," said the Baron of Bradwurdine, who heard the signal, "let not the horse give the alarm."

The clan of Ferguson had now gained the firn plain, which had lately borne a large crop of corn. But the harvest was gathered in, and the expanse was unbroken by cornfields or trees, except here and there, at any distance, the rest of the army were following fast, when they heard the drum of the enemy beat the general. Surprise, however, had made no part of their plan, so they were not disconcerted by this intimation that the foe was upon their guard and prepared to receive them. It only hastened their dispositions for the combat, which were very simple.

The Highland army, which now occupied the eastern end of the wide plain, or stubble field, so often referred to, was drawn up in two lines, extending from the morass towards the sea. The first was divided into four columns, the second, the right and the left. The Highlanders had been trained to charge in rectangular form, and every purpose was deprecated by all around him, and he was with difficulty induced to abandon it.

Both lines were now moving forward, the first prepared for instant combat. The clans, of which it was composed, formed each a sort of separate phalanx, narrow in front, and in depth ten, twelve, or fifteen files, according to the strength of the line, and their reputation. The best-born, for the words were synonymous, were placed in front of each of these irregular subdivisions. The others in the rear shouldered forward the front, and by their presence, adorning both physical impulse, and added ardor and confidence, to those who were first to encounter the danger.

The clansmen on every side stript their plaid, prised their arms, and there was an awful pause of a few moments, during which the men, pulling down their bonnets, raised their faces to heaven, and uttered a short prayer; then pulled their bonnets over their brows, and began to move forward at first slowly. Waterley, with his Poverty, and some more wounded than he was, as if he would have burst from his bosom. It was not fear, it was not ardour,—it was a compound of both, a new and deeply energetic impulsion, that with its emotion chilled and astounded, then fevered and maddened his mind. The sounds around him conduced to exalt his enthusiasm; the pipes played, and the clans rushed forward, each in its own dark column. As they advanced they mended their pace, and the muttering sounds of the men to each other began to swell into a wild cry.

At this moment, the sun, which was now risen above the horizon, dispelled the mist. The vapour arose like a curtain, and showed the two armies in the set of closing. The line of the regulars was formed directly facing the attack of the Highlanders; it pierced with the appointments of a complete army, and was flanked by cavalry and artillery. But the right impressed no terror on the assailants.

"Forward, sons of Ivor," cried their Chief, "take the Covenant and draw the next blood!"—they rushed on with a tremendous yell.

That was well known. The horse, whom they commanded to charge the advancing Highlanders in the first attack, fired with all the fire of a brave foe; they ran on, and, seized with a disdainful panic, watered, halted, disabused, and galloped from the field. The artillerymen, directed by the cavalry, fled along the line, and, when the Highlanders, with the multicast of their guns when fired, and drew their broad-swords, rushed with headlong fury against the infantry.

It was at this moment of confusion and terror, that Waterley remarked an English officer, apparently of high rank, standing alone and unsupported by a field-piece, which, after the flight of the men by whom it was commanded, had been discharged against the clan of Mac-Ivor, the nearest group of Highlanders within his aim. Struck by his tall, martial figure, and eager to save him from inevitable destruction, Waterley outstripped for an instant the speediest of the warriors, and, reaching the spot first, called to him to surrender. The officer replied by a thrust with his sword, which Waterley received in the breast; and then, perceiving the Englishman's weapon brake. At the same time the battle-scene of Dugald Mahony was in the act of descending upon the officer's head. Waterley interceded and prevented the blow, and the officer, perceiving further resistance unavailing, and struck with Edward's generous anxiety for his safety, resigned fragment of his sword, and was committed by Waterley to Dugald, with strict charge to use him well, and not to pillage his person, promising him, at the same time, full indemnification for the spoil.

On Edward's right the battle for a few minutes raged fiercely, but the English forces, reduced in the wars in Flanders, stood their ground with great courage. But their extended files were pierced and broken in many places by the close masses of the clans; and as the situation of each was improved, the nature of the Highlanders' weapons, and their extraordinary ferocity and activity, gave them a decided superiority over those who had been accustomed to trust much to their arms and discipline; and felt that the one was broken and the other useless. Waterley, as he cast his eyes towards this scene of smoke and slaughter, observed Colonel Guelph, desolate by his sight of the battle, in the thick of all the attempts to rally them, yet spurring his horse through the field to take the command of a small body of infantry, who, with their backs against the wall of his house (for the field of battle continued a desperate and unavailing resistance. Waterley could perceive that he had already received many wounds, his clothes and shield being marked with blood. To save this good and brave man, became the instant object of his most anxious exertions. But he could only witness his fall. Ere Edward could make his way among the Highlanders, who, furious and eager for spoil, were thronged upon each other, he saw his former commander brought from his horse by the blow of a sconce, and beheld him receive, while on the ground, such severe injuries, that he was unable to rise. When Waterley came up, however, perception had not entirely fled. The dying warrior seemed to recognize Edward, for he fixed his eye upon him with an upbraving, yet sorrowful look, and appeased the struggle for utterance. But he felt that death was dealing closely with him, and resigning his purpose, and folding his hands as if in devotion, he gave up his soul to his Creator. The look with which he regarded Waterley in his dying moments, did not strike him so deeply at that crisis of hurry and confusion, as when it occurred to his imagination at the distance of some time ago.

The death of this good Christian and valiant man is thus given by his affectionate biographer, Dr. Doddridge, from the "Evidences of Christianity."

"He continued all night under arms, wrapped up in his cloak, and generally sheltered under a rock of barley, which happened to be in the field. A soldier of the men of the house of his host, a hospitable servant to him, of whom there were four in writing. He dismissed me, and I travelled on with much trouble, and some advice, and such solace chances relating to the performance of his duty, and the care of his soul, as seemed partly to indicate that he was in a state of great distress, and that he was at a great loss what to do, in taking his last farewell of them. There is great reason to believe that he was now生命的, if not much above an hour, in those devout exercises of soul which had been so long habitual to him, and to which so many circumstances, especially the kindness of the officer to call his mind, and the time at break of day, by the noise of the rebels' approach, and the sconce of such a manner that a man enough to discern what was passing. As soon as the enemy came within gun-shot they made a furious fire and it is seen in the Englishmen which continued a few minutes unpublished. Sec.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

UNEXPECTED EMBARRASSMENT.

When the battle was over, and all things coming into order, the Baron of Bradwardine, returning from the field of the day, and having disposed those under his command, took the initiative. He thought the Chieflain of Glennaquich and his friend Edward Wavely. He found the former bruised in determining disputes among his clanmen about points of precedence and debts of value, besides many high and doubtful questions concerning plunder. The most important of the last respected the property of a gold watch, which had once belonged to some unfortunate English officer. The judgment was awarded consolde himself by observing. "She (i.e., the watch, which he took for a living animal) died the very night that Vich Ian Voher gave her to Mur- ruck." The watch had been presented to the head of the baron's house by his ancestors; but a few months, received a wound by a bullet in his left breast, which made him give a sudden spring in his saddle upon a hillside, where he fell, and where he might have perished to him, but he said it was only a wound in the face of the enemy. Said his Lordship in his right thigh. In the meanwile, it was discerned that some of the enemy fell by him and particularly one man, who had made him a tremendous visit for a few days before, with great proficiency of real for the present establishment.

"Events of this kind pass in less than the description of them can be written, or than it can be read. The Colonel was for a few moments supported by his men, and particularly by that worthy person, Lieutenant-Colonel Whitley, who was shot through the arm here, and a few months after fell nobly at the side of Falick. But as a man of distinguished bravery, as also by about fifteen dragons, who stood by him, some of whom were quartered in the regiment in his right thigh. In the meantime, it was discerned that some of the enemy fell by him and particularly one man, who had made him a tremendous visit for a few days before, with great proficiency of real for the present establishment.

"The ground was covered with carcasses," said the old mountaineer, turning sullenly away; "one more would hardly have been known upon it; and if it was worse for yourself, Vich Ian Voher, that one should be Bradwardine's or mine!"

The chief soothed while he hurried away; and then returned to the Baron. "It is Bal lenkereith," he said, "in an understand and confidential voice, "father of the young one, whose all eight years since in the unlucky affair at the Mains."

"Ah!" said the Baron, instantly relaxing the doubtfull sternness of his features, "I can take mickle frack and riddle, at the least." But he added, "I know not what to do."

The court martial, however, in the course of the business, surprised by the issuing of an order of discharge, the question came to rest in the form of a court martial, especially as they were deserted by the cavalry, and those who undertook to manage the artillery. I may remark on this extract, that it confirms the account given in the text of the account offered by the British infantry. Surprised by a force of peculiar and unusual description, the opposition cannot but be overcome by them, especially as they were deserted by the cavalry, and those who undertook to manage the artillery. But the affair was soon over, and the question decided. I have always understood that many of the in-
CHAPTER XLIX.

THE ENGLISH PRISONER.

The first occupation of Waverley, after he departed from the Chieftain, was to go in search of the office whose life he had saved. He was attacked, however.
Waverley.

"I am just returned," answered the officer; "as being a Scotchman, I thought it my duty to act when my services promised to be useful. Yes, Mr. Waverley, I am that Colonel Talbot, the husband of the lady you have named; and I am proud to acknowledge the services that you, with the help of your arm and your brave soldiers, have rendered to my country. I am the husband of Lady Emily Blantyre; but I thought Colonel Talbot had been abduct..."
aim by your conduct. He is my oldest friend—how often shall I repeat it—my best benefactor! he sacrificed his own Muscovite sense of the innocent, he never uttered a word, he never harboured a thought, that beneficence itself might not have thought or spoken. I found this man in confinement, rendred harsher by the-esprit du temps of feeling, wounded and-forgiven, Mr. Waverley,—by the cause through which this calamity had come upon him. I cannot picture from you my feelings upon this occasion; they were most strongly, unanswerably, emotion towards you. Have, by my family interest, which you probably know is not inconsiderable, succeeded in obtaining Sir Edward's release, I set out for Scotland. I saw Colonel Talbot, the gentle, unpardoned, prince, is sufficient to render this instruction over excusable. In the course of conversation with him, I found, that from late circumstances, from a re-examination of the persons engaged in the mutiny, and from his original good opinion of your character, he was much altered towards you; and I doubted not, that if I could be so fortunate as to discover you, all might yet be well. But this unnatural rebellion has ruined all. I have, for the first time, in a long and active military life, seen Britons disgrace themselves by a panic flight, and that before a foe without either arms or shield to show the issue of their valour! and the son—the son, I may say, of his affections—shaming a triumph, for which he ought the first to have blushed. Why should I lament Gardner! his lot was just, and his end to any account good.

There was so much dignity in Colonel Talbot's manner, such a mixture of military pride and manly sorrow, and the news of Sir Edward's imprisonment, we told in so deep a tone of feeling, that Edward's, most mortified, abused, and distressed, in presence of the prisoner, who owed to his life not many hours before. He was not sorry when Ferguson came. His Royal Highness commands Mr. Waverley's attendance. Colonel Talbot threw upon Edward's expression of grief, which did not escape the quick eye of the prisoner. His immediate attendant returned, with considerable emphasis. Waverley turned towards the Colonel.

"We shall meet again," he said; "in the meanwhile, every possible accommodation."

"I desire none," said the Colonel; "let me fare like the meanest of those brave men, who, on this day of calamity, have preferred wounds and captivity to flight, and abstained for the sake of them, those who have fallen, to know that my words have made a suitable impression on your mind."

"Let Colonel Talbot be carefully secured," said Ferguson to the jailer, who looked after the prisoners; "it is the Prince's particular command; he is a prisoner of the utmost importance.

"But let him want no accommodation suitable to his rank," said Waverley.

"Consistent always with secure custody," replied Ferguson. The officer signified his acquiescence in both commands, and Edward followed Ferguson to the garden, where Callum Beg, with three saddle-horses, awaited them. Turning his head, he saw Colonel Talbot re-conducted to his place of confinement by a file of Highlanders; he jangled on the threshold of the gate, and with his hand towards Waverley, as if enforcing the language he had held towards him.

"Sirs," said Ferguson, as he mounted; "are now as placid as a wan weather, every man may have them for the catching. Come, call Callum adjust your straps, and let us to Pinkie-house as fast as these devilish dragons-horses choose to carry us."

CHAPTER L.

BARTER UNIMPORTANT.

"I was turned back," said Ferguson to Edward, as they galloped from Preston to Pinkie-house, "by a message from the Prince. But, I suppose, you know the value of this most noble Colonel Talbot as a prisoner. He is not the only rank of the present gentleman the red-coats; a special friend and favourite of the Elector himself, and of that dreadful hero, the Duke of Cumberland, who has been summoned from his triumphal triumphs at Falscarnie to witness the exploits of the Highlanders alive. Has he been telling you how the bells of St. James's ring? Not turn again, Wittington," like those of Bow, in the days of old."

"Ferguson," said Waverley, with a reproving look.

"Nay, I cannot tell what to make of you," answered the Chief of Mac-Ivor, "you are blown out with every wind of doctrine. Here have we gained a victory, unpardoned, unparalleled, praised by every living mortal to the skies—and the Prince is eager to thank you in person—and all our beauties of the White Rose are pulling caps for you—and you, the gentle Chevalier of the day, are stooping on your horse's neck like a butternut-woman riding to market, and looking as black as a funeral!"

"I am sorry for poor Colonel Gardiner's death: he was once very kind to me."

"Why, then, be sorry for five minutes, and then be glad again; his chance to-day may be ours to-morrow, and what does it signify? The next best thing is victory by the sword, by the column of victory, and one would rather a foot led it than one's self."

"But Colonel Talbot has informed me that my father and uncle are both imprisoned by government orders."

"We'll put in bail, my boy; old Andrew Ferrarat shall lodge his security; and I should like to see him put to justify it in Westminster Hall."

"Nay, they are already at liberty, upon bail of a more civil disposition."

"Then why is the public spirit cast down, Edward? I think that the Elector's ministers are such dukes as to set the foot of liberty at this critical moment, if they could or durst confine and punish them? I assure thyself that either they have no charge against your relations which they can continue their imprisonment of, or the cause is a private quarrel, and not any one of your friends, the jolly cavaliers of old England. At any rate, you need not be apprehensive upon their account; and we will find some means of conveying to them assurance of your safety."

Edward was silenced, but not satisfied, with these reasons. He had now been more than once shocked at the small degree of sympathy which Ferguson exhibited, and was almost for the first time, at least, astonished at his want of the energy of sentiment, that if they did not correspond with his own mood at the time, and more especially if they thwarted him while earnest in a favorite pursuit. Ferguson sometimes interested Edward, and often observed to him, that he always intent upon some favourite plan or project of his own, he was never sufficiently aware of the extent or duration of his displeasure, so that the reiteration of these petty omissions somewhat cooled the volunteer's extreme attachment to his officer.

The Chevalier received Waverley with his usual favour, and paid him many compliments on his distinguished bravery. He then took him apart, made many inquiries concerning Colonel Talbot, and when he had received all the information which Edward was able to give concerning him and his compeers, he proceeded,—"I cannot but think, Mr. Waverley, that since this gentleman is so particularly connected with our worthy and excellent friend, Sir Edward Waverley, and since his lady is of the house of Blane-ville, whose love is to the true and loyal prince..."

The name of Andre de Ferrarat is inscribed on all the French broadsides which are accounted of temporal excellence. Who this artist was, what were his fortunes, and when he flourished, have been the subject of much discussion and research. It is generally believed that Andre de Ferrarat was a Spaniard, or Italian, and that he is the artist who first drew the field of Pinkie, in which period the historic Painter is supposed to have been "all the arts and sciences of all kinds, and of such exceeding good temper, that as I never saw any so good, I think it hard to describe."—[Drawn by Ricciardel, 1589.]
ples of the Church of England is so generally known, the Colonel's own private sentiments cannot be unfavourable to us, whatever mask he may have assumed to accommodate himself to the times."

"Well, it is worth making a trial at least. I therefore congratulate Colonel Talbot, with power to act concerning him as you think most advisable; and I hope you will find means of ascertaining what are his real dispositions towards our late Father's restorers."

"I am convinced," said Waverley, bowing, "that if Colonel Talbot chooses to grant his parole, it may be securely depended upon; but if he refuses it, I trust your Royal Highness will devise on some other person than the nephew of his friend the task of laying him under the necessary restraint."

"I will trust him with no person but you," said the Prince, smiling, but peremptorily repeasing his mandate; "it is of importance to my service that there should appear to be a good intelligence between you, even if you are unable to gain his confidence in earnest. You will therefore receive him into your quarters; but you must give him parole, you must apply for a proper guard. I beg you will go about this directly. We return to Edinburgh to-morrow."

Being thus reminded to the vicinity of Preston, Waverley lost the Baron of Bradwardine's solemn act of homage. So little, however, was he at this time in love with vanity, that he had quite forgotten the ceremonious in which Peruginus had laboured to engage his curiosity. But next day a formal Gazette was circulating, containing a detailed account of the battle of Gladsmuir, as the Highlanders chose to denominate the fray. To conclude the products of the Court afterwards held by the Chevalier at Pinkie house, which contained this among other high-brown descriptive paragraphs:

"To Scotland, which annihilates Scotland as an independent nation, it has not been our happiness to see her princes receive, and her nobles discharge, those acts of feudal homage, which, founded upon the splendid actions of Scottish valor, recall the memory of her early history, with the manly and chivalrous simplicity of the ties which united to the Crown the homage of the warriors whom it was repeatedly upheld and defended. But on the evening of the 20th, our memories were refreshed with one of those ceremonies which belong to the ancient days of Scotland's glory. After the council was formed, the Chevalier, of that illustrious, colonel in the service, &c. &c. &c. castigated the Prince, attended by Mr. D. Macwheeble, the Bailie of his ancient barony of Bradwardine, (who, we understand, has been named a commissary) and, under form of instrument, claimed the submission to perf., to the person of his Royal Highness, as representing his father, the service used and wont, for which, under a charter of Robert Bruce, of which the original was produced and inspected by the Masters of his Royal Highness's Chancery for the time being, the claimant held the barony of Bradwardine, and lands of Tully-Veolan. His claim being admitted and his Highness had placed his foot upon a cushion, the Baron of Bradwardine, kneeling upon his right knee, proceeded to undo the latches of the brogue, or low-heeled Highland shoe, which our gallant young hero wears in compliment to his brave followers. When this was performed, the Royal Highness declared the ceremony completed; and embracing the gallant veteran, protested that notwithstanding the whole of his Highness's Bruce, could have induced him to receive even the symbolical performance of a memorial office from hands which had fought so bravely to put the crown upon the head of his father in law, to deliver into his hands the pieces repeatedly, and one of these havin" accidentally loaded with barn, the bullet grazed the young lady's temple as she waved her handkerchief to her husband, who was at her side in an instant; and, on seeing that the wound was trifling, he drew his broadsword, with the purpose of rushing down upon the man by whose concentrated fire he was being held by the plain. "Do not harm the poor fellow," she cried; "for Heaven's sake, do not harm him! but thank God with me that the accident happened to Florina MacIvor for had it befallen a Whig, they would have pretended that the shot was fired on purpose."

Waverley escaped the alarm which this accident was thought to involve to him, as he was unavoidably delayed by the necessity of accompanying Colonel Talbot to Edinburgh.

They performed the journey together on horseback, and for some time, as if to sound each other's feelings and sentiments, they conversed upon general and ordinary topics.

When Waverley again entered upon the subject which he had most at heart, the situation, namely, of his father and his uncle, Colonel Talbot seemed now rather desirous to alleviate to aggravate his anxiety. This appeared particularly to be the case when he turned the history, which he did not scruple to confide to him.

"And so," said the Colonel, "there has been no malice present, as lawyers, I think, term it, in this recent act of violence. You have the service of this Italian knight-errant by a few civil speeches from him and one or two of his Highland recruiting sergeants? It is safely foolish, to be sure, but so much as I am concerned. However, you cannot desert, even from the Pretender, at the present moment,—that seems impossible. But I have little doubt that, in the dispositions incident to this most complicated and complex situation, some opportunity may arise, by availing yourself of which, you may extricate yourself honourably from your rash engagement before the bubble burst. If that be the case, I would have you go to a place of safety in Flanders, which I shall point out. And I think I can secure your pardon from government after a few months' residence abroad."

"I cannot permit you, Colonel Talbot," answered Waverley, "to speak of any plan which turns up on my deserting an enterprise in which I may have engaged hastily, but certainly voluntarily, and with the purpose of serving my country."

"Well," said Colonel Talbot, smiling, "leave me my thoughts and hopes at least at liberty, if not my speech. But have you never examined your mystery?"

"It is in my bag," replied Edward; "we shall find it in Edinburgh."

In Edinburgh they soon arrived. Waverley's quarters had been assigned to him, by the Prince's express orders, in a handsome lodging, where there was accommodation for Colonel Talbot. His first business was to examine his portmanteau, and, after a very short search, found the expected packet. Waverley opened it eagerly. Under a blank cover, simply addressed to E. Waverley, Esq., he found a number of open letters. The uppermost were two from Colonel Gardiner, addressed to himself. The earliest in date was a kind and gentle remonstrance for neglect of the writer's advice, respecting the disposal of his time during his leave of absence, the renewal of which, he reminded Captain Waverley, would specifically expire. "Indeed," the letter proceeded, "had it been otherwise, the news from abroad, and my instructions from the War-office, must have called it, as it were, the great enemy, since the disaster in Flanders, both of foreign invasion and insurrection among the disaffected at home. I therefore entreat you will repair, as soon as possible, to the borders, and, if you can, turn the whole of the men who are to be acceded to, of which I am informed, to add that, this is still the more necessary, as there is some discontent in your troop, and I possess inquirie into particulars until I can have the advantage of your experience and of that danger, which I had assured you they would have pretended that the shot was fired on purpose.

The second letter, dated eight days later, was in such a style as might have been expected from the Colonel's receiving no answer to the first. It reminded Waverley of his duty, as a man of honour, an officer, and a Briton; took notice of the increasing dissatisfaction of his men, and that some of them had been heard to hint, that their Captain encouraged them, and approved of what was unlawful. In the latter part, the writer expressed the utmost regret and surprise that he had not obeyed his commands by repairing to headquarters, reminded him that his leave of absence had been recalled, and conjured him, in a style in which paternal remonstrance was mingled with military authority, to redeem his error by immediately joining his regiment. That I may be certain," concluded the letter, "that this actually reaches you, I dispatch it by Corporal Timms, of your troop, with orders to deliver it into your own hand."

Upon reading these letters, Waverley, with great anxiety of mind, was compelled by the memory of the brave and excellent writer; for surely, as Colonel Gardiner must have had every reason to conclude they had come safely to hand, Waverley's letters could not have been intercepted and saved. He was troubled at a third and final summons, which Waverley actually received at Glencairn, though too late to obey it. And being superseded, in consequence of his apparent absence, the regiment of the agent Alexander was so far from being a harsh or severe proceeding, that it was plainly inevitable. The next letter he unfolded was from the Major of the regiment, acquainting him that a report, to the effect that he had desisted from his recruiting, had been published in the country, stating, that one Mr. Falconer of Balliokirk, or some such name, had proposed, in his presence, a treasurously, which he permitted to pass in silence, although it was so gross an affront to the royal family, that a gentleman in company, not remarkable for his zeal for government, had nevertheless taken the matter up, and, that supposing the account true, Captain Waverley had thus suffered another, comparatively unconcerned, to resent an affront directed against him personally as an officer, and to go out with the person by whom it was offered. The Major of the regiment had no one of the royal interest, nor did his brother officers believe this scandalous story, but that it was necessarily their joint opinion that his own honour, equally with that of the regiment, depended upon the matter being instantly contradicted by his authority, &c. &c. &c.

"What do you think of this all?" said Colonel Talbot, to whom Waverley handed the letters after he had perused them.

"I think it renders thought impossible. It is enough to drive me mad."

"Be calm, my young friend; let us see what are these dirty scribblings that follow."

The first was addressed, "For Master W. Ruffin, This:- Dear Sir, sum of our yong gulpins will not bite, tho' I told you you should shew the squire's deevil was in the well. But Timms will deliver you the letters you desired, and toll ollad Addem he gave to squire's hand, as to be sure yours is the name, and shall be held for signal, and hoy for Hoy Church and Sauchy, as sadlery in Christ-whelme."

"Yours, dear Sir."

"Postcript. Do'te tell squire we longre to hear from him, and has dootings his not writing himself and Lifeutenant Bottler is smokky."

"This Ruffin, I suppose, then, is your Donald of the Cavern, who has intercepted your letters, and carried out the advice with the poor devil Houghton, as if under your authority?"

"It seems too true. But who can Addem be?"

"Possibly Adam, for poor Gardiner, a war.- war. on his way to the other letters were the same purpose.
they soon received, yet more complete light upon Don-ald Bean's machinations.

In the mean time, the conduct of Waverley's servants, who had remained with the regiment, and who had been taken at Preston, now made his appearance. He had sought out his master, with the purpose of again entering service. For a time he was unsuccessful; but at last, that same evening, it was reported that Waverley had gone from the head-quarters of the regiment, a pedlar, called Ruthven, Ruffin, or Ruffin, known among the soldiers by the name of Willy Will; and he had made frequent visits to the town of Dundee. He appeared to possess plenty of money, and to have sold his commodities very cheap, seeming always willing to treat his friends at the ale-house, and easily inserting himself into the society of the soldiers, particularly Sergeant Houghton, and one Tim, also a non-commissioned officer. To these he unfolded, in Waverley's name, a plan for leaving the regiment and joining him in the Highlands, where report said the clans had already taken arms in great numbers.

The men, who had been educated as Jacobites, so far as by human opinion at all, and who knew their landlord, Sir Edward, had always been supposed to hold such tenets, easily fell into the snare. That Waverley was at a distance in the Highlands, was really a sufficient excuse for transmitting his letters through the medium of the pedlar; and the sight of his well-known seal seemed to authenticate the negotiations in his name, where writing might have been considered too dangerous. The cabal, however, began to take air, from the premature泄漏 of the project; and some were concerned. Why Willy Justified his appetitive; for, after suspicion arose he was seen no more. When the General discovered, in which Waverley was superseded, great part of the trouble broke out to arise from the actual mutiny, but were surrounded and disarmed by the rest of the regiment.

In consequence of the sentence of a court-martial, Houghton and Tim were condemned to be shot, but after permission to communicate with their families for Houghton, the survivor, allowed much petitioning being convicted from the recollections and the demonstrations of Colonel Gardiner, that he had really engaged in a very serious crime. It is remarkable, that as soon as the poor fellow was satisfied of this, he became also convinced that the instigator had acted without authority from Edward, saying, "If it was dishonorable and against old England, the squire could not have nought about it; he never did, or thought to do, any thing dishonorable, no more didn't Sir Edward, nor none of them afore him, and in that belief he would live and die that Ruffin had done it all of his own head."

The strength of conviction with which he expressed himself upon this subject, as well as his assurances the pedlar, Colonel Gardiner's code which he had been delivered to Ruthven, made that revolution in Colonel Gardiner's opinion which he expressed to Talbot.

The reader has long since understood that Donald Bean Lean played the part of tempter on this occasion. His motives were shortly these. Of an active and intriguing spirit, he had been long employed as a subaltern agent and spy by those in the confidence of the Chevalier, to an extent beyond what was suspected, even by Fergus Mac-Ivor, whom, though obliged to him for protection, he regarded with fear and dislike. To success in this political department, he naturally looked for raising himself by some bold stroke above his present hazardous and precarious trade of rapine. He was particularly employed in learning the strength of the regiments in Scotland, the character of the officers, &c., and had long had his eye upon Waverley's troop, as open to temptation. Donald even believed that Waverley himself was at bottom in the Stuart interest, which seemed confirmed to him by the conduct of his kindred of the Clanbrandon. When, therefore, he came to his caves, with one of Glannagouch's attendants, the robber, who could never appreciate his real motive, which was to incite to rebellion, the ladies and gentlemen of the household of the chief, and to hope that his own talents were to be employed in some intrigue of consequence, under the auspices of this wealthy young Englishman. Now was he undecided by Waverley's conduct, and what a prudent reserve, and somewhat piqued Donald Bean, who, supposing him out of a secret, where confidence probably to be advantageous, determined have his share in the drama, whether a regular part were assigned him or not. For this purpose, during Waverley's sleep, he possessed himself of his sword, as a token to be used in any of the proceedings, which might discover to be possessed of the captain's confidence. His first journey to Dundee, the town where the regiment was quartered, undeceived him of his original supposition, undeceived him of a new field of action. He knew there would be no service so well rewarded, by the friends of the Chevalier, as deciding a part of the regular army to his standard. He expected to be one of the colonels, with which the Glannagouch is already acquainted, and which a crew to all the intricacies and obscurities of the narrative previous to Waverley a linking Glannagouch.

By Colonel Talbot's advice, Waverley declined determining in his service the lad whose evidence had thrown additional light on these intrigues. He represented to him it would be doing the man an injury to engage him in a desperate undertaking, and that whatever should happen, his evidence would go some length, at least, in explaining the circumstances under which Waverley himself had been betrayed. Waverley therefore wrote a short state of what had happened, to his uncle and his father, cautioning them, however, in the present circumstances, not to attempt to answer the questions they might ask; Talbot then gave the man a letter to the commander of one of the English vessels of war cruizing in the frith, requesting him to put the bearer ashore at Berwick, with a pass to proceed to London with the money to make an expeditious journey, and directed to get on board the ship by means of bribing a fishing-boat, which, as they afterwards learned, he easily effected.

To the attendance of Callum Beg, who, he thought, had some disposition to act as a spy on his motions, Waverley hired as a servant a simple Edin-burgh swain, who had mounted the white horse in a fit of spleen and jealousy; because Jenny Jop had dashed a whole night with Corporal Bullock of the Fusiliers.

CHAPTER LII.

INTRIGUES OF SOCIETY AND LOVE.

Colonel Talbot became more kindly in his demeanour towards Waverley after the confidence he had reposed in him, and as they were necessarily much together, the character of the Colonel rose in Waverley's esteem, and his ideas of his character had been sharpened. Waverley had been delivered to Ruthven, made that revolution in Colonel Gardiner's opinion which he expressed to Talbot.

The reader has long since understood that Donald Bean Lean played the part of tempter on this occasion. His motives were shortly these. Of an active and intriguing spirit, he had been long employed as a subaltern agent and spy by those in the confidence of the Chevalier, to an extent beyond what was suspected, even by Fergus Mac-Ivor, whom, though obliged to him for protection, he regarded with fear and dislike. To success in this political department, he naturally looked for raising himself by some bold stroke above his present hazardous and precarious trade of rapine. He was particularly employed in learning the strength of the regiments in Scotland, the character of the officers, &c., and had long had his eye upon Waverley's troop, as open to temptation. Donald even believed that Waverley himself was at bottom in the Stuart interest, which seemed confirmed to him by the conduct of his kindred of the Clanbrandon. When, therefore, he came to his caves, with one of Glannagouch's attendants, the robber, who could never appreciate his real motive, which was to incite to rebellion, the ladies and gentlemen of the household of the chief, and to hope that his own talents were to be employed in some intrigue of consequence, under the auspices of this wealthy young Englishman. Now was he undeceived by Waverley's conduct, and what a prudent reserve, and somewhat piqued Donald Bean, who, supposing him out of a secret, where confidence probably to be advantageous, determined have his share in the drama, whether a regular part were assigned him or not. For this purpose, during Waverley's sleep, he possessed himself of his sword, as a token to be used in any of the proceedings, which might discover to be possessed of the captain's confidence. His first journey to Dundee, the town where the regiment was quartered, undeceived him of his original supposition, undeceived him of a new field of action. He knew there would be no service so well rewarded, by the friends of the Chevalier, as deciding a part of the regular army to his standard. He expected to be one of the colonels, with which the Glannagouch is already acquainted, and which a crew to all the intricacies and obscurities of the narrative previous to Waverley a linking Glannagouch.

By Colonel Talbot's advice, Waverley declined determining in his service the lad whose evidence had thrown additional light on these intrigues. He represented to him it would be doing the man an injury to engage him in a desperate undertaking, and that whatever should happen, his evidence would go some length, at least, in explaining the circumstances under which Waverley himself had been betrayed. Waverley therefore wrote a short state of what had happened, to his uncle and his father, cautioning them, however, in the present circumstances, not to attempt to answer the questions they might ask; Talbot then gave the man a letter to the commander of one of the English vessels of war cruizing in the frith, requesting him to put the bearer ashore at Berwick, with a pass to proceed to London with the money to make an expeditious journey, and directed to get on board the ship by means of bribing a fishing-boat, which, as they afterwards learned, he easily effected.

To the attendance of Callum Beg, who, he thought, had some disposition to act as a spy on his motions, Waverley hired as a servant a simple Edinburgh swain, who had mounted the white horse in a fit of spleen and jealousy; because Jenny Jop had dashed a whole night with Corporal Bullock of the Fusiliers.
the fruitless siege of Edinburgh Castle occupied several weeks, during which Waverley had little to do, excepting to seek such amusement as society afforded. Her father was at this time a widower, and her friend and guardian became acquainted with some of his former intimates. But the Colonel, after one or two visits, shook his head, and declined farther experiment. Indeed he did not want her to serve her purposes. Flora was too young and passionate, and our heroine was too much interested in her by remonstrance, because she saw in this line of conduct the most probable chance of her friend securing at length a return of affection.

The truth is, that at her first conversation after their meeting, Rose had discovered the state of her mind to that acute and intelligent friend, although she was not herself aware of it. From that time, though Flora was interested in the direction of Waverley's addresses, but became anxious that they should, if possible, be transferred to her friend. Nor was she less interested in this plan, though her brother had from time to time talked of it between just and earnest, of paying his suit to Miss Bradwine. She knew that Ferguson had the true emotional sympathy, and she was interested in the present feeling of the man in whose mind she was present, and by the effort her anxious and attempted affection had made, she could find a better than such a fellow as this, whose temper seemed equally active, supple, and variable, and who was followed, and implicitly obeyed, by a gang of such cut-throats as those whom you are pleased to admire so much.

The ladies of the party did not escape her notice. She observed that Flora Mac-Ivor was a fine woman, and her beauty had made her a little pretty. But she thought that the former destroyed the effect of her beauty by an affectation of the grand air which she had probably so well practiced in the mock court of St. Germain, and that it was impossible for any mortal to admire such a little uninformative woman, who, small portion of education was as still applied to her sex, or as if she had applied it to the first of her sex. The young and angular Flora, once upon her person for her sole garment. Now much of this was mere spleen and prejudice in the excellent Colonel, whom with the white cockade and the breast, and the Macl at the beginning of a name, would have made a devil out of an angel; and indeed himself generally allowed, that he could not have endured Venice herself, if she had been arranged and named by a drawing-room by the name of Miss Mac-Jupiter.

Waverley, it may easily be believed, looked upon this young ladies with very different eyes. During the period of the siege, he paid them almost daily visits, although he observed with regret that his suit made little progress in the affections of the former. The arms of the Chevalier in subduing the fortress, she maintained with rigour the rule she had laid down of treating him with indifference, without either affecting to avoid him, or that his intervention with him. Every word, every look, was strictly regulated to suit the code of refined and the dejectment of Waverley, nor the anger which Ferguson so severely suppressed, could extend Flora's attention to Edward beyond that which the most ordinary politeness demanded. But Waverley, however, continued to be continually in the presence of Waverley's opinion. He had several opportunities of remarking, that, as her extreme timidity wore off, her manners assumed a higher character; that the agitation of the stormy time seemed to call forth a certain dignity of expression, and the second, which he had not formerly observed; and that she omitted no opportunity within her reach to extend her knowledge and refine her taste.

Flora Mac-Ivor called Rose her pupil, and was attentive to assist her in her studies, and to fashion both her taste and understanding. It might have been observed that the presence of Waverley was too much to think of exhibiting her friend's excellences than her own. But I must request of the reader to suppose, that this kind and disinterested purpose was concealed by the most cautious delicacy, studiously shunning the most distant approach to affectation. So that it was as unlike the usual exhibition of one pretty woman affecting upon another as the manner of David and Jonathan might be to the intimacy of two Bond-street lothians. The fact, that in that effect was felt, the cause could hardly be observed. Each of the leading persons of the party, and performed themselves to the delight of the audience; and such being the case, it was almost impossible to discover that the elder constantly ceded to her friend that which was most suitable to her talents.

But to Waverley, Rose Bradwine possessed an attraction which few men can resist, from the marked interest which she took in every thing that affected him. She was not herself aware of it; she had not in her eye, or in her mind, estimated the full force of the constant attention which she paid to him. Her father was too abstracted in his learned and military discussions to ob- serve her sweetness, and to serve her purposes. But Waverley was interested in her by the remonstrance, because she saw in this line of conduct the most probable chance of her friend securing at length a return of affection.

Having escaped from the old gentleman, Waverley went to Ferguson's lodgings by appointment, to await his return. He was a polyood-Highlander make general between all the gunpowder Highlanders in the army. I beg your pardon, Flora, your brother, you know, is out of the question; he has more sense then half of them, and can think the issue, but, furious spirits, of whose brawl we are much and hear more, and who terrify me out of my life every day in the street, are all at be compared to Waverley!

"in enter, I think you are invited to Mr. M'cLachlan's, and that, for his name is discharged with every heart, my dear Rose. I only lament, that, with his talents and genius, he does not assume that place in society for which they eminently fit him, and that he does not kind that their full impotence to the noble cause with which he is enlisted. Are there not Lochiel, and P——, and M——, and G——, all men of the highest instructions, and, as well as the first talents,—why will he not stop like them to be alive and useful?—I often believe his soul is frozen by that proud cold-blooded Englishman, whom he now lives with so much!"

"Colonel Talbot!—he is a very disagreeable person.—He told me as he dared forty British women the trouble of handing her a cup of tea. But Waverley is so gentle, so well informed."

"Yes," said Flora, smiling, "he can admire the moon, and quote a stanza from Tasso."

"Besides, you know how he fought," added Miss Bradwardine.

"Yes, Load the fighting," answered Flora, "I believe all men (that is, who deserve the name) are pretty much alike; there is generally more courage required to run away. They have, besides, when confronted with each other, a certain instinct for strife, as we see in either male animals, such as dogs, bulls, and so forth. But high and perilous enterprise is not Waverley's forte. He would never have been his celebrated ancestor Sir Nigel, but only Sir Nigel's eldest and post. I will tell you where he will be at home, my dear, and in his place,—in the quiet circle of domestic happiness, lettered indolence, and elegant enjoyments of Waverley-Honour. And he will sit the old oak in the most exquisite taste, and garnish its shelves with the rarest and most valuable volumes; and he will draw plans and landscapes, and write verses, and rear temples, and dig grooves, and sit the whole night in the colonnade before the hall, and gaze on the decor as they stray in the moonlight, or lie shadowed by the boughs of the huge old fantastic oaks; and he will sit the bold warrior's arm, and let the buck hang upon his arm, and he will be a happy man."

And she will be a happy woman, thought poor Rose. But she only sighed, and dropped the conversation.

CHAPTER LIII.

FERGUSS A SUTER.

Waverley had, indeed, as he looked closer into the state of the Chevalier's Court, less reason to be satisfied with it. It contained all the ramifications of the future oak, as many seeds of tracasserie and intrigue, as might have done honour to the Court of a large empire. Every person of consequence had some separate object, which he pursued with a fury that Waverley considered as altogether disproportionate to its importance. Almost all had their reasons for discontent, although the most legitimate was that of the worthy old Baron, who was only distressed on account of the common cause.

"We shall hardly," said he one morning to Waverley, "the Waverley had been well received, and certainly my heart has not been disturbed to the least, by my subsequent behaviour. Now, at value this hauberk of a coronet as little as you can, the philosopher of the Selkirk, for I hold that the crown of Scotland, such a claim to the Stuarts is not rank to any earl in Scotland. But I had a special reason for assuming this cursed title at this time. You must know that I learned acquaintance with Prince has been pressing that old foolish Baron of Bradwardine to disinherit his male heir, or nineteen of his sons, and have his two daughters married to the Elector of Hanover’s militia, and to settle his estate upon your pretty little friend Rose; and this, as being the command of his king and overlord, who meant it to be a piece of fine deference, the old gentleman seems well reconciled to.

"And what becomes of the homage?"

"Curse the homage!—I believe Rose is to pull off the years of her youth, and being so, or some more to such trash. Well, sir, as Rose Bradwardine would always have made a suitable match for me, but for this idiotical predilection of her father for the heir, and that, I need not say, it would have remained no obstacle, unless that the Baron might have been added to his daughter’s husband to take the name of Bradwardine, (which you know would be impossible in my case) and that I have been by my assuming the title to which I had so good a right, and which, of course, would supersede that difficulty. CHAP. LIV.

To one thing constant never.

I am the very child of caprice," said Waverley to himself, as he bolted the door of his apartments, and paced it with hasty steps.—What is it to me that Fergus Mac-Ivor should wish to marry Rose Bradwardine? I love her not—I might have loved by her perhaps—but I rejected her simple, natural, and heart-admiring tenderness, and affected to be interested in her, until she herself conceived false hopes, and the name which she had been made to all those who were willing to hear the tale of the young Argyll and the young Laird of Balmain; and the taint of the devil was upon the enterprise, and all who had been interested in it. The devil might have taken the barren moors, and drawn off the royal caliga, for any thing I have in mind. But, framed as she is for domestic affection and tenderness, for giving and receiving all those kind and quiet attentions which sweeten life to those who pass it together, she is sought by Fergus Mac-Ivor. He will not use her ill, to be sure—of that he is incap-

...But then will canker sorrow eat her bad,

...And she will look as homely as a ghost,

...and she is as brave as an eagle bill,

...And she will die."

...that is, very much, handsomer than Rose. She is taller in-

...in her manner more formed; but many people think Miss Waverley a very handsome girl, and she is certainly much younger. I should think Waverley is two years older than I am—I will look at them par-

...this evening."
And with this resolution Waverley went to drink tea (as the fashion was Sixty Years since) at the head of a group of ladies, and it happened to be the Chevalier, where he found, as he expected, both the ladies. All rose as he entered, but Flora immediately resumed her place and the conversation in which she had been interrupted. The Chevalier, however, almost imperceptibly made a little way in the crowded circle for his advancing the corner of a chair.—

"Her manner, upon the whole, is most engaging," said Waverley: "but coming as what sorrow can.

A dispute occurred whether the Gallic or Italian language was most liquid, and best adapted for poetry; the opinion for the Gallic, which probably might not be long to be defended by seven Highland ladies, who talked at the top of their lungs, and screamed the company deaf, with examples of Celtic euphony. Flora, observing the Lowland ladies sneer at the comparison, produced some reasons to show that it was not altogether so absurd; but Rose, when asked for her opinion, gave it with animation in praise of Italian, and added that she had studied with Waverley's assistance. "She has a more correct ear than Flora, though a less accomplished musician," said Waverley to himself. "I suppose Miss Mac-Ivor will next compare Mac-Mur-phy's to the Scotch.

Lastly, it so befell that the company differed whether Fergus should be asked to perform on the flute, at which he was an adept, or Waverley invited to read a part of the play. The latter proposal was chosen and the good-humouredly undertook to collect the votes of the company for poetry or music, under the condition, that the gentleman whose talents were not laid under contribution should think it the duty of either to protest. The latter was next proposed. The next. It was proposed that the casting vote. Now Flora, who seemed to impose it as a rule upon herself never to countenance any proposal which might not receive a majority, was to vote for music, providing the Baron would take his violin to accompany Fergus. "I wish you joy of your taste, Miss Mac-Ivor," thought Edward, as they sought for his book. "I thought it better when we were at Glennaquich; but certainly the Baron is no great performer, and Shakespeare is worth listening to." Romeo and Juliet was selected, and Edward read with taste, feeling, and spirit; several scenes from that play. All the company applauded with their hands, and many with their tears. Flora, to whom the drama was well known, was among the former; Rose, to whom it was new, but whom the situation and human interest of admirers. "She has more feeling too," said Waverley, internally.

The conversation turning upon the incidents of the play, and the characters, Fergus declared that the only one worth naming, as a man of fashion and spirit, was Mercutio. "I could not," he said; "quite follow all his old-fashioned wit, but he must have been a very pretty fellow, according to the ideas of his time.

And it was a shame," said Ensign Maccomich, who usually followed his Colonel everywhere, "for that Tiberi, or Taggart, or whatever was his name, to stick him under the other gentleman's arm while he was making the fray.

The ladies, of course, declared loudly in favour of Rosalind, but this opinion did not go undisputed. The mistress of the house, and several other ladies, severely reproved the levity with which the hero transferred his affections from Rosalind to Juliet. Flora remained silent until her opinion was repeatedly requested, and then answered, she thought the circumstance objected to, not only reconcilable to nature, but such as in the highest degree enhanced the art of the poet. "It was a young man, peculiarly susceptible of the softer passions; his love is at first fixed upon a woman who could afford no return; he quickly replies to you.

- From love's weak, childish bow, so lives unharmed; so again.-

- She with forebrow to love.

Now, as it was impossible that Romeo's love, supporting him a reasonable being, could continue to subsist without hope, the poet has, with great art, seized in mount when he was reduced actually to despair, a throw in his way an object more accomplished by her than whom he had been rejected, and who is disposed to repay his attachment. I can scarce conceive a situation more calculated to enhance the aris- en, and the innumerable satisfactions to Miss Mac-Ivor's heart, which are raised by her from the state of drooping melancholy in which she appears first upon the scene, to the static state in which he.exclaims:

It cannot erasure all the exchange of joy.
That one short moment gives me in her sight.

"Good now, Miss Mac-Ivor," said a young lady, "of your young age?" etc.

"I am well pleased, my dear Lady Betty," said Flora, "as I conceive, persevere in your suit under very diverse circumstances. Affection can now and then withstand very severe storms of ruggor, but not a polar frost of downright indifference. Don't you with your attractions, try the experiment upon a lover whose faith you value. Love will subdue, but a wonderful beauty, but not the same; so though Rosalind was peroperative, it is impossible they can ever succeed; and should they miscarry, what then?-then alora como aloras. And with this resolution of being guided by circumstances, did our hero emit himself to repose.

CHAPTER LV.

A BRAVE MAN IN BORROW.

If my fair readers be able to opinion that hero's levity, another portion to the last place of admirers in justice of the cause he had espoused. "Not," he said, "that it is possible for you to suit it at this present moment, for, come what will, you must stand by Flora or Rose Bradwardine, but which was not the right with you; that you are fighting against the real interests of your country; and that you, as an Englishman, patriote, to take the first opportunity of sending this unhappy expedition before snow-ball melts.

In such political disputes, Waverley usually opposed the common arguments of his party, with wit and energy. "It is unnecessary to say that when the Colonel urged him to come the strength by which they had undertaken to throw the government, with that which was now resembling for its support. To this argument Waverley had had one answer: "If the cause have undertaken be perilous, there would be a greater disgrace in abandoning it."

And in his general plots of Colonel Talbot, and success in changing the subject.
One night, when, after a long dispute of this nature, the friends had separated, and our hero had retired to bed, he was awakened about midnight by a suppression of nature, which alarmed him. He got up, dressed, and went to the chamber of Colonel Talbot, which was divided from his own by a wainscotted partition, with a door of communication. Waverley approached this room and distinctly heard our two deep-drawn sighs. What could be the matter? The Colonel had parted from him, apparently, in his usual state of spirits. He must have been taken suddenly ill. Under this impression, he opened the door of communication, very gently, and perceived the Colonel, in his nightgown, seated by a table, on which lay a letter and picture. He raised his head hastily, as Edward stood uncertain whether to advance or retire; and Waverley perceived that his cheeks were stained with tears.

As if ashamed at being found giving way to such emotion, Colonel Talbot rose with apparent displeasure, and said, with some sternness, "I think, Mr. Waverley, my own apartment, and the hour, might have secured even a prisoner against friction.

"Do not say intrusion, Colonel Talbot; I heard your heavy breathing, and feared you were ill; that alone could have induced me to break in upon you."

"I am well," said the Colonel, "perfectly well."

"But you are distressed," said Edward; "is there anything to distress you?"

"Nothing, Mr. Waverley; I was only thinking of you, and some unpleasant occurrences then."

"Good God, my uncle!" exclaimed Waverley.

"No, no," he said, "it is a grief entirely my own. It is an affair which you should have seen it disarranged me so much; but it must have its course at times, that it may be at others more decently supported. I have kept it secret from you, and I have kept it from you, and yet you can administer no consolation. But you have surprised me,—I see you are surprised yourself,—and I hate mystery."

Read that letter.

It was a letter from Colonel Talbot's sister, and in these words:

"I received yours, my dearest brother, by Hodges. Sir E. W. and Mr. R. are still at large, but are not permitted to leave London. I wish to heaven I could go as an good an account of matters in the south. But the news of the unhappy affair at Preston came upon us, with the dreadful addition that you were among the fallen. You know Lady Emily's state of health, when your friendship for Sir E. induced you to leave her. She was much harassed with the sad necessity of the reconciliation. But she has been broken out; but kept up her spirits, as, she said, it became your wife, and for the sake of the future heir, so long hoped for in vain. Alas, my dear brother, thus you have left her! No, no; without all my watchful care, this unhappy reunion reached her without preparation. She was taken ill immediately; and the poor infant scarce survived its birth. Would to God this was all! But although the contradiction of the horrible report by your own letter has greatly revived her spirits, yet Dr. — apprehends, I grieve to say, serious, and even dangerous consequences, to her health, especially from the uncertainty in which she must necessarily remain for some time, aggravat- ed by the ideas she has formed of the ferocity of those with whom you are a prisoner.

"For her sake, and for that of your brother, as soon as this reaches you, endeavour to gain your release, by parole, by ransom, or by any way that is practicable. I do not exaggerate Lady Emily's state of health; but I must not — dare not — suppress the truth. Ever, my dear Philip, your most affectionate sister.

"Lucy Talbot."

Edward stood motionless when he had perused this letter, and then rose up and turned towards the bed. The Colonel's journey in quest of him, he had incurred this heavy calamity. It was severe enough, even in its irreparable part; for Colonel Talbot and Lady Emily are so united, that their persons cannot exist in the hopes which were now blasted. But this disappointment was nothing to the extent of the threatened evil; and Edward, with horror, regarded himself as the original cause of both.

Erst he could collect himself sufficiently to speak.

Colonel Talbot had recovered his usual composure of manner, though his troubled eye denoted his mental disturbance. He looked at Waverley, and said:

"She is a woman, my young friend, who may justify even a soldier's tears. He reached him the miniature, exhibiting features which fully justified the eulogium; and yet, God bless you, what you see of her there is the least of the charms she possesses — possessed, I should perhaps say — but God will do so.

"You must fly — you must fly instantly to her relief. It is not—it shall not be too late."

"Fly? how is it possible? I am a prisoner — upon parole."

"I am your keeper — I restore your parole — I am to answer for you."

"You cannot do so consistently with your duty: nor can I accept a discharge from you, with due regard to my own honour — you would be made responsible."

"I will answer it with my head, if necessary," said Waverley impulsively. "I have been the unhappy cause of the loss of your child, make me not the murderer of your wife."

"No, my dear Edward," said Talbot, taking him kindly by the hand, "you are in no respect to blame; and if I come to the conclusion of a domestic duty in which it was lost your sensibility should view it in that light. You could not think of me, hardly knew of my existence when I left England in quest of you. It is a responsibility. Heaven knows, sufficiently heavy for mortality, that we must answer for the foreseen and direct result of our actions, for their indirect and consequential operation, the great and good Being, who alone can foresee the dependence of human events on each other, hath not pronounced his frail creatures liable.

"But that you should have left Lady Emily," said Waverley, with much emotion, "of all others the most interesting to a husband, to seek a."

"I only did my duty," answered Colonel Talbot, calmly, "and I do not, ought not, to regret it. If the path of gratitude and honour were always smooth and easy, there would be little merit in following it; but it moves often in contradiction to our interest and passions, and sometimes to our better affections. These are the trials of life, and this, though not the least bitter," (the tears came unbidden to his eyes), "is not the first which it has been my fate to encounter. But Lady Emily's — she has said, wringing Waverley's hands. "Good night; strive to forget it for a few hours. It will dawn, I think, by six, and it is now past two. Good night."

Edward retired, without trusting his voice with a reply.

CHAPTER LVI.

EXECUTION.

When Colonel Talbot entered the breakfast-parlour next morning, he learned from Waverley's servant that our hero was abroad at an early hour, and was not yet returned. The morning was well advanced before he again appeared. He arrived out of breath, and said, "I have detained your letter with an industry that astonishes me."

"There," said he, throwing a paper on the table, "there is my morning's work. — Ack! pack, up the Colonel's clothes. Make haste, make haste."

The Colonel examined the paper with astonishment. It was a pass from the Chevalier to Colonel Talbot, to repair to Leith, or any other port in possession of his Royal Highness's troops, and there to wait on his Majesty's orders. "Let me be sure;" he only giving his parole of honour not to bear arms against the house of Stewart for the space of a twelvemonth.

"In the name of God," said the Colonel, his eyes sparkling with eagerness, "how did you obtain this?"

"I was at the Chevalier's house; I was at the Chevalier's house," he said, "I was at the Chevalier's house. He went to the camp at Leith."

I pursued him hither, and there, and there.
ance—but I will tell you not a word more, unless I see you begin to pack.'

"Before I know whether I can avail myself of this passport, or how it was obtained?"

"Oh, you can take out the things again, you know. — Some, perhaps, I will take with me. When I first mentioned your name, his eyes sparkled almost as bright as yours did two minutes since. 'Had you,' he earnestly asked, 'shown any sentiments favourable to his cause?"'

"Not in the least, nor was there any hope you would do so.' His countenance fell. I requested your freedom. 'Impossible,' he said; — 'your importance, as a friend and confident of such a man, will make my request altogether extravagant.' I told him my own story and yours; and asked him to judge what my feelings must be by his own. He has a heart, and a kind one, Colonel Talbot, you may say what you please. He took a sheet of paper, and wrote the pass with his own hand.

"I will not trust myself with my council,' he said; — 'they will argue me out of what is right. I will not endure that a friend, valued as I value you, should be loaded with the painful reflections which might afflict you in case of further misfortune in Colonel Talbot's family; nor will I keep a brave enemy a prisoner under such circumstances.' Beside this, said he, 'I think I can justify myself to my prudent advisers, by pleading the good effect such lenity will produce on the minds of the great English families with whom you are connected.' "Thus the politician peppe out," said the Colonel.

"Well, at least he concluded like a king's son — Take the passport; I have added a confidant for form's sake; but if the Colonel objects to it, let him depart without giving any parole whatever. I come here to war with men, but not to distress or endanger women.

"Well, I never thought to be so much indebted to the Pretend — "

"To the Prince," said Waverley, smiling.

"Oh, said "the Colonel; " it is a good travelling name, and which we may both freely use. Did he say any thing more?"

"Only asked if there was any thing else he could oblige me in; and when I replied in the negative, he shook me by the hand, and wished all his followers were as considerate, since some friends of mine not only asked all he had to bestow, but many things which he thought of little value, that of the greatest sovereign upon earth. Indeed, he said, no prince seemed, in the eyes of his followers, so like the Deity as himself, if you were to judge from the extravagant veneration in which they looked to him."

"Poor young gentleman," said the Colonel, "I suppose he begins to feel the difficulties of his station. Well, dear Waverley, this is more than kind, and you must accept it. I shall not forget that you bear a name that is to be remembered in any thing. My life — phew — let Emily thank you for that; this is a favour worth fifty lives. I cannot hesitate on giving my parole in the circumstances; there it is — (he wrote it out in form) — And now, how am I to get off?"

"All that is settled: your baggage is packed, my horses wait, and a boat has been engaged, by the Prince's permission, to put you on board the Frigate. I sent a messenger down to Leith on purpose.

"That will do excellently well, Captain Beaver, my particular friend; he will put me aboard at Berwick or Shields, from whence I can ride post to London; and you must intrust me with the packet of papers which you recovered by means of your Miss Beaumont, I may have an opportunity of using them to your advantage. But I see your Highland friend, Glen — what do you call his barbarous name? and his order with him — I must not call either. I am not without any respect to any one. So, how he walks as if the world were his own, with the bonnet on one side of his head, and his plaid pulled out across his breast! I should like now to meet that you have a chance of putting the Prince, or any one to peril his name. I would tame his pride, or he should tame mine."

"For shame, Colonel Talbot! you swell at sight of tartan, as the bull is said to do at scarlet. You and Mac-Ivor have some points not much unlike, so far as national prejudice is concerned."

The latter part of this discourse took place in the street. They passed the Chief, the Colonel and he sternly and punctiliously greeting each other, like two duellists before they take their ground. It was evident the dislike was mutual. "I never see that surly fellow that does his heels," said the Colonel, after he had mounted his horse, "but he reminds me of lines I have somewhere heard — upon the stage, I think:"

"Close behind him
StalksullenBeige,
The sorcerer's hand, Pressing to be employed."

"I assure you, Colonel," said Waverley, "that you judge too harshly of the Highlanders."

"Not a whit, not a whit; I cannot spare them a jot; I cannot bate them an ace. Let them stay in their own barren mountains, and puff and swell, and hang their bonnets on the horns of the moon, if they have a mind; but what business have they to come where people wear breeches, and speak an intelligible language? — I mean intelligible in comparison to their gibberish, for even the Lowlanders talk a kind of English little comprehensible by us; and what the devil could pity the French, I mean the Chevalier himself, for having so many desperationes about him, and their trade so early. There is a kind of subaltern imp, for example, a sort of sucking devil, whom your friend Glen — Glenamuck there, has sometimes in his train. To look at him, he is about fifteen years; but he is a century old in mischief and villany. He was playing at quoits the other day in the court; a gentleman, a decent-looking person enough, came past, and as a quoit hit his shin, he lifted his cane: But your young Bravo whips out his pistol, like a man in the civil, to the bonnet of the Chevalier, and had not a scream of Gardsdes leau, from an upper window, set all parties a scampering for fear of the inevitable consequences, the poor gentleman would have lost his life by the hands of that little cockatrice."

"A fine character you'll give of Scotland upon your return, Colonel Talbot."

"O Justice Shallow," said the Colonel, "will save me the trouble — Barren, barren, beggars all, beggars all. Marry, good air, — and that only when you are fairly out of Edinburgh, and not yet come to Leith as our capital, and on a good road."

In a short time they arrived at the seaport.

"The boat rock'd at the pier of Leith. Full loud the wind blew down the ferry; The sea, and the sea, — and the passengers."

"Farewell, Colonel; may you find all as you would wish it! Perhaps we may meet sooner than you expect; they talk of an immediate route to England."

"Tell me not that Talbot cares — I wish to carry no news of your motions."

"Simply, then, adieu. Say, with a thousand kind greetings, all that is dutiful and affectionate to Sir Everard and Aunt Rachel — Thank of me as kindly as you can — speak of me as indulgently as your conscience will permit, and once more adieu."

And adieu, dear Waverley; many, many thanks for your kindness. Unpaid yourself on the first opportunity. I shall ever think on you with gratitude, and the worst of my censure shall be, Quo diable al lot il faiре dans cette galerie?"

And they parted as Colonel Talbot going on board of the boat, and Waverley returning to Edinburgh."

CHAPTER LVII.

THE MARCH."

"It is not our purpose to intrude upon the provinces of history. We shall therefore only remind our readers, that about the beginning of November the Young Chevalier, at the head of about six thousand men at arms, the utmost of the army, set sail from London to penetrate into the centre of England, although aware of the mighty preparations which were made. for his reception. They set forth on this crusade in the hope, which he had, to see any other his troops incapable of marching, but which in reality gave these active mountaineers advantages over a less hardy enemy. In defiance of a superior army young and valiant as a Highland chieftain, and Wade, they besieged and took Carlisle, and soon afterwards prosecuted their daring march to the southward.

As Colonel Mac-Ivor's regiment marched in the van of the clans, he heard many a song equalled by any Highlander in the endurance of fatigue, and was become somewhat acquainted with their language, peremptorily at its head. They marked the proprogress of the day, and yet no bullet equalled Jimmie the Third, "no man cried, God bless him." The mob stared and listened, heartless, stupid, and their eyes gave few signs even of that boiaterous spirit, which induces the gallant Highlanders upon occasions, for the mere exercise of their most sweet voices. The Jacobites had been taught to believe that the northwestern counties abounded with wealthy squires and hard-hearted women, devoted to the cause of the White Rose. But of the wealthier Tories they saw little. Some fled from their houses, some learnted themselves sick, some surrendered themselves to the government, as suspected traitors. Of such as remained, the ignorant gazéd with astonishment, mixed with horror and avarice, at the wild appearance, unknown language, and singular gait of the Scottish clansmen. And although their number was small, ty numbers, apparent deficiency in discipline, and poverty of equipment, seemed certain tokens of the imminent termination of their rash undertaking.
Thus the few who joined them were such as bigotry of political principle blinded to consequences, or whose broken fortunes induced to hazard all on a risk so dear.

The Baron of Bradwardine asking what he thought of these recruits, took a long pinch of snuff, and answered dryly, "that he could not but have an excellent opinion of them, since they resembled procisely the description given to him by a good King David at the cave of Adullam; ridded, every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, and every one that was in poverty, and that was in lesse," he said, "they will prove mighty men of their hands, and there is much need that they should, for I have seen many a sorry look cast upon us.

But none of these considerations moved Fergus.
He admired the luxuriant beauty of the country, and the situation of many of the seats which they passed.
"In Waverley-Honour like that house, Edward?"
"It is a very fine park for a very fine house, sir.
"Is your uncle's park as fine as one at that?"
"It is three times as extensive, and rather resembles a forest than a mere park.
"You will be a happy woman.
"And I hope Miss Mac-Ivor will have much reason for happiness, unconnected with Waverley-Honour.
"But so far; but, to be mistress of such a place,
when the prettiest addition to the sum total.
An addition, the want of which, I trust, will be emptily supplied by some other means.
"Hear me, Fergus, stopping short, and turning up to Marmion, "Hear me, what do you understand that, Waverley? Had I the pleasure to hear you sing?
"Perfectly right, Fergus.
"And I am to understand that you no longer desire my services?"
"Your sister has refused mine," said Waverley,
"both directly, and by all the usual means by which ladies receive desired attentions."
"I have no idea," answered the Chieftain, "of a lady descending or a gentleman withdrawing his suit, after it has been approved of by her legal guardian, without giving her a proper opportunity of acquainting the matter over to the lady. You do not, I suppose, expect my sister to drop into your mouth like a ripe plum, the first moment you chose to open it?"
"It is a point to the lady's interest and Waverley's to encourage, Colonel. replied Edward, "it is a point which you must argue with, as I am ignorant of the customs of the Highlanders, in that particular. But as to my title to acquiesce in a rejection of yours, it is a signal appeal to your interest, but I will tell you plainly, without regarding to undervalue Miss Mac-Ivor's admitted beauty and accomplishments, that I will not take the hand of an angel, with an empire for her dowry, if her consent were extorted by the importunity of her friends, and guardians, and did not flow from her own free inclination.
"An angel, with the dowry of an empire," repeated Edward, "in a tone of bitter irony, "is not very likely to be pressed upon a ---shire squire. But, sir, chanting his song, "if Flora Mac-Ivor have not the dowry of an empire, she is my sister, and that is suficient at home, and is better treated with any thing approaching to levity."
"She is Flora Mac-Ivor, sir," said Waverley, with firmness, "which to me, were I capable of treating any woman with levity, would be a more effective protection."

The brow of the Chieftain was now fully clouted, but Edward felt too insignificant at the unreasonable tone which he had adopted, to aver the form of his least concession. They both stood still while this short dialogue passed, and Fergus seemed half dispersed to say something more violent, but, by a strong effort, suppressed his passion, and, turning his face forward, walked sullenly on. As they always hither to walked together, and almost constantly side by side. Waverley pursued his course silently in the same direction, and let the Chieftain take his own time in recovering the good-humour which he had so unreasonably discarded, and firm in his resolution not to bate him an inch of dignity.

"After they had marched on in this sullen manner about a mile, Fergus resumed the discourse in a diff erent tone. "I believe I was warm, my dear Edward, but you provoke me with your want of knowledge of the world. You have taken part in the play of prudery, or high-flying notions of loyalty, and now, like a child, you quarrel with the plaything you have been crying for, and beat me, your faithful keeper, because my soul rebelled against the project you had put into my head. Peace to you, and that to you. I am sure, if I was passionate, the mortification of losing the alliance of such a friend, after your arrangement had been the talk of both Highlands and Lowlands. I am sure, if I was aware of knowing why or wherefore, might well provoke calme better blood than mine. I shall write to Edinburgh, and put all to rights; that is, if you desire I should do so; as indeed I cannot suppose that your good opinion of Flora, it being such as you have often expressed to me, can be at once laid aside.

Colonel Mac-Ivor," said Edward, "who had no mind to be hurried either faster than he chose, in a matter which he had already considered as broken off, "I am fully sensible of the value of your good offices; and certainly, by your zeal on my behalf in such an affair, you do me no small honour. But as Miss Mac-Ivor has made her election freely and voluntarily, and as all my attentions in Edinburgh were received with more than coldness, I cannot, in justice either to her or myself, consent that she should again be harassed upon this topic. I would have mentioned this to you some time since, but you saw the footing upon which we stood together, and must have understood that it was either to her or myself, consent that she should earlier spoken; but I had a natural reluctance to enter upon a subject so painful to us both.
"Very well," said Waverley, "Edward, handsomely, "the thing is at an end; I have no occasion to press my sister upon any man."
Not have I any occasion to court rejected rejection from the same young lady," answered Edward, in the same tone.

"I shall make due inquiry, however," said the Chieftain, without noticing the interruption, "and learn what my sister thinks of all this: we will then see whether it is to end here."

Regarding such inquiries, you will of course be guided by your own judgment," said Waverley. "It is, I am aware, impossible Miss Mac-Ivor can change her mind; and were such an impossible case to happen, it is certain our talks and our meetings, if not more, will mention this to prevent any possibility of future misconstruction.

Gladdly at this moment would Mac-Ivor have put their affair to a personal arbitration; his eyes flashed fire, and he measured Edward as if to choose where he might best plant a mortal wound. But although we do not now quarrel, according to the modes and figures of Carnach or Vincent Savilia, no one knew better than Fergus that there must be some decent pretext for a mortal duel. For instance, you may challenge a man for treading on your corn in a crowd, or for pushing you up to the wall, or for taking your seat in the theatre; but the modern code of honour will not permit you to find a quarrel upon your right of compelling a man to continue addresses in a fancy dress, when that kind of hypocrisy has merely raised your ire.

So that Fergus was compelled to stomach this supposed affront, until the whirling of time, whose motion he promised himself he would watch most sedulously, showed him an opportunity of revenge.

Waverley’s servant always led a saddle-horse for him in the rear of the battle to which he was attached, though his master seldom rode. But now, finding that in the absence of his friend he had been unduly irritated, and mounted his horse, resolving to seek the Baron of Bradwardine, and request permission to volunteer in his stead the next time the Mac-Ivor fought. A happy time of it I should have had, thought the young gentleman, after he was mounted, to have been so closely allied to this superb specimen of pride and self-opinion and passion. A colonel! why, he should have been a generalissimo. A petty chief of three or four hundred men! his pride might suffice for the Charn of Tartary—the Grand Segniour—the Great Mogul. I am well free of him. Were Flora an angel, she would bring with her a second Lucifer of ambition and wrath for a brother-in-law.

The Baron, whose learning (like Sancho’s jests with Don Quixote) seemed to grow most rapidly for want of exercise, joyfully embraced the opportunity of Waverley’s offering his service in his regiment, to bring it into some exertion. The good-natured old gentleman, who had been but a reluciant acknowledge between the two quadrimen friends. Fergus turned a cold ear to his remonstrances, though he gave them a respectful hearing; and as for Waverley, he saw no reason why he should be the first in courting a renewal of the intimacy which the Chieftain had so unreasonably disturbed. The Baron then mentioned the matter to the Prince, who, anxious to prevent quarrels in his little army, declared, he would himself remonstrate with Colonel Mac-Ivor on the unreasonableness of his conduct. But, in the hurry of their march, it was a day or two before he had an opportunity to exert his influence in the manner proposed.

In the meanwhile, Waverley turned the instructions he had received while in Gardner’s dragoons, to some account, and assisted the Baron in his command as a sort of adjutant. "Parmi les cesugile un borgne est roi," says the French proverb; and the cavalry, which consisted chiefly of Lowland gentlemen, being light, they formed a high opinion of Waverley’s skill, and a great attachment to his person. This was indeed partly owing to the general, in which they felt at the distinguished English volunteer, who led the buglers in the forenoon, and his kindred, and among whom; for there was a latent grudge between the horse and foot, not only owing to the difference of the services, but also because most of the gentlemen, living near the Highlands, had at one time or other had quarters with the tribes in the vicinity, and all of them looked with a jealous eye on the Highlanders against pretensions to superior valour, and utilitarian the Prince’s service.

CHAPTER LVII.

The Confusion of King Agramant’s Camp.

It was Waverley’s custom sometimes to ride a little apart from the main body, to look at any object of curiosity which caught his eye. He and his party were now in Lancashire, when, attracted by a tall edifice old hall, he left the squadron for half an hour to take a survey and slight sketch of it. As he returned down the avenue, he was met by Ewen Macconochie. This man had contrived a sort of card for Edward since the day of his first seeing her, fully-Volcan, and introducing him to the Highl

Yet, as he passed him, he only approached a string, and pronounced the single word, "Beware," and then walked swiftly on, shunning all further communication.

Edward, somewhat surprised at this hint, followed, with his eyes the course of Evan, who speedily appeared among the trees. His servant, Ali Peary, was in the wood, and he looked after Highland, and then riding up close to his master.

"The ne’er be in me, sir, if you think you are among Highland rusher’s court."

"What do you mean, Ali?" said Waverley

"The Mac-Ivors, sir, has gotten it into their heads that ye have afforded their young lady, Miss Flora, and I have heard it aye and aye. Why not make a muckle to make a black-cock o’ ye; and you know there’s many o’ them wadna mind a baw, but the wassing a ball through the Prince himself, sit; she’s got a name for the Mac-Ivor, and they’ll see if they thought it a thing that would please when it was done."

Waverley, though confident that Fergus Mac-Ivor was incapable of such treachery, was by no means equally sure of the forbearance of his followers. He knew, that where the honour of the Chief of the family was supposed to be touched, the happiest would be he that could first avenge the stigma; and had often heard them quote a proverb, "That he’s bravest was the most speedy and most safe." Staying with this hint of Evan, he judged it best to project the main body of the party not far from the hostelry, and back to the squadron. Ere he reached the end of a long avenue, however, a ball whistled past him, as the report of a pistol was heard.

It was Edward’s servant, Callum Beg, said: Ali: "I saw him whist him away through amang the reises."

Edward, justly incensed at this act of treachery, slalomed out of the avenue, and observed the localization of Mac-Ivor at some distance moving across the common, in which it terminated. He also saw an individual running very fast to join the part this, he concluded was the intended assassin, who, by leaving an enclosure, might easily make a shorter path to the main body than he could be on horseback. Unable to contain himself, he remonstrated and followed the party to the man who was at the head of his regiment about half a mile in front, and acquainted with what had happened. He himself immediately rode up to Ferguson’s regiment. The Chief himself was in the act of getting them. He was on horseback, having returned from waiting on the Prince. On perceiving Edward approaching, he put his horse in motion towards his regiment. It was a difficult, and with Edward, without further salutation, "I have to inform you that your people has this instant fired at me from a lurking-place."

As that," answered Mac-Ivor, "accepting the circumstances a lurking-place, is a pleasure which I presently propose to myself, I should be glad to know which of my clansmen dared to anticipate me.

"I shall certainly be at your command whenever you please;—the gentleman who is the office upon himself is your page there, Callum Beg. Did you fire at Mr. Waverley?"

"No," answered the unblushing Callum. "You did," said Alec Polwarth, who was already returned, having met a troop from whom he discerned what was going forward to the Baron of Bradwardine, while he himself returned to his master at full gallop, neither sparing the rawness of his spurs nor the sides of his horse. You did fire!" replied Callum. "I am as truly of the Highlands, and as true a clansman, as ever saw theauld kirk at Coldingham."

"You lie," replied Callum, with his usual impermeable obstinacy. The answer of the wild and reckless warrior, as the days of chivalry, have been preceded by an encounter between the squares, (for Alec was a stout-hearted Merseman, and feared the bow of Cupid far more than a Highlander's dirk or claymore), but Fergus, with his usual tone of decision, demanded Callum's pistol. The cock was down, the pan and muzzle were black with the smoke; it had been the instant fired.

"Take it," said Fergus, striking the boy upon the head with the heavy pistol but with his whole force,—"take that for acting without orders, and lying to disfigure the Highland name. Callum, let us blow without a thought of flinch from it, and fall without sign of life. "Stand still, upon your lives!" said Fergus to the rest of the clan; "I blow out the brains of the first man who interferes between Mr. Waverley and me."

Fergus now aloud showed symptoms of vexation and anxiety. Callum scy on the ground bleeding copiously, but no one ventured to give him any assistance. It seemed as if the whole body of the Highlanders was then in a state of agitation, and the Prince called for word, and formed squadron, and the Baron and Chieftain were silent.

The Prince called them and Waverley before him. Having heard the original cause of the quarrel through the villa of Callum Beg, he ordered him into custody of the provost-marshal for immediate execution, in the moment of his surviving the chastisement inflicted by his Chieftain. Fergus, in a tone bewailing and seeking a relief, he opened his subject from whose action he was absent; he complained of the Aggrieved, on the grounds of which they were very jealous, and they were not persons to be displeased. Callum was therefore left to the justice of his own tribesmen.

The Prince next demanded to know the new cause of quarrel between Colonel Mac-Ivor and Waverley. There was a pause. Both gentlemen found the presence of the Baron of Bradwardine (for by this time all had approached the Chevalier by his command) an insurmountable barrier against entering upon a subject where the name of his daughter must necessarily be mentioned. However, he stood on the ground, with looks in which shame and embarrassment were mingled with displeasure. The Prince, who had been educated amongst the discontent and mutinous spirits of the court of St. Germain, where feuds of every kind were the daily subject of solicitude to the dethroned sovereign, had served his apprenticeship, as old Frederick of Prussia, would have said, to the trade of royalty. To promote or restore concord among his followers was indispensable. Accordingly he took his measures.

"Monseigneur de Beaumont," he said, "Monsieur de la Sens, a very handsome French cavalry officer, who was in attendance. Ayers la bonté d’alliger ces montagnardes là, ainsi que la cavalerie, s’il vous plaît, et de les remettre à la marche. Vous avez vu la débandade de l’Anglais, cela ne vous donnera pas beaucoup de peine."

"Ah! pas de tout, Monseigneur," replied M. de la Compte de Beaumont, his head bending down to the neck of his little prancing highly managed charger. Accordingly hepièfled away, in high spirits and confidence, to the head of Fergus's regiment, although understanding not a word of Gaelic, and very little English.

"Messieurs les sauvages Ecoossais—dit qu'est—gentil-"man savages, have the goodness d'arranger vous." The clansman comprehending the order more from the gesture than the words, and seeing the Prince himself present, hastened to dress their ranks.

"Ah! very well! that is fort bien!" said the Count de Beaumont. "Gentilhommes sauvages—mais, très bien—eh bien! dites ce que vous appelez vengeance, Mon-" seigneur?" (to a lounging trooper who stood by him)

"Ah, oui! face—Je vous remercie, Monseigneur—Gentilhommes, have you goodness to make face to face right part for us?" said the Frenchman. "Nous vivons en bonne, encore, Messieurs; il faut vous mettre à la marche... Marchez donc, au nom de Dieu, parce que j'ai oublié le mot Anglais—mais vous êtes des Français, bien..."

The Count next hastened to put the cavalry in motion. "Gentilhomme cavalry, vous me fassiez... sauf... pas ma foi, j'ai dit sauf off... I am..."
c'est le Commissaire qui nous a appor- tée les premières nouvelles de ce maladroit fracas. Je suis trop séché, Monsieur !"

"Mais poor Macwheelieh, who, with a sword stuck about his neck when mounted on a horse as a pancake, now figured in the character of a commissary, being overturned in the battle occasioned by the troopers hastening to get themselves in order in the presence of the queen, having shrunk to the rear amid the unstrained laughter of the spectators._

"Il bien, Messieurs, wheel to de right. Ah! dat is—eh, Monsieur de Bawldwaind, avec la bonne de vous mettre un let de votre régiment, car, par Dieu, je n'en puis plus!"

The Baron of Bawldwaind was obliged to go to the assistance of Monsieur de Beauvoir, after he had fairly expended his few English military phrases. One purpose of the Chevalier was thus answered. The other he proposed was, that in the eagerness to hear and see, several of the soldiers in both corps might get a current different from the angry channel in which the two young men worked at the time.

Charles Edward was no sooner left with the Chieflain and Waverley, the rest of his attendants being at some distance, than he said, "If I owed less to your excellent service, Mr. Waverley, I should be extremely angry with both of you for this extraordinary and causeless brawl, at a moment when my father's service so decidedly demands the most perfect unanimity. But the situation of my situation is, that my very best friends hold the liberty of bullying me at the time when my life and interests, as well as the cause they are engaged in, are in the highest degree precarious."

Both the young men protested their resolution to submit every difference to his arbitration. "Indeed," said Edward, "I hardly know of what I am accused. I sought Colonel Mac-Ivor merely to mention to him that I narrowly escaped assassination at the hand of his men yesterday. We have had a few sharp words, which I knew him to be incapable of authorizing. As to the cause for which he is disposed to fasten a quarrel upon me, I am ignorant of it, unless it be that he accuses me, most unjustly, of having engaged the affection of a young lady in prejudice of his pretensions."

"If there is an error," said the Chieflain, "it arises from a mistake which I held this morning with his Royal Highness himself."

"With me?" said the Chevalier; "how can Colonel Mac-Ivor have so far misunderstood me?"

He was right, and, while he talked, eight minutes' earnest conversation, spurred his horse towards Edward. "Is it possible—nay, ride up, Colonel, for I desire no secrets—is it possible, Mr. Waverley, that I am accused of loving Miss Bawldwaind? a fact of which I was by circumstances, though not by communication from you, so absolutely convinced, that I alleged it to my Lord John, this morning as a reason why, without offence to him, you might not continue to be ambitious of an alliance, which to an unengaged person, even though once resolved, holds out so many charms to a highly placed lady."

"Your Royal Highness," said Waverley, "must have founded on circumstances altogether unknown to me, when you did the distinguished honour of supporting me an accepted lover of Miss Bawldwaind. I feel the distinction implied in the supposition, but I have no title to it. For the rest, my confidence in my own merit is too justly strong to admit of my hoping for success in any quarter after positive rejection."

The Chevalier was silent for a moment, looking steadily at both, then said, "Upon my word, Mr. Waverley, you cannot imagine with you in the same gallant cause, lay my pretensions to be obeyed by you entirely out of view, and consider your own honour, and how far it is well, or becoming to give our enemies the advantage, and our friends the scandal, of showing that, few as we are, we are not united. And forgive me if I add, that the names of the ladies who have been the subject of our conversation have all too much been made themes of discord."

He took Fergus a little apart, and spoke to him very earnestly for two or three minutes, and then, returning to him, said—"I beg you, Colonel Mac-Ivor, that his resentment was founded upon a misconception, to which, indeed, I myself gave rise; and I trust Mr. Waverley is too generous and too virtuous a young man to take any steps which will not assure him that such is the case. You must state this matter properly to your clan, Vich Ian Vohr, to prevent a recurrence of their precipitate violence."

Fergus bowed, and said, "let me have the pleasure to see you shake hands."

They advanced coldly, and with measured steps, each apparently reluctantly to appear most forward in conciliation. They did, however, shake hands and parted, taking a respectful leave of the Chevalier.

Charles Edward then rode to the head of the Mac-Ivor, having himself from the horse, bode a dig which at a blow brought Dalrymple to the ground, and warned his companion, about half a mile along with them, into the history and connections of Sliochan nan Ivor, adroitly using the few words of Gaelic he possessed, and affording a great desire to learn more thoroughly. He then approached the Baron’s party, which in front, halted them, and examined their accoutrements and state of discipline; took notice of the principal gentlemen, and even of their horse’s trappings, and commended their horses; rode about an hour with the Baron of Bradwardine, and endured three long stories about Field Marshal the Duke of Berwick.

"Ah, Beaumieu, mon cher ami," said he as he returned to his usual place in the line of march, "quon mon mérite de prince errent est ennuyant, parfois. Mais, courage! c’est le grand jeu, après tout."

CHAPTER LIX.

A SKIRMISH.

The reader need hardly be reminded, that after a council of war held at Derby on the 12th of December, the Prince of Wales furnished them with a plan to penetrate further into England, and, greatly to the dissatisfaction of their young and daring leader, positively determined to return northward. They commenced their operations on the 28th of December, and under the success already witnessed, the movements of the Duke of Cumberland, who now pursued them with a very large body of cavalry.

The retreat of the French was pretty regular for the time. None had been so sanguine as Mac-Ivor for Mac-Ivor; none, consequently, was so cruelly morbid at the change of measure. He argued, or rather remonstrated, with the utmost vehemence at the contemplated retreat. Mr. Robert D. Mac-Ivor, who had just been re-elected to the Assembly of the Universe, was received in the state of grief and indignation. From that moment his whole manner was so altered, that he could scarcely be recognized for the same loving and saintly spirit, for whom the whole earth seemed too narrow but a week before. The retreat had continued for several days, when Edward, to his surprise, early on the 19th of December, received a visit from the Chieftain in his quarters, in a hamlet about half way between Shap and Penrith.

Having had no intercourse with the Chieftain looking extracts correlative of the general opinion respecting the Prince of Wales, the latter, considering the chance of his evading detection, and his being in the possession of a manuscript account of his romantic expedition, by James Maxwell of Kirkconnel, which I suppose a copy, by the hand of S. M. Rey, I was desirous of hearing his opinion of the Prince, whom he faithfully followed, seemed to have been a fair and useful youth, acquainted with the mirages among the Adventurers of the Congress.

"Every body was mightily taken with the Prince’s figure and personal behaviour. Sandford had in some degree to raise his character to the highest pitch, besides the greatness of the enterprise, and the content that had hitherto appeared in the execution of it. There were several instances of good nature and humanity, which had made a deep impression on people’s minds. I shall confine myself to two instances later at the battle, as the Prince was riding along the ground that Cope’s army had occupied a few minutes before, one of the officers came up to hear me, and I am sure that he was the most脓ious of persons at the time’s. The Prince, far from evoking, exulting, exulting, the condemned officers, as was sometimes the case, whom he decried he was sadly sorry to see that posture. Next day, while the Prince was at Penrith, a citizen of Edinburgh came to make some communications to the Chieftain, Murray about the tents that city was ordered to furnish. The Prince, who had a great desire to be out of the way, sent a message to the Prince, informing him of the Prince’s hearing, of having to give the gentleman brought to him, saying, he would not, though he was not, but being by granting every thing that was asked. So much influence as the Prince, who, in some measure, was entirely from his enemies. But what gave the people the highest idea of him, was the negative ease to a thing that very nearly affected their lives, in his manner of doing it, so much, perhaps, depended. It was proposed to send one of the Prince’s intimates, with orders to bring the change of prisoners taken, and to be taken, during this war, and to understand a refusal would be looked upon as a resolution to part and quarter his army. It would be of great advantage to the Prince’s affairs; his friends would be since their rupture. Edward waited with some anxiety for the explanation of his visit, and the found, help being surprised, and somewhat shocked, with the change in his appearance. His eye had lost much of its fire, his cheek was hollow, his voice was lank, even his gait seemed less firm and elastic than it was wont to be. He seemed to be particularly attentive, was now carelessly flung about him. He invited Edward to walk out with him by the little river in the vicinity; and smiled in a melancholy manner. As he observed the observer take down and buckle on his sword. As soon as they were in a wild requested path by the side of the stream, the Chief broke out,—"Our fine adventure in the North is now totally abandoned. I wish to know what you intend to do. Nay, never stare at me, man. I tell you I received a packet from my sister yesterday, and had the information which I am always vexed when I think of. In a letter written after our dispute, I acquainted her with the cause of it; and she now replies to me, that she has not heard from me, nor could have any purpose of giving me encouragement; so that it seems I have acted like a madman. Poor Flora! she writes in high spirits, what a change will the news of this unhappy retreat make in her happiness."

Waverley, who was really much affected by the deep tone of melancholy with which Fergus spoke, affectionately entreated him to banish from his remembrance all thoughts of the adventure; and, as the words of Corinna chimed in, and their eyes met, they once more shook hands, but now with sincere cordiality, Fergus again inquired of Waverley what he intended to do. "Had you not better leave this luckless army, and go down to form the Continent from some of the eastern ports that are still in our possession? When you are out of the kingdom, your friends will easily negotiate your pardon; and, to tell you the truth, I imagine you will find that you will not care to live under your wife, and take Flora under your joint protection,"—Edward looked surprised. "She loves you, and I believe you love her, though, perhaps, you have not found it out; for it would not be calculated for knowing your own mind very pointedly." He said this with a sort of smile.

"How," answered Edward, "can you advise me to desist the expedition in which we are all embarked?"

"Embarked? said Fergus; "the vessel is going more ready to declare for him if they had nothing to fear but the Convention of Berwick."

"But, consider, the Convention of Berwick! you are about to settle a cartel, the Prince was authorized to treat his prisoners in the same manner the Elector of Hanover was determined to leave him to his fate, without the slightest consideration. It was a sect that a few examples would compel the support of Louis XV. These are the heart of the British army, and the British army was made a point of it. They had never entered in the service, but upon such terms as are in the army among all civilized nations, and it could not be made upon their honour to lay down their commissions if these terms were not observed, and that owing to the obstinacy of the own Prince. Though this scheme was plausible, and represented as very important, the Prince could never be brought into it; it was before him, he said, to make empty threats, and he would never put such as those into execution; he would neither cold look away from lives which he had saved in heat of action in the end of the part of his own. Those were not the only proofs of good to the Prince about this time. Every day produced something new of this kind. These things softened the reverse of a military government, which was intended to mould the Prince, and the Prince could not have this honour to lay down their commissions if these terms were not observed."

"It has been said," replied Edward, "the Prince sometimes exacted more state and secretarium than seemed to suit his condition; but, on the other hand, some strictness of manner was altogether indispensable, when they had otherwise been exposed to general irritation. He could also endure, with a good grace, the retorts which he has been guilty of in his writings, but not without a hint that a previous interview with the barber might not have been wholly unnecessary. It is not beastly boys," answered the disconsolate Chief, "that can make a chevalier."

The Chevalier took the rebuke in good part.

"I am the wiser after having submitted his life so long after his miraculous escape, his character in history very load, have stood very high. As it was, his stations were in the highest of his reputation, his country. He was an honest, a brave, a noble citizen to all which precedes, and all which follows."
to pieces, and it is full time for all who can, to get into the long-boat and leave her.'

"Why, what will other gentlemen do?" answered Waverley, and why did the Highland Chiefs consent to this retreat, if it is so ruinous?"

"O," replied Mac-Ivor, "they think that, as on former occasions, the heading, hanging, and forfeiting, will chiefly fall to the lot of the Lowland gent; they are well aware that it is meagrefastnesse, there, according to their proverb, 'to listen to the wind upon the hill till the waters abate.' But they will be disappointed; they have been too often troublesome to be so repeatedly passed over, and this time John Bull has been too heartily frightened to recover his good-humour for some time. The Hanoverian ministers always deserved to be hanged for rascals; but now, if they get the power in their hands, another or later, they must, since there is neither rising in England nor assistance from France, —will they preserve the galloways as fools, if they leave a single clan in the Highlands in a situation to be again troublesome to government. Ay, they will make root-and-branch work, I warrant them."

"And while you recommend flight to me," said Edward, "a counsel which I would rather die than entertain, if it saved my country, or my life;" — answered Mac-Ivor, with a melancholy air, "my fate is settled. Dead or captive I must be before to-morrow."

"Why do you mean by that, my friend?" said Edward.

"The enemy is still a day's march in our rear, and if he comes up, we are still strong enough to keep him in check. Remember Glencoe and the Munro's point."

"This is notwithstanding, so far as I am individually concerned."

"Upon what authority can you found so melancholy a prediction?" asked Waverley.

"I, the affairs of this a person of my house, I have seen," he said, lowering his voice, "I have seen the Bodach Glass."

"Bodach Glass?"

"Yes; have you been so long at Glenquoich, and never heard of the Grey Spectre? though indeed there is a certain reluctance among us to mention him."

"No, never." "All! it would have been a tale for poor Florn to have told you. Or, if that hill were Benmore, and that long blue lake, which you see just winding towards you mountainous country, were Loch Tay, or near a more distant, the tale would be better suited with scenery. However, let us sit down on this knoll; even Saddleback and Ullswater will suit what I have to say better than the English hedgerows, enclosures, houses. You need not know, that when my ancestor, Ian Can Chaistiel, wasted Northumbland, there was associated with him in the expedition a sort of Southland Chief, or captain of a band of Lowlanders, called Halbert Halt. In their return through the Cheviots, they quarrelled about the division of the great booty they had acquired, and came from words to blows. The Lowlanders were cut off to a man, and their chief fell the last, covered with wounds by the sword of my ancestor. Since that time, his spirit has crossed the Vich Innoh of the day when any great disaster was impending; and never did before approaching death, a father saw him twice; once before he was made prisoner at Sheriff-Muir; another time on the morning of the day on which he died."

"How can you, my dear Fergus, tell such nonsense with any face in the world?"

"I do not ask you to believe it; but I tell you the truth, ascertained by three hundred years' experience in this part, and last night by my own eyes."

"The particulars for heaven's sake!" said Waverley, with eagerness.

"If I will, on condition you will not attempt a jest on the suspect. —Since this unhappy retreat commenced, he has never been able to sleep for thinking of my clan, and of this poor Prince, whom they are leading back like a dog in a string, whether he will or no, and of the downfall of my family. Last night I felt so feverish that I left my quarters, and walked out, in hopes the keen frosty air would brace my nerve — I cannot tell how much I dislike going on, for I know you will hardly believe me. However — I crossed a small footbridge, and kept walking back and forth on the downs, and then observed with astonishment by the clear moonlight, a tall figure in a gray plaid, such as shepherds wear in the south of Scotland, which, move at what pace I would, kept regularly about four yards before me."

"You saw a Cumberland peasant in his ordinary dress, probably."

"No! I thought at first, and was astonished at the man's audacity in daring to dog me. I called to him, but not many paces. I felt a feverish throbbing at my heart, and to ascertain what I dreaded, I stood still, and turned myself on the same spot successively to the four points of the compass — By Heaven, Edward, turn where you will, but you must instantly before my eyes, at precisely the same distance. I was then convinced it was the Bodach Glas. My hair bristled, and my knees shook. I manned myself, for whom, in his present distress, he held his fortune. My ghastly visitant glided before me, (for I cannot say he walked,) until he reached the footbridge; there he stopped, and turned full round. I must either let him pass or die, or take his skeleton to my arm. A desperate courage, founded on the belief that my death was near, made me resolve to make my way in despite of him. I made the sign of the cross, drew my sword, and uttered a furious oath. "God, Evil Spirit, give place!"

"Vich Ian Vohr, it said, in a voice that made my very blood quiver, 'be-warn of to-morrow? It seemed at that moment not half a yard from my breast, and I saw a certain expression in his face, and I could not sooner spoken than it was gone, and nothing appeared further to obstruct my passage. I got home, and threw myself on my bed, where I slept a few hours soundly enough; and this morning, as I was reported to be near us, I took my horse, and rode forward to make up matters with you. I would not unwillingly fall until I am in charity with a wronged friend."

Edward had little doubt that this phantom was the operation of an exhausted frame and depressed spirits, working on the belief common to all Highlanders in such superstitions. He did not the least pity Fergus, for whom, in his present distress, he held his fortune, with less regard revive. With the view of diverting his mind from these gloomy images, he offered, with the Baron's permission, which he knew he could readily obtain, to let the veteran tell Fergus's corps should come up, and then to march with them as usual. The Chief seemed much pleased, yet hesitated to accept the offer.

"We shall see, I know, in the rear, the post of danger in a retreat."

"And therefore the post of honour."

"Well," replied the Chief, "let Alick have your horse in readiness, in case we should be overmatched, and I shall be delighted to have your company once more."

The rear-guard were late in making their appearance, having been delayed by various accidents, and by the badness of the roads. At length they entered the hamlet. When Waverley joined the clan Mac-Ivor, arm-in-arm with their Chief, all the recent events they had heard of, began to come vividly off at once. Evan Dhu received him with a grin of congratulation; and even Callum, who was running about as active as ever, pale indeed, and with a great patch on his head, appeared delighted to see him.

"That galloway's skull," said Fergus, "must be harder than marble: the lock of the pistol was actually broken."

"How can you strike so young a lad so hard?" said Waverley, with some interest.

"Why, if I did not strike hard sometimes, the rascals would forget themselves."

They were now in full march, every caution being taken to keep a circle round Fergus's people, and a fine clan regiment from Badenoch, commanded by Cluny Mac-Pherson, had the rear. They had passed a large open moor, and were entering into the enclosures which surround a small village called Clifton.
The winter sun had set, and Edward began to rally Fergus upon the false predictions of the Gray Spirit. The words which he said were not pleasing to Mac-Thomas, who smiled; when, suddenly casting his eyes back on the moor, a large body of cavalry was indistinctly seen to hover upon its brown and dark surface. To line upon the road by which the enemy must move from it upon the village, was the work of a short time.

While these manoeuvres were accomplishing, night sunk down, dark fell, and all was quiet as if the mountains were at rest. Sometimes, however, she gleamed forth a dubiously light upon the scene of action.

The Highlanders did not long remain undisturbed. As the grey of dawn brightened a little, in front of Waverley, concealed by the mist, one large body of dismounted dragoons attempted to force the enclosure, while another, equally strong, strove to penetrate by the highroad.

But the Highlanders were not to be outmatched, nor were they to allow the English to gain any additional advantage. With a show of disconcerted their ranks, and effectually checked their progress.

Unsatisfied with the advantage thus gained, Fergus, to whose ardent spirit the approach of day did not add to its elasticity, harkened his sword, and calling out “Claymore!” encouraged his men, by voice and example, to break through the hedge which divided them, and rush down upon the enemy. With falling with the dismounted dragoons, they forced them through the gap, the dust flying to the open moor, where a considerable number were cut to pieces. But the moon, which suddenly shone out, seemed to double the English the small number of assailants, disordering them. For a few moments it seemed to them that the English were two squadrons of horse moving to the support of their companions, the Highlanders endeavoured to recover the advantage they had gained.

But the French, whom the English numbered among others, in a sudden, bold movement, forced their way through the line of the enemy, before they could effect their purpose. Waverley, looking eagerly for Fergus, from whom, as well as from the retreating body of his followers, he had been separated, found him, saw him, hailed him, and saw him, Du and Callum, defending themselves desperately against a dozen of horsemen, who were hewing at them with their long broadswords. The moon was at that moment by which, and how, when Edward, in the obscurity, could neither bring aid to his friends, nor discover which way lay his own road to rein in the 250-yard. After one or two narrowly escaping being slain or made prisoner by parties of the cavalry whom he encountered in the darkness, he at length reached an enclosure, and, climbing over it, concluded himself in safety; and on the way to the French leader, Edward was equal to an equal distance. For Fergus hardly a hope remained, unless that he might be made prisoner. Revolving his fate with sorrow and anxiety, the superintendence of the Boar’s Head, and Edward, now alone, said to himself, with internal surprise, “What can the devil speak truth?”

The following account of the skirmish at Clifton, is extracted from the manuscript account of Evan Macintosh, Chief of the clan Macintosh, who had the merit of supporting the principal bent of that spirited affair. The Memoirs appear to have been composed about 1755, ten years after the action and before his departure to France; they were written in French, with their chief interest in exile, which accounts for some Gallicisms which occur in the narrative.

In the Prince’s return from Derby back towards Scotland, my Lord George Murray, Lieutenant-General, cheerfully charged himself with the command of the rear-guard, a post, which, although honourable, was attended with great danger. In the battle, there was observed, and no small fatigue: for the Prince being apprehensive that his rear-guard might fall into the hands of the enemy, and the road to the northward of him with an armistice much superior to the rest of our French followers hard in the war, was obliged to hasten his march. It was not, therefore, possible for the artillery to march with the Prince’s troops, as it might be expected: but the weather, and the road in England: so Lord George Murray’s first report to the Duke of Cumberland, though the weather was dark and wet, almost every night, while at the same time he had frequent alarms and discussions from the Duke of Cumberland’s and other regiments. The Prince, after the Battle of Preston, December 1757, the Prince entered into the ruling in the Prince, and the orders of the English troops were given by Lord George Murray could not be brought upon the army so fast as he would have wished it, he was obliged to give the night six miles in order to that town, together with the regiment of Argyll. Of Cluny and his followers, that they happened to have the arrow point. The Prince, in order to receive the orders of the Duke of Cumberland with the whole body of his army, the same evening, he was ordered to enter under arms at the Bridge, waiting the arrival of his Lord George Murray, the orders of that day, which he had ordered to cover in passing the bridge. They arrived about seven o’clock, further in the Duke of Cumberland with the whole body of his army, and was received with a shout of triumph by a thousand of whom, as near as might be computed, disembarked, in order to receive the orders of the Duke of Cumberland, with the hour when the Prince reached, the while the Duke and the others remained on board in order to attack the town. was Lord George Murray at

The Leatherstocking Tale

The page displays a segment of the text from the novel by Sir Walter Scott. The text is part of a narrative style, describing a scene and the reactions of the characters. Here's a transcription of the highlighted section:

> "What hast he here, wench?"
> "O! cried the poor girl, almost going off in hysterics. I thought it was Ned Williams, and it is one of his pet phrases."
> "And what was thee ganging to do wi' Ned Williams at this time o' night?"
> "To see him, though, Ned Williams had been my heart's delight; but when I saw that, mon? ad, they'll sliver thee like a twine, mon."
> "I know my life is in great danger," said Waverley, "but if you can assist me, I will reward you handsomely." He held out a sovereign. St. Lachlan, but an unfortunate English gentleman."

"Be hos Scot or no," said the honest farmer, "I wish thou hast kept the other side of the hallan. But when the lawyer and his wife gave me this address, I thought to myself, 'Well, I shall see if this young lad will be received after the fatigues of this unhappy day.'"

With the morning arrived the news that the Highlanders had evacuated Penrith, and marched off to the north. The Duke of Caroline thought it was an opportunity to recover the roads in every direction. To attempt to get through undiscovered would be an act of the most frantic impudence. Ned Williams (the right Edward) was now called on to counsel with the General and his father, and with the best directions that could be obtained, to attempt to take the entire command after the fatigues of this unhappy day."

The necessary articles of dress were accordingly procured, and, by following the instructions given, the young farmer, they hoped to escape any unpleasant encounter. A recompense for their hospitality was advanced, and although he found Mons. de Chury and his tribe in good spirits under arms, yet the circumstance appeared extreme. In fact, the Duke of Caroline, an old royalist, did not object to such time as he had Mons. de Chury's opinion. "I wear my sword, but I carry no arms," said the Duke of Caroline. "I wear my sword for the sake of the good time that is about to come, and I carry no arms so that I may be able to do as I please."

The Capture of the Enemy

The capture of one of the English troops was a fortunate event. Mons. de Chury lost only in the action, and one of whom some have been but one wound, fell afterwards into the hands of the enemy, and were sent to the French. Mons. de Chury was not the only one who bore arms. The Comte de Nairme, Brigadier, who is being imprisoned, is now in France, with the three battalions of the Duke of Atholl, the battalion of the Chevalier, and the battalion of the Duke of Atholl's command, in order to support Chury, and to bring off the artillery. But it must be said that Comte de Nairme, with his command, could not reach the place. They therefore returned all to Penrith, and the artillery marched up and down the country for several days, but without effect. The troops are now in good order, and the general pursuit is being continued with great prudence and safety when in some manner surrounded by enemies."
CHAPTER LXI.
A JOURNEY TO LONDON.

The family at Fásthwaite were soon attached to Fáward. He had, indeed, that gentleness and urbanity which almost universally attracts corresponding kindness; and to their simple ideas his learning gave him consequence, and his sorrows interest. The last he ascribed, gravely, to the loss of a brother in the service, and his return to the state of society, where the ties of affection were highly deemed of, his continued depression excited sympathy, but no surprise. Then the last days of January, his more lively powers were called out by the happy union of Edward Williams, the son of his host, with Cicely Joison. Our hero would not cloud with sorrow the festivity attending that occasion, who was the more loth, as he was barely obliged. He therefore exerted himself, danced, sung, played at the various games of the day, and was the blithest of the company. The next morning, however, thinking that he would rather talk of the rank, though perfectly plain and simple, he accomplished crossing the country, and found himself in the desired vehicle risqué to Mrs. Nosebag, the lady of Lieutenant Nosebag, adjutant and riding-master of Waverley.

Farmer Williams, Edward passed for a young knightman, educated for the church, who was come to reside in the town, where the civil tumults permitted him to pass through the country. This silenced suspicion among the kind and simple yeomanry of Cumberland, and accounted sufficiently for the grave manners and retired habits of a man who had abandoned the frontiers, retiring upon Glasgow; and that the Duke of Cumberland had formed the siege of Carlisle. His army, therefore, cut off all possibility of Waverley's escaping into Scotland in that direction. On the eastern border, Marshal Wade, with a large force, was advancing upon Edinburgh, and all along the frontier parties of militia, volunteers, and partisans, were in arms to suppress insurrection, and shivered such stragglers from the Highland army as had been left in England. The surrender of Carlisle, and the severity with which the rebel garrison were threatened, secured to Wade further protection. The peasants were not convinced of the necessity of a solitary and hopeless journey through a hostile country and a large army, to carry the assistance of a single sword to a cause which seemed altogether desperate.

In this lonely and secluded situation, without the advantage of company or conversation with men of cultivated minds, the arguments of Colonel Talbot often recurred to his mind. He still remembered with anxiety recollection haunted him—burned him—he was not again to give him the honor of his presence in civil conflict. Then his mind turned to the supposed death of Peruginus, to the desolate situation of Flora, and, with yet more tender recollection, to that of Rose Bardwaring, who was destitute of the devoted enthusiasm of loyalty, which, to her friend, bellowed and exalted misfortune. These revives he was permitted to enjoy, undisturbed by queries or interruption; and it was many a winter walk by the shores of Lochet, that he acquired a more complete mastery of a spirit tamed by adversity, than his former experience had given him; and that he felt himself entitled to say firmly, their suffering was nothing to a sigh, that the romance of his life was ended, and that its real history had now commenced. He was soon called upon to justify his pretensions by reason and philosophy.

Such was this distressing paragraph. — "Good God!" exclaimed the parricide — "Impossible! My father, who never showed the affection of a father while he lived, cannot have been so much affected by my supposed death as to hasten his own; no, I believe, he has still the power of entertaining for a moment such a horrible idea. But it were, if possible, worse than parricide to suffer any danger to hang over my noble and generous uncle, who has ever been more to me than a father, if we do not brave the evil, can be averted by any sacrifice on my part!"

While these reflections passed like the visions of a spirit through Waverley's sensorium, the worthy divine was started in a long disquisition on the battle of Falkirk, and the glories of which they communicated to his looks, and asked him if he was ill? Fortunately the bridge, all smirks and blushes, had just entered the room. Mrs. Williams was none of the brightest of women, who, after carefully considering, concluded that Edward had been shocked by disagreeable news in the papers, interfered so judiciously, that without exciting suspicion, she drew off Mr. Twight's eyes, and engaged with the widow after her left. Waverley then explained to his friends, that he was under the necessity of going to London as little delay as possible.

One cause of delay, however, did occur, to which Waverley had been very little accustomed. His purse, though well stocked when he first went to Tully Veolan, had not been reinforced since that period, and although his life since had not been of a nature to exhaust it hastily, for he had lived chiefly with his friends or with the army, yet, he found, that, after settling with his kind landlord, he should be too poor to encounter the expenses of a London visit. Of course, therefore, seemed to be, to get into the great north road about Borough-bridge, and there take a place in the Northern Diligence, a huge old-fashioned tub, drawn by two horses, which completes the journey from Edinburgh to London (God willing, as the advertisement expressed it) in three weeks. Our hero, therefore, took an affectionate farewell of his friends, and retired to the town of Carlisle; where he never to forget, and tacitly hoped one day to acknowledge, by substantial proofs of gratitude. After some petty difficulties and vexatious delays, and after putting his horse in the lath or a rank, though perfectly plain and simple, he accomplished crossing the country, and found himself in the desired vehicle risqué to Mrs. Nosebag, the lady of Lieutenant Nosebag, adjutant and riding-master of Waverley.

This lady was one of those active members of society who take upon them faire le frais de conversation. She had just returned from the north, and indeed the whole household were out hunting, or had been hunting the peticoat people into ribands at Falkirk, "only somehow there was one of those nasty, awkward maresies, that they are never without in Scotland, I think, and so our poor dear little regiment suffered something, as my Nosebag says, in that unsatisfactory affair. You, sir, have served in the dragons?" Waverley was taken so much at unawares that he answered, "Yes, sir, and for a regiment?"

"O, I knew it at once: I saw you were military from your air, and I was sure you could be none of the foot-wobblers, as my Nosebag calls them. What regiment, pray?"

"Gordier's dragons, ma'am; but I have retired some time."

"O aye, those as won the race at the battle of Preston, as my Nosebag says. Pray, sir, were you there?"

"I was so unfortunate, ma'am," he replied, "as to vote for a winner!

"And that was a misfortune that few of Gardiner's stood to witness, I believe, sir—ha! ha! ha! I beg your pardon; but a soldier's wife loves a joke."

"Ha! ha! ha! a soldier's wife, what infernal luck has penned me up with this inquisitive hag! Fortunately the good lady did not stick long to one subject. We are coming to Ferrybridge, now, and she said, "Wait a minute, were we left to support the bearables, and constables, and justices, and these sorts of creatures that are examining papers and stopping rebels and all that. They were hardly in the town before they were saluted by a cheer from the windows, and groans of Waverley to the door of Bridget, saying, "Yonder comes Corporal Bridget, of our poor dear troop; he's coming with the constable man; Bridget's one of my lambs, as Nosebag calls him."

"Come, Mr. — a—a—pray, what's your name, sir?"

"Butler, ma'am," said Waverley, resolved rather to make free with the name of a former fellow officer, than run the risk of detection by inventing one, not to be found in the regiment.

"O, you got a troop lately, when that shabby fellow, Waverley, went over to the rebels? Lord, I wish my old comrade Captain Crump would go over too! The rebels, that Nosebag might get the troop!—Lord, what can Bridget be standing swinging on the bridge for? I'll be hanged if he ain't hazy, as Nosebag says, you are, and going to the service, we'll put the race in mind of his duty."

Waverley, with feelings more easily conceived than described, saw himself obliged to follow this doughty female commander. The gallant trooper was as like a lamb as a drunk corporal of dragons, about six feet high, with very broad shoulders, and very thin legs, not to mention a great scar across his nose, could well be. Mrs. Nosebag addressed him with something, which if not an oath, sounded very much like one, and commanded him to attend to his duty.

"You be — for a —" commenced the gallant cavalier; but, looking up in order to suit the action, or perhaps the voice, with which he addressed the lady, he also enlaced the party, he recognised the speaker, made his military salam, and altered his tone. "Lord love your hands, ma'am!-Did ever Nosebag, is it you? Why, if a poor fellow does happen to fire a slug of a morning, I am sure you were never the lady to bring him this.

"Well, you rascalion, go, mind your duty; this gentleman and I belong to the service; but be sure you look after that shy cock in the slouched hat that sits in the corner of the coach. I believe he's one of the rebels."

"D—n her cowberry wig," said the corporal, when she was out of hearing, "that gimlet-eyed jade—mother adjutant, as we call her—a greater plague to the regiment than provost-marshal. sergeant-major, and old Hubble-de-Shuff, the colonel, into the bar gain.—Come, Master Constable, let's see if this shy cock, as he calls him, (who by the way, was a Quaker from Leeds, with whom Mrs. Nosebag had had some tart argument on the legality of bearing arms,) will stand godfather to a pup of brandy, for your Yorkshire and Lancashire society.

The vivacity of this good lady, as it helped Edward out of this scrape, was like to have drawn him into one or two others. In every town where they stopped, she wished to examine the corpse de garde, if there was one, and once very narrowly missed introducing Waverley to a recruiting-sergeant of his own regiment. Then she Captain'd and Butler'd him till he was quite maddened with vexation, and never was he more rejoiced in his life at the termination of a journey, than when the arrival of the coach in London freed him from the attentions of Madam Nosebag.

CHAPTER LXII.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE NEXT?

It was twilight when they arrived in town; and having shaken off his companions, and walked through a good many streets, to avoid the attention of Edward, traced by them, Edward took a hackney-coach and drove to Colonel Talbot's house, in one of the principal squares at the west end of the town. That gentleman, with his two children, had been exposed to many ridicule and ridicule since his marriage to a large fortune, possessed considerable political interest, and lived in what is called great style.

When Waverley knocked at his door, he found it at first difficult to procure admittance, but at length was shown into an apartment where the Colonel was at table. Lady Emily, whose very beautiful features were still pallid from indisposition, sat opposite to him. The instant he heard Waverley's voice, he started up and embraced him. "Frank Stanley, my dear boy, how d'yde?—Emily, my love, this is young Stanley."

The blood started to the lady's cheek as she gave Waverley a reception, in which courtesy was mingled with kindness, while her trembling hand and faltering voice showed how much she was startled and discomposed. Dinner was hastily replaced, and while Waverley was engaged in refreshing himself, the Colonel proceeded—"I wonder you have come here, Frank. The Doctors tell me the air of London is very bad for the complaint. You should not have troubled yourself with it. But I am delighted to see you, and, Emily is Emily, though I fear we must not reckon upon your staying long."

"Some particular business brought me up," muttered Waverley.

"I suppose so, but I shan't allow you to stay long. Spontoon," (to an elderly military-looking servant out of livery,) "take away these things, and answer the bell yourself, if I ring. Don't let any of the other fellows disturb us—My nephew and I have business to talk of."

When the servants had retired, "In the name of God, Waverley, what has brought you here? It may be as much as your life is worth."

"Dear Mr. Waverley," said Lady Emily, "to whom I owe so much more than acknowledgments can ever pay, how any one of these rebels can disturb us—""

"My father—my uncle—this paragraph,"—he handed the paper to Colonel Talbot.

"I wish to Heaven these scoundrels were condemned to be exhibited to death in their own press."

"William T. Talbot," said Talbot, "to whom I am told there are not less than a dozen of their papers now published in town, and no wonder that they are obliged to invent lies to find sale for their rags. It is the art of Edward, that you have lost your father; but as to this flourish of his unpleasant situation having grated upon his spirits, and hurt his health—the truth is—is a clever fellow, and not rebellious enough to wish to say so. Let your mind from the idea of weighty responsibility—the truth then is, that Mr. Richard Waverley, through this whole business, showed great want of sensibility, both to your situation and that of your uncle; and the last time I saw him, he told me, with great glee, that as I was so good as to take charge of your interests, Sir Edward is gone down to Waverley-Honor, freed from all uncessiness, unless upon your own account. But you are in peril yourself—your name is every proclamation—warrants are out to apprehend you. Do you think Edward is afraid of you?
Edward told his story at length, suppressing his quarrel with Ferguson; for, being himself partial to Highlanders, he did not wish to give any advantage to the Colonel's national prejudices.
"Are you sure it was your friend Glen's footboy you saw dead in Clifton Moor?"
"Quite positive."
"Then that little limb of the devil has cheated the gallows, for cut-throat was written in his face; though (turning to Lady Emily) "it was a very hand-some face too.—But for you, Edward, I wish you had been the judge, for I wish you had never sterred from thence, for there is an embargo in all the seaports, and a strict search for the adherents of the Pretender; and the tongue of the outrider is as much on her head as the clack of a mill, till somehow or other we will detect Captain Butler to be a feigned personage."
"Do you know any thing, asked Waverley, "of my husband?"
"Her husband was my sergeant-major for six years; she was a buxom widow, with a little money—his married her—was steady, and got on by being a good horseman and Spontoon; to which she is about; he will find her out among the old regimental connections. To-morrow you must be indisposed, and keep your room from fatigue. Lady Emily is to be relieved by Spontoon and your attendants.
You hear the name of a near relation of mine, whom none of my present people ever saw, except Spontoon, so there will be no immediate danger. So pray feel your head ache and your eyes grow heavy as soon as possible, that you may be put upon the sick list; and, Emily, do you order an appointment for Frank Stanley with all the attentions which an invalid may reciprocity.
In the morning the Colonel visited his guest.
"Now," said he, "I have some good news for you. Your reputation as a gentleman and officer is effectually cleared of neglect of duty, and accusation to the rectory in Garvock, and a personal assurance from yourself on this subject with a very zealous friend of yours, your Scottish parson, Morton; his first letter was addressed to Sir Frederick; but I relieved the good Baronet of the trouble of answering it. You must know, that your free-booting acquaint-tance, Donald of the Cave, has at length fallen into the hands of the Philistines. He was driving off the cattle of a certain proprietor, called Killan—somethings or other—""
"Killaneare?"
"It seems so. Now the gentleman being, it seems, a great farmer, and having a special value for his breed of cattle, being, moreover, rather of a timid disposition, had got a party of soldiers to protect his property. So Donald ran his head unawares into the lion's mouth, and was defeated and made prisoner.
Being ordered for execution, his conscience was assaissed on the one hand by a Catholic priest, on the other by your friend Morton. He repulsed the Catholic, but yielded to Morton. He had a certain extravagant notion, which this economical gentleman considered as an excessive waste of oil. So his conversion from a state of impertinence fell to Mr. Morton's share, who rendered him a service, and gained another of this sort. I suppose, Donald made but a queer kind of Christian after all. He confessed, however, before a magistrate, one Major Melville, who seems to have been a correct friendly sort of person, his full intrigue with Houghton, explaining particularly how it was carried on, and fully acquitting you of the least acces-sation to it. I was sent for by the men who have been going about and seizing the hands of the xv rnter officer, and sending you, by orders of the; First-Chevalier, I mean—as a prisoner to Doune, from whence you understood you were carried prisoner to Edinburgh, and quartered in quarters which cannot tell in your favour. He hinted that he had been employed to deliver and protect you, and rewarded for doing so; but he would not confess by name or place; but I have mind breaking any ordinary oath to satisfy the curiosity of Mr. Morton, to whose plaus admonitions he owed so much, yet, in the present case, he had been so wronged, as I would tell you which, it seems, constituted, in his opinion, an invinable obligation.
"And what is become of him?"
"Oh, he was hanged at Stirling after the rebels raised the siege, with his lieutenant, and four planks besides; he having the advantage of a gallows more lofty than his friends."
"Well, I have little cause either to regret or rejoice at his death; and yet he has done me both good and harm to a very considerable extent."
"His confession, at least, will serve you materially, since it is able to colour the picture of the confidences which gave the accusation against you a complexion of a nature different from that with which so many unfortunate gentlemen, now, or lately, in arms against the government, have been convicted. Their transgression—I must give it its name, though you participate in its guilt—is an action arising from mistaken virtue, and therefore cannot be classed as a disgrace, though it be doubtless highly criminal. Where the quality are so numerous, clemency must be extended to far the greater number; and I have little doubt of procuring a remission for you, providing we can keep you out of the clutches of justice, till she has selected and consigned her victims; for in this, as in other cases, it will be according to the vulgar proverb, "First come, first served." Besides, government are desirous at present to intimidate the English Jacobites; though I think they can find few examples for punishment. This is a vindictive and timid feeling which will soon wear off, for, of all nations, the English are least blood-thirsty by nature. But it exists at present, and you must, therefore, be kept out of the way in the mean time."

Now entered Spontoon with an anxious counteancient—his regimental acquaintance—had reed out Miss Porter, and, with his full of ire, ness, and fidget, at discovery of an impostor, who had travelled from the north with her under the assumed capte of Captain Butler of Gardiner's dragoons.

She was going to the city, and Sir Frederick, who have him sought for as an emissary of the Pretender;
but Spontoon, (an old soldier,) while he pretended to
As the brethren desires continued an indecible old man, they were by Stux, the Scottish Highlanders had usually some peculiar sentiment attached to an oath, which they intended should be binding on them. Very frequently it was your hands, as they were, on their own drawn dirk; when anger, becoming a party to the transaction, was smooked to punish any breach of faith. But by whatever ritual the oath was sanctioned, the party was extremely desirous to keep secret what the special oath was, which he considered as inviolable.
This was a matter of great convenience, as he felt no scruple in breaking his solemn word when such seemed to be the will that he accounted as peculiar solemn; and therefore readly granted any engagement which bound him no longer than he inclined. When the law of the oath which he accounted inviolable was once publicly known, no party with whom he might have veracity of contract, would have rested satisfied with any other.
Louis XI. of France practiced the same sophistry, for he also had a peculiar species of oath, the only one which he was ever known to respect, and which, therefore, he was very unwilling to pledge. The only engagement which was thus tacitly accepted binding, for example, was an oath of the Holy Cross or Saint Louis' Angels, which contained a portion of the True Cross.
If the peculiarity of the oath was not recognized at a certain due within the year. The Constable Saint Paul, being invited to a personal conference with Louis, refused to meet the king unless he would promise him such a form of oath as was known this. But, says Comines, the king replied, he would be more accommodating to you, my lord, though I was will to engage with any other oath which could be devised.
The treaty broke off, therefore, after much discussing concerning the nature of the oath which Louis was to give, the ance between the dicta of superstition and those of science.
Turning to Scotland? No relenting longings towards the land of mountains and foords, I am afraid.

"None of that," said the Baroness. "I am far from longing to move to Edinburgh, perhaps to your uncle, and even to Colonel Talbot, who now directs his course was now, therefore, the question.

"To Scotland," said Waverley.

"To Scotland?" said the Colonel; "with what purpose, not to engage again with the rebels, I hope?"

"No," I considered my campaign ended, when, after all my efforts, I could not reconcentrate; and now, by all accounts, they are gone to make a winter campaign, I think. In this, His Highness, the Commissioner-in-Chief, for, as Fluellen says, the Duke of York loves me well, and I thank Heaven I have deserved some love at his hands. I am now going out for an hour or two to some man's pate for your departure; your liberty extends to the next room, out by Emily's parlour, where you will find her when you are disposed for music, reading, or conversation. We have taken measures for all servants but Spontoon, who is as true as steel.

In about two hours Colonel Talbot returned, and found my young friend conversing with his lady; she pleased to give the information, and he delighted at being restored, though for a moment, to the society of his own rank, from which he had been for some time excluded.

"And now," said the Colonel, "hear my arrangements, for there is little time to lose. This youngster, Edward Waverley, alias Williams, alias Captain Butler, must continue to pass by his fourth alias of Francis Stanley, my nephew; who shall go out tomorrow for the North, and the charter shall take him the first two stages. Spontoon shall then attend him, and they shall ride post as far as Huntingdon, where the presence of his Grace is expected on the road as my means will check all disposition inquirers. At Huntingdon you will meet the real Frank Stanley. He is studying at Cambridge, but a little while ago, doubtful if the Duke of York's health would permit me to go down to the North myself, I secured him a passport from the secretary of state's office to go in my stead. As he went chiefly to look after you, his journey is not unseasonable. He knows your story; you will dine together at Huntingdon. Remember, in your wine-ride may hit upon some plan for removing or diminishing the danger of your farther progress northward. And now, taking out a morocco case, let me put you in funds for the campaign."

"I am ashamed, my dear Colonel," said I.

"Nay," said Colonel Talbot, "you should consider your purse in any event, but this money is your own. Your father, considering the chance of your being attainted, left me his trustee for your advantage. So that you are worth above 15,000l., besides Broxwood Lodge—a very independent person, I promise you."

My situation was here a little hazy, but the sum you may have, or credit abroad, as soon as your motions require it.

The first event which occurred to Waverley of his newly-acquired wealth, was to write to his former friend Farmer Jopson, requesting his acceptance of a silver tankard on the part of his friend Williams, who had not forgotten the night of the eighteenth December last. He hoped him at the same time carefully to preserve for him his Highland garb and accoutrements, particularly the arms, curious in themselves, and to which the friendship of the donors gave additional value. Lady Emily undertook to find some suitable token of remembrance, likely to flatter the vanity and please the taste of Mrs. Williams; and the Colonel, who was a kind of farmer, promised to send the Underwood, with an excellent team of horses for cart and plough.

One happy day Waverley spent in London and travelling in the manner projected, he met with Frank Stanley at Huntingdon. The two young men were acquainted in a minute.

"I can read my uncle's riddle," said Stanley; "the cautious old soldier did not care to hint to me that I might have more than one chance for him this year. I have no occasion for; but if it should afterwards come out as the rattle-paced trick of a young Cantab, care not, fire &c. You are to General to be Francis Stanley, with the underwood in your service. This is a matter of no moment; this year's campaign will be a joke withal, as the French will not be in sight this year."

"Indeed! and what can induce you to think of re-dissolved all political purposes from his present journey, and engaged in a series of machinations against the government, while travelling under protection of the secretary's passport.

The day passed morosely away. The young student was inquired into the Waverley campaigns, the Highlanders, and Edward, and was obliged to satisfy his curiosity by whistling a pibroch, dancing a strathspey, and singing a Highland song. The next morning Stanley roared above the wind with his new looks, and parted from him with great reluctance, upon the remonstrances of Spontoon, who, accustomed to submit to discipline, was rigid in enforcing it.

CHAPTER LXIII.

DEBOLATION.

Waverley, riding post, was as the usual fashion of the period, without any adventure save one or two coxcombs, which the talisman of his passport sufficiently answered, reached the borders of Scotland. Here he heard the tidings of the decisive battle of Culloden. It was no more than he had long expected, though the success at Falkirk had thrown a faint and lingering gleam of hope into his mind. The news fell upon him like a shock, by which he was for a time altogether unmanned. The generous, the courteous, the noble-minded Adventurer, was then a fugitive, with his horse broken, and his wig, so enthusiastic, so faithful, were dead, imprisoned, or exiled. Where, now, was the exulted and high-souled Fergus? If, indeed, he had survived the night at Crichton? Where the pure-hearted and primitive blind Bard of Brigwardine, whose foibles seemed foils to set off the disinterestedness of his disposition, the genuine goodness of his heart, and his unskewered courage? Who among the clans for support to these fallen columns, Rose and Flora, where they were to be sought, and in what distress must not the loss of their natural protectors have involved them? Of Flora, he thought with the regret of a brother for a sister; of Rose, with a sensation yet more deep and tender. It might be still his fate to supply the want of those guardians they had lost. Agitated by these thoughts he precipitated his journey.

When he arrived in Edinburgh, where his inquiries must necessarily commence, he felt the full difficulty of his situation. Many inhabitants of that city had seen and knew Edward; how could he then, could he avail himself of a passport as Francis Stanley? He resolved, therefore, to avoid all company, and to move northward as soon as possible. He had no baggage, nor horse or two in expectation of a letter from Colonel Talbot, and he was also to leave his own address, under his feigned character, at a place agreed upon. With this latter purpose he sailed out in the dusk through the well-known streets, carefully shunning observation, but in vain: one of the first persons whom he met at once recognized him. It was Mrs. Flockhart, Fergus MacIvor's good-bombarmed landlady.

"Gude guide us, Mr. Waverley, is this you? na, ye needna be feared for me. I wad betray nay gentleman in your circumstances—ah, lack a daisy! lack a daisy! here's a change o' markets; how merry Colonel MacIvor and you used to be in our house! And the good-natured widow shed a few natural tears. As there was no resisting her claim of acquaintance, Waverley acknowledged it with a good grace, as well as the danger of his own situation. "As it's near the darkning, sir, we'd ye just step in by to our house, and tak a dish o' tea? and I am sure if ye like to ride now the road from the road is clear, and no wars are disturbed, and nobody was ken ye; for Kate and Matty, the limmers, gaed a'it twa o' Hawley's dragoons, and I ha' twa new quens instead o' them."

Waverley, with a sense of unparalleled gratitude, engaged her lodging for a night or two, satisfied he should be safer in the house of this simple creature than anywhere else. When he entered the parlour, his heart swelled to see Flora—and, with the white cockade hanging beside the little mirror.

"Ay," said Mrs. Flockhart, seeing as she observed the direction of his eye, "he was a new one just the day before they marched, and I winna let them tak that aye doun, but just to brush it lika day myself; and whiles I look at it till I just thought it was the new head to bring him his breakfast, as he used to do when he was grana. It's unco silly—the neighbours ca' me a Jacobite—but they may say their say—I am sure it's for that—but he was as kind-hearted a gentleman as ever lived, and as weel-fa'd too. Oh, ye ken, sir, when is to suffer?"

"Suffer! Good heaven!—Why, where is he?"

"Eh, Lord knows! They've nae ken. The Lord be His land body, Duagall, Macalony, cam here a while aye, wi' ane o' his arms cutt off, and a sair clout in the head—ye'll mind Duagall, he carried cee eye an ax on his shouther—and he cam here just begging, as I may say, for something to eat. Aweel, he tauld us the Chief, as they ca'd him, (but I aye ca' him the Colonl,) and Ensign Maccomich, that ye mind best, were ta'en somewhere beside the English border, when it was one dark that his folk never missed him till it was ower late, and they were like to gant clean dant. And he said that little Callum Bog, he was a baud mischievous callant that,) and your honour, and a captain, and three more, were killed. That was the end of it. He's nae mae braun men. But he grat when he speak o' the Colonel, ye never saw the like. And now the word gainges the Colonel is to be tried, and to suffer wi' them that was at Carlisle."

"And his sister?"

"Ay, that they ca'd the Lady Flora—well, she's away up to Carlisle to him, and lives wi' some grand aunt lady theretoun to be near him."

"And," said Edward, "the other young lady?"

"Whilk other? I ken only of an sister the Colonel had."

"I mean Miss Brigwardine," said Edward.

"Ou, ay; the laird's daughter," said his landlady.

"She was a very bonne lassie, poor thing, but far skerrier than Lady Flora."

"Where is the neep o' God's sake?"

"Ou, wha kens where ony o' them is now? pair things, they're a'ar ta'en down for their white coarkles and their white roseus; but she gaed north to her father's in Perthshire, when the government troops cam back to Edinbro'. There was some pretty men among them, and ane Major Whacker was quartered on me, a very ceevil gentleman,—but O, Mr. Waverley, he was nothing as weel-fa'd as she pur Colonl."

"Do you know what has become of Miss Brigwardine's father?"

"The auld lad? na, nabcly kens that; but they say he fought very hard in that bluddy battle at Inversnaess; and Deacon Clank, the white-iron smith, says that the government folk are aar against him for having been ou' twice; and trith he might ha' ta'en warning, but there's nae fule like an auld fule—the pur Colonl was only out a'nce."

Such conversation contained almost all the good-natured widow knew of the fate of her late lodgers and acquaintances, but it was enough to determine Edward, at all hazards, to proceed instantly to Tully-Veolan, where he concluded he should see, or at least hear something of Rosetta. He therefore left a letter for Colonel Talbot at the place agreed upon, signed by his assumed name, and giving for his address the post-town next to the Baron's residence.

From Edinburgh to Perth, he took post-horses, resolving to make the rest of his journey on foot; a mode of travelling to which he was partial, and which had the advantage of permitting a deviation from the road, and of keeping a better eye on the distance. His campaign had considerably strengthened his constitution, and improved his habits of enduring fatigue. His baggage he sent before him as an opportunity of bringing the movements of hostile armies. As he advanced northward, the traces of war became visible. Broken carriages, dead horses, unroofed cottages, trees felled for palisades, and bridges destroyed, on only partially repaired, and the movements of hostile armies. In those places
Waverley.

... where the gentry were attached to the Stewart cause, their houses were dismantled, or deserted, and the usual course of what may be called ornamental labour was totally interrupted, and the inhabitants were seen arguing about with fear, sorrow, and dejection on their faces.

It was one of the greatest misfortunes which his imagination anticipated, and it seemed to him that his time ought only to be consecrated to elegant or amusing study, and relieved now and then by the observation of the heavens; and how saddened, yet how elevated was his character, within the course of a very few months! Danger and misfortune are rapid, though severe teachers.

A sad tale a whisperer of a man, he felt, in internal confidence and mental dignity, a compensation for the pay dreams which, in his case, experience had so rapidly dissolved.

As he approached the village, he saw, with surprise and anxiety, that a party of soldiers were quartered near it, and, what was worse, that they seemed stationary there. This he conjectured from a few tents which he beheld glittering upon what was called the garrison hill, or, if its task of being stopped and questioned in a place where he was so likely to be recognised, he made a large circuit, altogether avoiding the hamlet, and approaching the place by a road known only to him. A single glance announced that great changes had taken place. One half of the gate, entirely destroyed, and split up for firewood, lay in piles ready to be taken away; the other swung useless about upon its loosened hinges. The battlements above the gate were broken and thrown down, and the carved Bears, which were said to have done sentence of duty upon the gate, lay broken and torn from their posts, lay among the rubbish. The avenue was cruelly wasted. Several large trees were felled and tumbled across the path; and the cattle of the villagers, and the monument, which had been placed in black mud the verdant turf which Waverley had so much admired.

Upon entering the courtyard, Edward saw the feras realised which these circumstances had excited. The place had been sacked by the king's troops, who, in wanton mischief, had even attempted to burn it; and though the thickness of the walls had resisted the fiercest efforts of the assailants and our houses were totally consumed. The towers and pinnacles of the main building were scorched and blackened; the pavement of the court broken and shattered; the corn down the park, the grass demolished, and the court strewn with articles of furniture broken into fragments. The accessories of ancient distinction, to which the Baron, in the pride of his heart, had attached so much importance and veneration, were treated with peculiar contumely. The fountain was demolished, and the spring, which had supplied it, now flooded the courtyard. The stone basin seemed to be destined for a drinking-trough for cattle, from the manner in which it was arranged upon the ground. The whole tribe of Bears, large and small, had experienced as little favour as those at the head of the avenue, and one or two of the family pictures, which seemed to have served as targets for the soldiers, lay on the ground in tatters.

With an aching heart, as may well be imagined, Edward viewed this wreck of a mansion so respected. But his anxiety to learn the fate of the proprietors, and his tears as to what that fate might be, increased with his expectation. Then he entered upon the terrace, new scenes of desolation were visible. The balustrade was broken down, the walls destroyed, the borders overgrown with weeds, and the fruit-trees cut and torn up. In one moment of the old-fashioned garden, were two immense horse-chestnut trees, of whose size the Baron was particularly vain: too lazy, perhaps, to cut them down, the spoil from their branches had placed a quantity of gunpowder in the cavity. One

... had been shivered to pieces by the explosion, and the remnants of the fragments loosened, encouraged the ground it had so long shadowed. The other mine had been more partial in its effect. About one-fourth of the trunk of the tree was torn from the mass, which, raised and defaced on the one side, still spread on the other its ample and undiminished boughs.

... Amid these general marks of ravage, there were some which more particularly engaged the feelings of Waverley. Viewing the front of the building, thus wasted and defaced, his eyes naturally sought the little balcony which more properly belonged to Rose's apartment than to the public stage. It was easily discovered, for beneath it lay the shrubs of flowers and shrubs, with which it had its pride to decorate it, and which had been buried from the bastman; several of her books were mingled with branches and flower-pots and other remnants. Among these, Waverley distinguished one of his own, a small copy of Ariosto, and gathered it as a treasure, though wasted by the wind and rain.

While plunged in the sad reflections which the scene excited, he was looking around for some one who might explain the fate of the inhabitants, he heard a voice from the interior of the building singing, in well-remembered accents, an old French song:

"They came upon us in the sight, And made my bower and bow my knight." "My servants for life did flee, And all my hopes were gone by me."

"They slew my knight, to me was dear, They slew my knight, and drive his ghost." "They made me set the sun may rise, But a deadly sleep has closed his eyes." "Alas, thought Edward, is it thou? Poor helpless being, art thou alone left, to gibe and moan, and fill with thy wild and unconnected scraps of minstrelsy the hall, that infected thou?—He then called his voice, first low, and then louder, "Davie—Davie Gallatref!"

The poor simpトン showed himself among the ruins of a sort of green house, that once terminated with a beautiful garden house, of which Waverley had so much admired. The poor fellow appeared amongst the ruins of the house, and of the sweetness which John had largely admired. Edward, now in the face, and said, "A dead and gale—s and gale."

"Who are dead?" said Waverley, for feeling the incapacity of Davie to hold any connected discourse.

"Baron—and Bailie—and Saunders Saumerson—and Lady Rose, that sang so sweet—A dead and—gale—dead and gale."

"But, my dear, where are you?" When Edward saw me.

"While I was busy with the dead, I was also writing the dead should be—" Each in his shroud, in his shroud.

"While winds pipe loud, and red roses posse dis through the cloud."

... A pair of chestnut trees, destroyed, the one entirely, and the other in part, by such a miscible and wasteful set of revenge as grew at Falstaff Castle, the fastnesses of Macbeth of theERRY.

... The first three completions are from an old ballad, called the Border Widow's Lament.
CHAPTER LXIV.

COMPARING OF NOTES.

The Baron's story was short, when divested of the adages and common-places, Latin, English, and Scotch, with which his tradition garnished it. He said the Baron his great at the loss of Edward, and of Glengarnock, sought the fields of Falkirk and Coloden, and related how, after all was lost in the last battle, he had returned home, under the idea of more easily finding shelter among his own tenants, and on his own estate, than elsewhere. A party of soldiers had been sent to lay waste his property, for decency was not the order of the day. Their presence was so much respected that the court. The estate, it was found, might not be diverted to the crown, to the prejudice of Malcolm Bradwine and Inch-Grahame, the heir-male, whose estate was to be sold without regard for decency, as deriving no right through him, and who, therefore, like other heirs of entail in the same situation, entered upon possession. But, unlike many in similar circumstances, he knew his right to the property, and that he had retained uttery to exclude his predecessor from all benefit or advantage in the estate, and that it was his purpose to avail himself of the old Baron's evil fortune to the utmost. This was a matter as it was generally known, that, from a romantic idea of not prejudicing this young man's right as heir-male, the Baron had refrain from setting his hand to the deed.

This selfish injustice was resented by the country people, who were partial to their old master, and irritate against his successor. In the Baron's own words, "The matter did not coincide with the feelings of the commons of Bradwine, Mr. Waverley; and the tenants were black and repugnant in payment of their rents and duties; and when my kinsmen came to the village we were received by James Howie, to last the rents, some wenchworth person. I suspect John Heatherbutter, the pride keeper, that were out in the year fifteen—find a spot at him in the glumery, whereby he was so affrighted, that I may say with Tullis in Caution, Abill, erewit, erewrit, effeul. He fled, sir, as one may vy, incontinent to Sirling. And now he hath advertised the estate for sole, being himself the last substitute in the entail. And if I were to lament about such matters, this would give me more than its passing from my immediate possession, which, in the course of nature, must necessarily have passed in the end, and now it passes from the lineage that should have possessed it in serena secessum. But Girls will be done, and many perfect sexes, Sir John of Bradwine—Blackhead, that model for a common-ancestor of our house and the Inch-Grabins. Little thought such a person would have sprung from his joint. Meantime, he has accused me to some of the notables, the rulers for the time, as if I were a cut-throat, and an abbot of bravest and assassins, and coper-jarets. And they have sent solders here to abate on the estate, and hunt me like a partridge, upon the meanimons, as sharpness, eye of good King David, or like our valiant Sir William Wallace, in that I bring not's it into comparison with either—I thought, when I heard at the door, they had driven the wild deer to his den at last; and so I can propose to do at bay, like a buck of the first head. But now, Janet, cume ye gie us something for supper."

"Ou ay, sir, I' ll brander the moor flood that John Heatherbutter brought in this morning; and ye see par Davie's roasting the black hen's eggs. I daur say, Mr. Waverley, ye never kent that a' the eggs that were sold to the dead men red about red about yesterday, were ay turned by our Davie?—there's no the like o' him any gate for powtering wi' his fingers among the hot peat ashes, and roasting eggs." Davie all this while lay with his arms folded, his eyes fixed among the ashes, kicking his heels, mumbling to himself, turning the eggs as they lay in the hot burners, as if to confute the provest, that there goes reason to roasting of eggs, and justify the culgummon which poor Janet poured out upon.

swar at me that it was the auld rebel, as the villains called his Honour: and Davie was in the wood, and heard the tiulzie, and he, just out o' his ain head, got up the auld gray mantle that his Honour had flung off him to gae the faster, and came out o' the very same bit o' the wood, majoring and looking about a\l like his Honour, that they were clean beguiled, and thought they had letten aff their gun at crack-brained Sam bowy, as they ca'd him; and they gae me a\l expanse, and I a salmon fish, to say nothing about it.—Na, na, Davie's no just like other folk, puir fello\l; but he's no sae silly as folk tak him for.—But, to be sure, we saw nae doon for his Honour, when we and ours have lived on his ground this twa hundred years; and when he kept my puir Jamie at school and college, and even at the Ha'—house, till he was on a master; and when he saved the true being ta'en to Perth as a witch—Lord forgive'thee that would touch sic a puir silly auld body!—and has maintained puir Davie at buck and manger maint feck o' his life?'

Waverley at length found an opportunity to interrupt Janet's narrative, by an inquiry after Miss Bradwardine.

"She's weel and safe, thank God! at the Duchan," answered the Baron; "the laird's distinctly related to us, and more nearly to my chaplain, Mr. Rubrick; and, though he be of Whig principles, yet he's not for gay."

The Bailie's wife was doing what he can to save something out of the wreck for puir Rose; but I doubt, I doubt, I shall never see her again, for I maun lay my bane in some far corner of the house.

"Hout na, your Honour," said old Janet, "ye were just as ill aff in the fifties, and got the bonnie bonnie back, na a'.—And now the clog is ready, and the hun-cock's bann'd red, and their gall's a thrush and the heel o' the white loof that can frae the Bailie's; and there's plenty o' brandy in the greybeard that Luckie Mac-Learn sent down, and we've ye in plenty, as I was sair!"

"I wish, the Prince, at least, of our acquaintance, may be no worse off," said the Baron to Waverley, who joined him in cordial hopes for the safety of the unfortunate Chevalier.

Then they began to talk of their future prospects. The Baron's plan was very simple. It was to escape to France, where, by the interest of his old friends, he hoped to get some military employment, of which he still conceived himself capable. He invited Waverley to go with him, a proposal in which he acquiesced, providing the interest of Colonel Talbot should fail in procureing his pardon. Of this he hoped to be informed by the laird, and give him a right to assist him in his exile; but he forbore to speak on this subject until his own fate should be decided. Then he added, that he had, if possible, become more anxious, for whom the Baron expressed great anxiety, although, he observed, he was "the very Achilles of Horatius Flaccus."

"Imperator, Invincibilis, incolatus, acer."

Which," he continued, "has been thus rendered (vernacularly) by Struan Robertson:

A fine eel, a furious chief.
As lie so zingal le d' clive at steel."

Flora had a large and unqualified share of the good man's sympathy.

It was about a week late. Old Janet got into some kind of kennel behind the hallan; Davie had been long asleep and snoring between Ban and Bucscar. These dogs had followed him to the hut after the mansion-house was deserted, and there constantly resisted; and their ferocious watch against a woman's temptation of being a witch, contributed a good deal to keep visitors from the glen. With this view, Bailie M'Intyre had provided Janet underhang with gloves over their main body; and also with what articles of luxury for his patron's use, in supplying which much precaution was necessarily used. After some completion, the mansion-house occupied his usual course, and Waverley reclined in an easy chair of tatter'd velvet, which had once garnished the state bed-room of Tully Colin, 011 the furniture of this mansion was now scattered through all the cottages in the vicinity, and went to sleep as comfortably as if he had been in a bed of down.

CHAPTER LXV.

MORE EXPLANATION.

With the first dawn of day old Janet was scuttling about the house to wake the Baron, who usually slept sound and heavily.

"I must go back," he said to Waverley, "to my cover: will you walk down the glen with me?" They went out together, and followed a narrow and entangled foot-path, which the occasional passage of anglers, or woodcutters, had traced by the side of the stream. On their way, the Baron explained to Waverley, that he would be under no danger in remaining a day or two at Tully-Veolan, and even in being seen walking about, if he used the precaution of pretending that he was looking at the estate as agent or surveyor for an English gentleman, who designed to be purchaser. With this view, he recommended to him to visit the Bailie, who still lived at the factor's house, called Little Veolan, about a mile from the village, though he was to remove at next term. Stanley's passport would be an answer to the officer who commanded the military; and as to any of the country people who might recognize Waverley, the Baron assured him he was in no danger of being betrayed by them. "I believe," said the old man, "half the people of the barony believe that their poor servant, my Scotch howbee, is nowhere hereabout; for I see they do not suffer a single barn to come here a bird-nesting; a practice, which, when I was in full possession of my power as baron, I was unable to put a stop."

No one could find her of things in my way, that the poor bodich, God help them! leave there, because they think they may be useful to me. I hope they will get a wiser master, and as a curse, as I was." A natural sigh closed the sentence; but the quiet equanimity with which the Baron endured his misfortunes, had something in it venerable and even sublime.

There was no fruitless repining, no turbulent melancholy: he bore his lot, and the hardships which it involved, with a good-humoured, though serious composure, and used no violent language against the prevailing party.

"I did what I thought my duty," said the old man, "and questionless they are doing what they think it. Grives me sometimes to look upon these bloodsuckers, these traitors; but doubtless officers cannot always keep their hand from depredation and spoliation; and Gustavus Adolphus himself, as ye may read in Colonel Munro his History, (which the great traveller Poggeke called Jerbo,) a feeble people, that make our abode in the rocks. So, fare you well, my good lad, till we meet at Janet's in the even; for I must get into Patmos, which is no easy matter for my auld stiff legs." With that he began to ascend the rock, striking, with the help of his hands, from one precarious foothold to another, not without fear, for two or three bushes concealed the mouth of a hole, resembling an oven, into which the Baron insinuated, first his head and shoulders, and then, by slow gradation, the rest of his long body. His legs and feet, finally disappearing, seemed, as it were, a huge snako entering his retreat, or a long pedigree introduced with care and difficulty into the narrow pigeon-hole of an old cabinet. Waverley had the curiosity to clamber up and look in upon him in his den, as the lurking- place of a small black, roomy, old deal chest, which he looked not unlike that ingenious puzzle, called a reel in a bottle, the marvel of children, (and of some grown people too, myself for one,) who can neither comprehend it nor get it undone, and yet desire to be taken out. The cave was very narrow, too low in the roof to admit of its standing, or almost of his sitting up, though he made some awkward attempts at it. He observed that, in the highest part of this cave, was dried beef, and filled with clean straw and withered fern. "It made," as he said, coiling himself up with an air of simperous and comfort which contrasted strangely with his situation, "unles when the wind was due north, a very passable air for an old soldier." Neither, as he observed, was he without sentinels for the purpose of reconnoitring. Davie and his mother were constantly on the watch, to discover and aver danger; and it was singular what instances of address seemed dictated by the instinctive attachment of the poor simpleton, when his patron's safety was concerned.

With Janet, Edward now sought an interview. He had recognised her at first sight as the old woman who had nursed him during his sickness after his military exploit at Brunanburh. She was very tall, though a little repaired, and somewhat better furnished, which certainly was the place of his confinement; and he now recollected on the common roar of Tully-Veolan the talk of a large decayed house, called the Gaye Ee-tree, in which he had no doubt was the same at which the Highlanders rendezvoused on that memorable night. All this he had combined in his imagination the night before last, and, like a savage, who has never read a book, prevented him from cataclysming Janet in the presence of the Baron.

He now commenced the task in good earnest; and the first question was, Was it the young lady that visited the hut during his illness? Janet paused for a little; and then observed, that to keep the secret now, would neither do good nor ill to any body.

"It was just a laddy that hainn her equal in the world—Miss Bardwadine!"

"Then Miss Rose was probably also the author of my deliverance." Inferred Waverley, delighted at the thought of which he was so much the author, as the art in which he was about to display his ingenuity to keep a word about the matter; for she said, "I meant to speak asye Gaelic when ye was in hearing, to make ye trow we were in the Hebrides. I could speak it well enough, for my mother was a Hebridean woman."

A few more questions now brought out the whole mystery respecting Waverley's deliverance from the bondage in which he left Carnwarken. Never did a bowel sound sweeter to an aquaint, than the coarse teutology, with which old Janet detailed every circumstance, thrilled upon the ears of Waverley. But his reason was not so dull a lover, and I must spare his patience, by attempting to comprehend within reasonable compass, the narrative which old Janet spread through a baragone of nearly two hours.

Janet had informed to Ferguson the letter he had received from Rose Bardwadine, by Davie Geltair, giving an account of Tully-Veolan being occupied by a small party of soldiers, that circumstance and the well being of her busy and active mind of the Chieftain. Eager to display the power of his mind and the force of the enemy, desire to prevent their establishing a garrison so near him, and willing also to obtain some news of his wife, which was then exactly in his duty, the news of Cope's having marched into the Highlands to meet and disperse the forces of the Chevalier, they came to a head, obliged him to join the standard with his whole forces.

He sent to David to find him; but that cautious freebooter, who well understood the value of a separate command, instead of joining sent various messages which the pressure of the times compelled him to send from one side to another, without the internal resolution of being renowned on him for his procrastination, time and place convenient. However, as he could not avoid the matter, he issued orders to David to return into the Low Country, drive the soldiers from Tully-Veolan, and, paying all respect to the mansion of the Baron, to take his abode somewhere near it, for protection of his daughter, which he knew would keep away any of the armed volunteers, or small parties of military, which he might find moving about the vicinity.

As this charge formed a sort of roving commission, which Donald proposed to interpret in the way most advantageous to himself, as he was relieved from the immediate terror of Ferguson, and as he had, from former secret services, some interest in the concerns of the Chevalier, he resolved to make hay while the sun shone. He achieved, without difficulty, the task of driving the soldiers from Tully-Veolan; but although he desired to cut to the quick of the Chevalier, or to disturb Miss Rose, being unwilling to make himself a powerful enemy in the Chevalier's army.

"For well he knew the Baron's wrath was deadly; yet he set about to raise contributions and exactions on the tenantry, and otherwise to turn the war to his own advantage. Meanwhile he mounted the white cockade, and waited upon Rose with a pretence of great devotion for the service in which her father was engaged, and many apologies for the freedom he used, but in which he did not use the power to assume. It was at this moment that Rose learned, by open-mouthed fame, with all sorts of exaggeration, that Waverley had killed the smith at Carnwarken, in an attempt to arrest him; and then cast into a dungeon by Major Melville of Carnwarken, and was to be executed by martial law within three days. In the anxiety which these tidings excited, she proposed to Donald Bean the rescue of the prisoner. It was the very sort of service which he was desirous to undertake, judging it might constitute a merit of such a nature as would make amends for any pecuniary losses which his action might have occasioned, and add to the art, however, pleasure all the while duty and discipline, to hold off, until poor Rose, in the extremity of her distress, offered to him the enterprise with some valuable presents which had been her mother's.

Donald Bean, who had served in France, knew, and perhaps over-estimated, the value of these trinkets. But he also perceived Rose's apprehensions of its being discovered that she had parted with her jewels for Waverley's liberation. Resolved this scruple should not part him and the husband, he voluntarily offered to take an oath that he would never mention Miss Rose's share in the transaction; andforeseeing convenience in keeping the oath, and no probable advantage in breaking it, he took the engagement—in order, as he told his lieutenant, to deal handomely by the young lady—in the only modest form by which, with a mental pact with himself, he considered as binding—he swore secrecy upon his own head.

It was not until the next day and the time of his departure, that Miss Bardwadine showed to her daughter Alice, which, while they cared the heart of the mountain damsels, highly gratified the spirit of the lady. And Alice, who would now have poured out the whole contents of her little English, was very unwilling to account for Rose's kindness, rashly confided to her the whole papers respecting the intrigue with Garneth, those papers which were the demonstration, and as readily undertook, at no instance, to restore them to Waverley without her father's knowledge. For they may oblige the young lady and the young some young gentlemen, and Alice, and what use has my father for a mere o' scarted paper?"
The reader is aware that she took an opportunity of executing this purpose on the eve of Waverley's leaving the glen.

How Donald executed his enterprise, the reader is aware, but the expulsion of the military from Tullie-Veolan was, he was told, so skillfully managed that the provost's son might have been in one of the windows had he not been hurried away by a gale of wind. Captain Parker, a gentleman and a disciplinarian, neither intruded himself on Miss Bradwardine, whose unprotected situation he respected, nor permitted his soldiers to commit any breach of discipline, nor even to cut down a little elm, which was left standing near the house of Tullie-Veolan, and placed proper guards at the passes in the vicinity. This unwell news reached Donald Bean Lean as he was returning to Tullie-Veolan. Determined, however, to obtain the good of his labour, he resolved, since approach to Tullie-Veolan was impossible, to deposit his prisoner in Janet's cottage, a place, the very existence of which could hardly have been suspected even by those who had long lived in the vicinity, unless they had been guided thereto, and which was utterly unknown to Waverley himself. This effected, he claimed a reward; and the whole affair, as it appeared, was an event which deranged all their calculations. Donald was obliged to leave the neighbourhood with his people, and to seek more free course for his adventures. He, in his beauty, he carried with him an old man, a herbalist, who was supposed to understand a little of medicine, to attend Waverley during his illness.

In the meanwhile, new and fearful doubts started in Rose's mind. They were suggested by old Janet, who insisted, that a reward having been offered for the apprehension of Waverley, and his own personal enemy and habitual haunts not being far, the danger was not so great as to make him sacrilegious, and that what breach of faith Donald might be tempted. In an agony of grief and terror, Rose took the resolution of explaining to the Prince himself the danger that was so imminent. Waverley, of course, would not object to any interference on his part, both as a politician, and a man of honour and humanity. Charles Edward would interest himself to prevent his falling into the hands of the opposite party. This letter she at first thought of sending anonymously, but naturally feared it would not, in that case, be credited. She therefore subscribed her name, though with reluctance and terror, and consigned it to the hands of an old man, who was to take it along with his family to join the Chevalier's army, made it his petition to her to have some sort of credentials to the Adventurer, from whom he hoped to obtain a commission. Waverley enclosed a letter to Charles Edward, fixing his descent to the Lowlands, and, aware of the political importance of having it supposed that he was in correspondence with the English Jacobites, he caused the messenger to be transmitted, to Donald Bean Lean, to transmit Waverley, safe and uninterred, in person or effects, to the governor of Doune Castle. The freewheeling durst not disobey, for the army of the Prince was now so near him that punishment might have followed; besides, he was a politician as well as a robber, and was unwilling to cancel the interest created through former secret services by being refractory on this occasion. He therefore made a virtue of necessity, and transmitted orders to his lieutenant to convey Edward to Doune, which was safely accomplished in the mode mentioned in a former chapter. The governor of Doune was directed to send him to Edinburgh as a prisoner, because the Prince was apprehensive that Waverley, if set at liberty, might have resumed his purpose of returning to England, without affording him an opportunity of a personal interview. In this, indeed, he acted by the advice of the Chevalier of Glenfinnan, with whom it may be remembered the Chevalier consulted the morning of the mysterious departure of Edward, though without telling him how he came to learn the place of his confinement.

This, indeed, Charles Edward considered as a libel, though Rose's letter was couched in the most cautious and general terms, and proffered to be written merely from motives of humanity, and zeal for the Prince's service, on which she expressed so anxious a wish that she should not be known to have interfered, that the Chevalier was induced to suspect the deep interest which she took in Waverley's safety. This conjecture, which was well founded, led, led, in the eyes of the court, and the court of public estimation, to the report of his death. His death, however, so far as the world was concerned, was not known, and the report was that he was being prepared for the service of the Chevalier, and that it would be his last, and his last would be the last of the order, and that he would never return to his country again. It was this report that was current among the people; and, watching attentively the behaviour of the ladies towards Waverley, he had no doubt that the young Englishman had no interest with Flora, and was beloved by Rose Bradwardine. Desirous to bind Waverley to his service, and wishing also to do a kind and friendly action, the Prince next assailed the Baron upon the subject of settling his estate upon his daughter, Mr. Bradwardine acquiesced; but the consequence was, that Fergus was immediately induced to prefer his double suit for a wife and an earldom, which the Prince rejected in the manner we have seen. Fergus expected the result of his own multiplied affairs, had not hitherto sought any explanation with Waverley, though often meaning to do so. But after Fergus's declaration, he saw the necessity of appeasing the couple between the rival, devotedly hoping that the matter, which now seemed fraught with the seeds of strife, might be permitted to lie over till the termination of the expedition. When on the march to Derby, Fergus, being conversing concerning his quarrel with Waverley, alleged as the cause, that Edward was desirous of retracting the suit he had made to his sister, the Chevalier plainly told him, that he had observed nothing suspect in the Chevalier's behaviour to Waverley, and that he was convinced Fergus was under the influence of a mistake in judging of Waverley's conduct, who, he had every reason to believe, was endeavoring to do nothing prejudicial. The quarrel which ensued between Edward and the chieftain is, I hope, still in the remembrance of the reader. These circumstances will serve to explain such points of our narrative, as, according to the custom of story-tellers, we deemed it fit to leave unexplained, for the purpose of exciting the reader's curiosity.

Wh. Janet had once finished the leading facts of this narrative, Waverley was easily enabled to apply the clue which they afforded, to other mazes of the labyrinth in which he had been engaged. To Rose Bradwardine, to Charles Edward, to the Lowlands, to the English Jacobites, to Doune Castle, to Janet, and to Donald Bean Lean, he could freely and unreservedly communicate all the secrets of his mind, that his heart might share with him either in foreign countries or in his own. The pleasure of being allied to a man of the Baron's high worth, and who was so much valued by his uncle Sir Everard, was also an agreeable consideration, had anything been wanting to recommend the match. His absconders, which had appeared grotesquely ludicrous during his prosperity, seemed, in the sunset of his fortune, to be harmonized and assimilated with the noble features of his character, so as to add peculiarly without exciting ridicule. His mind occupied with such projects of future happiness, Edward sought Little Veolan, the habitation of Mr. Duncan Macwheeble.
of oatmeal-porridge, and at the side thereof, a horn-spoon and a bottle of two-penny. Eagerly running his eye over a voluminous law-paper, he from time to time shovelled an immense spoonful of these nutritive substances into his mouth, and, topping them off with a Dutch bottle of brandy which stood by, intimated either that this honest limb of the law had taken his morning already, or that he meant to season his porridge with such digestive; or perhaps both circumstances might reasonably be inferred. His night-cap and morning-gown had-whilom been of tartan, but, equally cautious and frugal, the honest Baillie had not the face to let his old ill-turned colours stand; and might remind his visitors of his unlucky excursion to Derry. To sun up the picture, his face was daubed with snuff up to the eyes, and his fingers with ink up to the knuckles. He looked dubiously at Waverley as he approached the little green sail which fenced his desk and stall from the approach of the vulgar. Nothing could give the Baillie more annoyance than the idea of his acquaintance being claimed by any of the unfortunate gentlemen, who were now so much more likely to need assistance than to afford profit. But this was the rich young Englishman—who knew what Americans mean by a mansion house—I was the Baron's friend too—what was to be done?

While these reflections gave an air of absurd perplexity to the poor man's visage, Waverley, reflecting on the situation, and the manner in which he was about to take his ease, had a sort of a nature so ridiculously contrasted with the appearance of the individual, could not help bursting out a-laughing, as he checked the propensity to explain with Syphax.

As Mr. Macwheddie had no idea of any person large enough to be opprobred by a young man, or oppressed by poverty, the hilarity of Edward's countenance greatly relieved the embarrassment of his own, and giving him a tolerably hearty welcome to Litle Vilder, he chose for his breakfast. His visitor had, in the first place, something for his private ear, and begged leave to bolt the door. Duncan by no means liked this precaution, which savoured of danger to be apprehended; but he could not now draw back.

Convinced he might trust this man, as he could make it his interest to be faithful, Edward communed with his visitor, and the conversation was connected and was much witted by Macwheddie. The wily agent listened with apprehension when he found Waverley was still in a state of procession—was somewhat comforted by learn'r's repelling him, and chose for his breakfast. tion to the late rebellion." The other proves to be a protection of the same tenor in favour of Edward Waverley, Esq. Colonel Talbot's letter was in these words:

"My dear Edward,

"I am just arrived here, and yet I have finished my business; it has cost me some trouble though, as you shall hear. I waited upon His Royal Highness immediately on my arrival, and found him in very good humour for my purposes. Three or four Scotch gentlemen were just leaving his levee. After he had expressed himself to me very courteously; 'Would you think it," he said, 'Talbot, here have been half a dozen of the most liberal gentlemen and best friends to government north of the Forth, Major McVilfe of Carscraggan, Rubrick of Duchran, and others, who have fairly wrung from me, by their downright importunity, a present protection, and the promise of a future pardon, for that stubborn old rebel whom they call Baron of Bradwardine. They allege that his high personal character, and the clemency which he showed to such of us as fell into the rebels' hands, should weigh in his favour; especially as the loss of his estate is likely to be a severe enough punishment. Rubrick has undertaken to keep him informed of all things settled in the country; but it's a little hard to be forced in a manner to pardon such a mortal enemy to the House of Brunswick. This was no favourable moment for open business, but it was fortunate for me to learn that his Royal Highness was in the course of granting such requests, as it embodied me to present one of the like nature in my name. He was at first a little peremptory; I mentioned the uniform support of our three votes in the House, touched mostly on services abroad, though valuable only in his Royal Highness's having been pleased kindly to hear me, and found my pretty string on his own expressions of friendship and good-will. He was embarrassed, but obstinate. I hinted the policy of detaching, on all future occasions, the heir of such a family from the machinations of the disaffected. But I understood peremptorily the obligations which I lay under to Sir Everard, and to you personally, and claimed, as the sole reward of my services, that he would be pleased to afford me the means of expressing my gratitude. I perceived that he still manifested a refusal, and, taking my commission from my pocket, I said, (as a last resource) that as his Royal Highness did not, under these pressing circumstances, grant me the grant I desired, it was the more necessary for me to seek the protection of his Royal Highness, and to retire from the service. He was not prepared for this; he told me to take up my commission; said some handsome things of my services, and granted my request. You are therefore once more a freeman, and I have promised for you that you will be a good boy in future, and remember what you owe to the lenity of government. Thus you see my prince can be as generous as yours. I do not pretend, indeed, that he confers a favour with all the foreign graces and compliments of your Chevalier errant; but he has a plain English manner, and the evident reluctance to grant for your request, indicates the sacrifice which he makes of his own inclination to your wishes. My friend, the adjacent-general, has procured me a duplicate of the Baron's protection, (the original being in Major McVilfe's possession,) which I send to you, as I know that if you can find him you will have pleasure in being the first to communicate the joyful intelligence. He will of course repair to the Bank to give your dividend of quarter, and remain, if necessary, a few weeks. As for you, I give you leave to escort him thither, and to stay a week there, as I understand a certain fair lady is in that quarter. And I have the satisfaction of knowing you will do all that can make in your good graces will be highly a cressible to Sir Everard and Mrs. Rachel, who will not believe your views and prospects settled, and the three eminent personages in actual safety, until you present them with a Mrs. Edward Waverley. Now, certain love-affairs of my own—a good many years since—interrupted some services which were then proposed in favour of the three eminent personages; so I am bound in honour to make them amends. Therefore make good use of your time, for, when your week is expired, you will be necessary to go to London to plead your pardon in the law courts.

"Ever dear Waverley, yours must truly,

"Philip Talbot."

CHAPTER LXVII.

Happy the warning.

That's not long a doing.

When the first rapturous sensation occasioned by these excellent tidings had somewhat spent, the latter part of the day was spent in going down to the prison to acquaint the Baron with their import. But the cautious Bailie justly observed, that if the Baron were to appear instantly in public, the tenantry and villagers might become furious in opposing their joy, and give offence to "the powers that be," a sort of persons for whom the Bailie always had unlimited respect. He therefore proposed that Mr. Waverley should not enter, but should give the Bailie two horsemen, two officers, and one of his servants; and let him go to Edinburgh under their protection, and obtain his countenance for harbouring him that night, and he would have horses ready on the morrow to set him on his way to the Durham along with Mr. Stair, who would comply with all his wishes. Then, by moving on, the Bailie's sworn to give no hint of the Baron's return, and certainly Mr. Stair would--but you will not go down to the glen yourself in the evening to meet your patron's wishes.

"That I would, I will do it, and I would oblige to your honour for putting me in mind of your own business. But it will be past sunset before I get back from the Captain's, and as these unseemly hours the glen has a bad name; there's something so nasty about old Janet Gallatry. The Laird he'll no believe these things, but he was aye o'er rash and venturesome—and feared neither man nor devil—and said he was o' the luik. But right sure am I Sir George MacKenzie says, that no divine can doubt there are witches, since the Bible says they shall not suffer them to live; and that no lawyer can argue that their death be any death but one of their own.

So there's baith law and gospel for it. And his honour would believe the Leviticus, he might aye believe the Statute of Black-well—but he might aye believe it is to Dunnin Mr. Mclachlan. However, I shall send to ask up auld Janet this even; it's best no to light them up that have that character—and we'll want Davie to turn the spit, for I'll pair Bogie put down a fat goose to the fire for your honour's to your supper.

When it was near sunset, Waverley hastened to the hut; and he could not but allow that superstition had chosen no improper locality, or unfit object, for the foundation of her fantastic terrors. It resembled exactly the description of Spenser:

"There, in a gloomy hollow glen, she found a little cottage, where a devilish devil dwells,
In honeyed wires, and weal'd with rose-armed,
In which a witch did dwell in loathly woods,
And wield'd all cares of her male;—
So choosing solitary to abide
For fear of Satan's hand;
And all his devils, and all her own;
And build'd arts, from people she might hate;
And hurt for all, unknown, whomsoever she caped."

He entered the cottage with these verses in his memory. Poor old Janet, that wept in the seclusion, and bleared with pent-smoke, was tottering about the hut with a bough broom, muttering to herself as she endeavoured to make her hearth and floor a little clean for the reception of her expected guests. Waverley's spirit made her start, look up, and fall a-trembling, so much had her nerve been on the rack for her patron's safety. With difficulty Waverley made her comprehend that the Baron was now safe from..."
personal danger; and when her mind had admitted that joyful news, it was equally hard to make her believe to others the real possession of her cousin. "It behoved to be," she said, "he had got it back again; nobody was to be gripped as to take his heir after they had given him a patron: and for that I am very grateful. I am very grateful to myself, and to the witch for his sake, if I were not feared the Enemy wad take me at my word." Waverley then gave her some money, and promised that her fertility should be rewarded; and the woman could be reckoned on to do well, as yet to see my auld master and Miss Rose come back and break their a' arm.

Waverley now took leave of Janet, and soon stood before the palace of his patron. At a saw whistle, he observed the veteran peeping out to reconnoitre, like an old beggar with his head out of his hole. "Ye hae come rather early, my good lad," said he, descending; "I wonder if the redcoat has beat the tattie yet, and we're not safe till then."

"Good news cannot be told too soon," said Waverley; and with infinite joy communicated to him the happy tidings. The old man stood for a moment in silent devotion, then exclaimed, "Praise be to God!—I shall see my bairn again."

"And never, I hope, to part with her more," said Waverley. "I trust in God, not, unless it be to win the means of supporting her; for my things are but in a bruck state, and what signifies worldly gain?"

"And if," said Janet, "there were a situation in which Miss Bradwardine would, and the uncertainty of fortune, and in the rank to which she was born, could you object to it, my dear Sir Everard, because I could make one of my friends the happiest man in the world?"

"The Baron turned, and looked at him with great earnestness. "Yes," continued Edward, "I shall not consider my sentence of war as a remission of your obligation to accompany you to the Duchan, and—"

The Baron seemed collecting all his might to make a suitable reply to what, at another time, he would have treated as the propounding of a treaty of alliance between the houses of Bradwardine and Waverley. But his efforts were in vain; the father was too mighty for the Baron; the pride of birth and rank were swept away—"in the joy of surprise, a slight convulsion passed over his features as he gave way to the feelings of nature, threw his arms around Waverley's neck, and pressed his lips to Rosina's. My son, my son! if I had been able to reach the world, I would have made my choice here."

Edward returned the embrace with great sympathy of feeling, and for a little while that the passion was broken by Edward. "But Miss Bradwardine?"

"She had never a will but her old father's; besides, you are a likely youth, of honest principles, and high moral character, and if you will have the artful intrigue, and in my proudest days I could not have wished a more eligible espousal for her than the nephew of my excellent old friend, Sir Everard.—But I hope, young man, you deal as rashly in this matter? I hope ye have assured the approbation of your a' friends and allies, particularly of your uncle, who is in loco parentis? Ah! we maun tak heed o' that."

Edward assented to him that Sir Everard would think himself highly honoured in the flattering reception his proposal had met with, and that it had his entire approbation; in evidence of which, he put Colonel Talbot of Waverley to his heart with great attention. Sir Everard," he said, "always despised wealth in comparison of honour and birth; and indeed he hath no occasion to court the former. Yet I may say, since the Duke of Althorp turned out such a partridge, for I can call him no better, as to think of alienating the family inheritance—indeed I wish he fixed on a part of the revenue to myself. But I am generally inclined to think that I could have left Rose the auld hurley-house, and the rigg belonging to it. And yet," said he, resuming more cheerfully, "it's may be as well as it is; for, as Baronet, you are to inherit all the rank and prestige of a baronet, and the right to imprint upon certain cutpoints respecting name and bearings. While now, as a landless laird wi a with the most distant hope of saving Fergus, but to see him for the last time. I ought to have mentioned, that he had furnished funds for the defence of the prisoners in the most liberal manner, as soon as he heard the tale of their sufferings, and the first council, accordingly attended; but it was upon the same footing on which the first physicians are usually summoned to the bedside of some dying man of property or of fashionable standing. And he was not greatly unhappy during Waverley's six days' stay at the Duchray.

It was finally arranged that Edward should go to Waverley-Honour to make the necessary arrangements for his marriage, thence to London to take the proper measures for pleading his pardon, and return as soon as possible to claim the hand of his beloved bride. He attended accordingly, and even visited Talbot; but, above all, it was his most important object to learn the fate of the unfortunate Chief of Glen-naquich; to visit him at Carlisle, and to try whether any thing could be done for procuring, if out a pardon, a commutation at least, or alleviation, of the punishment to which he was almost certain of being condemned; and, in case of the worst, to offer the miserable Flora an asylum with Rose, or otherwise to assist her views in any mode which might seem possible. The fate of Fergus seemed hard to be averred. Edward had already striven to interest his friend in the cause, and Talbot had not felt it possible to give distinctly to understand, by his reply, that his credit in matters of that nature was totally exhausted.

The Colonel was still in Edinburgh, and proposed to take a walk the next day. Edward was to be met by him by the Duke of Cumberland. He was to be joined by Lady Emily, to whom easy travelling and good society were recommended, and who was to journey northwards, to join the rest of the expedition. Edward accepted; he was to go to Carlisle, where he was to be met by Francis Stanley.

Edward, therefore, met the Colonel at Edinburgh, who wished him joy in the kindest manner on his approaching happiness, and cheerfully undertook what was constituted the chief part of his mission, which was to place his cousin under no obligations to delegate to his charge. But on the subject of Fergus he was inexorable. He satisfied Edward, indeed, that his interference would be unavailing; but Talbot might, he said, make a conscientious use in favour of that unfortunate gentleman. "Justice," he said, "which demanded some penalty of those who had wrapped the whole nation in fear and in mourning, could not perhaps have selected a fitter victim. He came to the field with the fullest light upon the nature of his attempt. He had studied and understood the subject. His father's fate could not intimidate him; the kingly of the laws which had restored to him his father's property and rights could not melt him. That he was brave, generous, and possessed many good qualities, was not to be questioned; but that he was enlightened and accomplished, made his crime the less excusable; that he was an enthusiast in a wrong cause, only made him the more fit to be its victim. To make him appeal to the court, and hang him, would never have broken the peace of the country.

"I repeat it," said the Colonel, "though Heaven knows with a heart distressed for him as an individual, that this young gentleman has studied and fully understood the desperate game which he has played. He threw for life or death, a coat or a collar, and he cannot now be permitted, with justice to the country, to draw stakes because the dice have gone against him."

Such seems to be the reasoning of those times, held even by brave and humane men towards a vanquished enemy. Let us devoutly hope, that, in this respect at least, we shall never see the scenes, or hold the sentiments, that were general in Britain Sixty Years since.

Such seems to be the reasoning of those times, held even by brave and humane men towards a vanquished enemy. Let us devoutly hope, that, in this respect at least, we shall never see the scenes, or hold the sentiments, that were general in Britain Sixty Years since.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

To mount 10 that's sudden! — Spare him, spare him! — Shakespeare.

Edward, attended by his former servant Alick Polwart, who had re-entered his service at Edinburgh, reached Carlisle while the commission of Oyer and Terminer on his unfortunate associates was yet sitting. He had pressed forward in haste, but alas!
the sentence of the law of high treason, with all its awful accompaniments. The execution was appointed for the next morning. "When the signal Ivor," continued the Judge, "I can hold out no hope of mercy. You must prepare against to-morrow for your last sufferings here, and your great audit hereafter."
"I desire nothing else, my lord," answered Fergus, in the same manner and firm tone.
"The hard eyes of Evan, which had been perpetually beaten on his head, and ferocious, knew no fear. "For you, poor ignorant man," continued the Judge, "who following the ideas in which you have been educated, have this day given us a striking example how the low born and the outcaste, is, from your unhappy ideas of classship, transmitted to some ambiguous individual, who ends by making you the tool of his crimes—for you, I say, fell so much compassion, that if you can make up your mind to petition for grace, I will endeavour to procure it for you.
Otherwise:"
"Grace me no grace," said Evan, "since you do not shed Ich Jan Voit's blood, the only favour I would accept from you, is—to bid them loose my hands and give me my claymore, and bid you just a smile—sitting where you are?"
"Me no grace," said the Judge; "his blood is upon his own head."
Almost astonished with his feelings, Edward found that the rush of the crowd had conveyed him out and away from the place where the execution immediate wish was to see and speak with Fergus, more ever. He applied at the Castle where his unfortunate friend was confined, but was refused admission. The Hereditary, an uncommissioned of-er said, "has requested of the governor that none should be admitted to see the prisoner excepting his friend and his sister."
"Are you Miss Mac-Ivor?" They gave him the direction. It was the house of a respectable Catholic family near Carlisle.
Replied from the gate of the Castle, and not returning any make application to the Hereditary Judes in his own unpopular name, he had recons-troller who came down in Fergus's behalf. The gentleman told him, that it was thought the public mind was in danger of being debauched by the account of the last moments of those persons, as given by the friends of the Pretender; that there had been a resolution, therefore, to exclude all such per-sonts from the place of execution. It was in vain; they insisted on them. Yet, he promised (to oblige the heir of Waverley-Honour) to get him an order for admittance to the prisoner the next morning, before his iron wheels were touched.
"It of Fergus Mac-Ivor they speak thus, thought Waverley, or do I dream? Of Fergus, the bold, the courageous, the free-minded! The lofty chieftain of a title devoted to him? Is it he, that I have seen lead the chase and head the attack,—the brave, the active, the young, the noble, the love of ladies, and the theme of song,—is it he who is ironed like a ma-fector; who is to be dragged on a hurdle to the culymen gallows; to die a lingering and cruel death, and to be mangled by the hand of the most outcast of wretches? Evil indeed was the spectacle, that boded me fate as this to the brave Chief of Glenrasschoch!"

With a faltering voice he requested the solicitor to send means to warn Fergus of his intended visit, should he obtain permission to make it. He then began a long separation, and, returning to the inn, two a scarcely intelligible note to Flora Mac-Ivor, summing his purpose to wait upon her that even-da, should it be expedient. It was, a letter in Flora's beautiful Italian hand, which seemed scarce to tremble, even under this load of misery. "Miss Mac-Ivor," the letter bore, "could not refuse to see the noble Fergus, who was determined to see her;
her present circumstances of unsurpassed distress."

When Edward reached Miss Mac-Ivor's present place of abode, he was instantly admitted. In a large room, and darkly open to the street, between the street curtains, was a large window, sewing what seemed to be a garment of white flannel. At a little distance sat an elderly woman, apparently a foreigner, and a religious character. The first was in a book of Catholic devotion, but when Waverley entered, laid it on the table and left the room. Flora rose to receive him, and stretched out her hand, but neither ventured to attempt emission of a fine completion was too long; her person considerably enlaced; and her face and hands as white as the purest statuary marble, forming a strong contrast with her sable dress and jet-black hair. Yet, amid those marks of distress, there was nothing negligent or ill-arranged about her attire; even her hair, though totally without ornament, was disposed with her usual attention to neatness. The first word she uttered were, "Have you seen him?"
"Alas, no," answered Waverley, "I have been refused admittance."
"It accorded with the rest," she said; "but we must submit. Shall you obtain leave, do you suppose?"

"For—to-morrow," said Waverley; but mutttering the last word so faintly that it was almost unintelligible.
"Ay, then or never," said Flora, "until—she added, looking upward, "the time when, I trust, we shall all meet in the hope you will see him while earth yet bears him. He always loved you at his heart, though—but it is vain to talk of the past."
"Vain indeed!" echoed Waverley.
"Or, even now, so far as earthly events are concerned; for how often have I pictured to myself the strong possibility of this horrid issue, and tasked myself to consider how I could support my part; and yet how far has all my anticipations fallen short of the unimaginable bitterness of this hour?"

"Dear Flora, if your strength of mind—"
"Ay, there it is," she answered, somewhat wildly;
"there is, Mr. Waverley, there is a busy devil at my heart, that whispers—but it were madness to listen to it—that the strength of mind on which Flora prided herself has deserted her brother!"
"Good God! how can you utterance to a thought so shocking!"

"Ay, is it so? but yet it haunts me like a phan-ton; I know it is untruthful and vain; but it will be present; will intrude its horrors on my mind; will whisper that my brother, as volatile as ardent, would have divided his energies amid a hundred ob-tacts. It was in vain; Fergus was not to be swayed and to gage all on this dreadful and desperate case.
Oh that I could recollect that I had but once said to him, 'He that striketh with the sword shall die by the sword;' but I could not, in Fergus's home; reserve yourself; your vassals, your life, for enterprises within the reach of man. But O, Mr. Waverley, I spurned his fiery temper, and half of his ruin at least lives with his sister'!"

The horrid idea which she had intimaded, Edward endeavoured to combat by every incoherent argument that occurred to him. He recalled to her the principles on which both thought it their duty to act, and in which they had been educated.
"Do not think I have forgotten them," she said, looking up, with eager quickness; "I do not regret this attempt, because it was wrong! O no! on that point I am armed; but because it was impossible it could end otherwise than thus."

Yet it did not always seem so desperate and hazardous as it was; and it would have been chosen by the bold spirit of Fergus, whether you had approved it or no; your counsels only served to give unity and consistence to his conduct; to dignify, but not to appoint. To Flora this was totally to listen to Edward, and was again intent upon her needle-work.

"Do you remember," she said, looking up with a ghastly smile, "how the day before her marriage, when she was all the bride-favours, and now I am sewing his bridal-garment. Our friends here," she continued, with suppressed emotion, "are to give hallowed earth in that chapel to this brave brother, of the last Vechten. But they will not all rest together; no—his heart—"
I shall not have the last miserable consolation of kissing the cold lips of my dear, dear Fergus!

The unfortunate Flora here, after one or two hysterics on her chair, who had been attending in the anteroom, now entered hastily, and begged Edward to leave the room, but not the house. It was then he ventured to urge Miss Bradwardine's claim, to be considered as an adopted sister, and empowered to assist her plans for the future.

"I have had a letter from my dear Rose," she replied, "to the same purpose. Sorrow is selfish and encroaching; I would have written to express, that, even in my own despair, I felt a gleam of pleasure at learning her happy prospects, and at hearing that the good old Baron has escaped the general wreck. Give this to my dearest Rose; it is her poor Flora's only ornament of value, and was the gift of a princess."

She put into his hands a case, containing the chain of diamonds with which she used to decorate her hair. "To me it is in future useless. The kindness of my friends has secured me a retreat in the convent of the Scottish Benedictine nuns in Paris. Tomorrow—if indeed I can survive tomorrow—I set forth for my happy home with this invaluable sister."

And now, Mr. Waverley, adjourn! May you be as happy with Rose as your amiable dispositions deserve; and think sometimes on the friends you have lost. Do not forget to see me again; it would be impossible to forget such an event."

He gave her hand, on which Edward shed a torrent of tears, and, with a faltering step, withdrew from the apartment, and returned to the tower of Carlisle. At the inn, he found a letter from his law friend, intimating, that he would be admitted to Fergus next morning, as soon as the Castle gates were opened, and permitted to remain with him till the arrival of the Sheriff gave signal for the fatal procession.

CHAPTER LXIX

A dark, wintry night is near
The dawn. The first was clear Waverley found Carlisle on the eastern front of the old Gothic gate of Carlisle Castle. But he paced it long in every direction, before the hour when, according to the orders of the guard, the gate was to be opened, and the drawbridge lowered. He produced his order to the sergeant of the guard, and was admitted.

The place of Fergus's confinement was a gloomy and dungeon, the entrance of which was approached by a narrow and window, towards my bed. Why should I fear him, I thought, I feared a little that time, I was as immaterial as he. False Spirit, I said, art thou come to close thy walks on earth, and enjoy thy triumph in the full of the last descendant of thine enemy? The spectre seemed to beckon and smile, as he faded from my sight. What do you think of it?—I asked the same question of the priest; he was a good and sensible man; he admitted that the church allowed that such apparitions were possible, but urged me not to permit my mind to dwell upon the subject, as images are so strange. What do you think of it?"

"Much as your confessor," said Waverley, willing to avoid dispute upon such a point at such a moment. A tap at the door now announced that good man, and Edward retired while he administered to both prisoners the last rites of religion, in the mode which the Church of Rome prescribes.

In about an hour he was admitted; soon after a file of soldiers entered with a blacksmith, who struck the fetters from the legs of the prisoners. You see the compliment they pay to our Highland strength and courage. The soldiers, riding on the backs of the wild beasts, till our legs are cramped into palsy, and when they free us, they send six soldiers with loaded muskets to prevent our taking the castle by storm!" Edward afterwards learned that these severe precautions had been taken in consequence of a desperate attempt of the prisoners to escape, in which they had very nearly succeeded.

Singly and solemnly the drums of the garrison beat to arms. "This is the last turn-out," said Fergus, "that I shall hear and obey. And now, my dear, dear Edward, ere we part, let us speak of Flora—a subject which awakens the tenderest feeling that yet thrills within me."

"We part not here!" said Waverley.

"O yes, we do; you must come no further. Not that I feel what is to follow for myself," he continued, "nor, perhaps, how I shall feel. It tortures me as art; and how happy should we think the man who escapes from the thorns of a mortal and painful disorder, in the space of a short half hour! And this matter, spin it out as they will, cannot last longer. But what a dying man can suffer firmly, may kill a living friend to look upon,—This same law of high treason," he concluded, "is one of the blessings, Edward, with which your free country has accommodated your old Scotland—her own jurisprudence, as I have heard, was much milder. But I suppose one day or other,—when there shall be a change, a change for the better, and the land be the better for it,—our sister may claim some of the tender incongruities; they will blot it from their records, as levelling them with a nation of cannibals. The munificence, too, of exposing the senseless head—they have been so generous with their coronet there would be some satire in that, Edward. I hope they will set it on the Scotch gate though, that I may look even after death, to the blue hills of my own country, to which I so dearly love. The Baron would have added, "Moritur, et mortis dulce reminiscitur Argiv."

A bustle, and the sound of wheels and horses' feet, was now heard in the court-yard of the Castle. "As I have told you why you must not follow me, and these remarks admonish me that my time flies fast, it is best perhaps to tell you," Waverley added.

Waverley, with a voice interrupted by suffocating sensations, gave some account of the state of her heart.

"Poor Flora!" answered the Chief, "she could have borne her own sentence of death, but not mine. You, Waverley, will soon know the happiness of mutual affection in the married state; long, long may both enjoy it."

"What will become of Flora?" said Fergus, "a woman so bright, and so beautiful, and so devoted to me," and his eyes filled with tears. "What will become of Flora, Fergus?"

"I know not. She was always the first to think of me. She will burn your heart with her love."

"Shall she not see you then?" asked Waverley.

"She seemed to expect it."

"A necessary deciet will spare her the last dreadful parting. I could not part with her without tears, and I cannot bear that these men should think they have power to extort from her. She was made to believe she was talking an hour later, and this letter, which my visitor will deliver, will apprise her that all is over."

An officer now appeared, and intimated that the High Sheriff and his attendants wanted the gate of the Castle, to claim the bodies of Fergus Macleay and Evan Macmichael. "'Tis true," said Fergus. "Accordingly, supporting Edward by the arm, and followed by Ivan Dhu and the priest, he moved down the steps of the tower, the soldiers bringing up the rear. The court was occupied by a squadron of dragoons and a battalion of infantry, drawn up in hollow square. Within their ranks was theslide, or box, on the steps of which to be drawn up to the place of execution, about a mile distant from Carlisle. It was painted black, and drawn by a white horse. At one end of the vehicle sat the Executioner, at the other the Bodyguard. Behind it the broad axe in his hand; at the other end, next the horse, was an empty seat for two persons. Through the deep and dark Gothic archway, that opened the draw-bridge, were seen on horseback the High Sheriff and his attendants, whom the etiquette be twixt the civil and military powers did not permit to come further. 'Twas all but a closing scene," said Fergus, smiling disdainfully as he glanced around upon the apparatus of murder. Evan Dhu exclaimed with some eagerness, after looking at the captives, "I heard the valet de chambre, off at Glenshiro, before we could kill a dozen of them. They look bold enough now, however." The priest entreated him to be silent.

The sleigh was now approached, and Fergus, turning round, embraced Waverley, kissed him on each side of the face, and stopped musingly into his place. Evan sat down by his side. The priest was to follow in a carrick, which was to be conveyed to his patron's residence at whose Grasmuir, Fergus wove his hand to Edward, the ranks closed around the sledges, and the whole procession began to move forward. There was a momentary stop. While the governor of the Castle and the High Sherriff went through a short ceremony, the military officer there delivering over the persons of the criminals to the Keeper of Kirkcudbright, said the High Sheriff. While the ceremony was concluded, Fergus stood erect in the sledges, and with a firm and steady voice, replied, "God save King James!" These were the last words which Waverley heard him say.

The procession resumed its march, and the sledges vanished from beneath the portal, under which it had stopped for an instant. The dead-march was then heard, and it was loudly sung by severals of those of a muffled peal, tolled from the neighbouring cathedral. The sound of the military music died away as the procession moved on; the sullen clang of the bells was succeeded by a sound as if rolling from the earth.

The last of the soldiers had now disappeared from under the vaulted archway through which they had been filing for several minutes; the court-yard was now totally deserted. Waverley and the priest, if uplifted, his eyes fixed upon the dark pass where he had so lately seen the last glimpse of his friend. At length, a female servant of the governor's, struck with compassion at the stupified misery which his countenance expressed, asked him if he would not walk into her master's house and sit down? She was obliged to repeat her question twice ere he comprehended it; his eyes, however, showed a new interest in her. The priest was asked if he could not then rush into an apartment, and bolt the door. In about an hour and a half, which seemed an age of unutterable suspense, the sound of the drums and fife, performed by the soldiers, was heard. The servant appeared, and urged her master to enter the walls. He dared hardly look back towards the Gothic battlements of the fortified gate under which he passed, for the place is surrounded with an old wall. "They're no there," said Alec Polwarth, who guessed the cause of the delicious look which Waverley cast upon the wall. "Here Mr. Membrose, the valiant, with the vulgar appetite for the horrors, was master of each detail of the butchery,—"The heads are over the Scotch yoke, as they cut it. It's a great pity of Evan Dhu, who was killed at Flodden, to be turned over, to be buried in Hildesland, and indeed so was the Laird o' Glencairn too, for that matter, when he was in nine o' his twenties."

CHAPTER LXIX.

DEUX DOMM.

The impression of horror with which Waverley left Carlisle suffered by degrees into melancholy, a gradation which was accelerated by the painful, yet soothing task of writing to Rose; and, while he could not suppress his own feelings of the calamity, he endeavored to place it in a light which might grieve her, without shocking her imagination. The picture which Waverley had elaborated, was so familiar to his own mind, and his next letters were more cheerful, and referred to the prospects of peace and happiness which lay before them. Yet, though his first letters had been written in a tone of melancholy, Edward had reached his native country before he could, as usual on former occasions, look confidently upon the face of nature.

He then, for the first time since leaving Edinburgh, beheld the scene of his infant pleasures, which in his heart still seemed to be the same as long possessed by his forefathers; recognized the old oaks of Waverley-Chace; and with what delight he should introduce Rose to all his favorite haunts; beheld at length the tower of his venerable hall arise above the woods which embosomed it, and finally threw himself into the arms of the venerable relatives to whom he owed so much duty and affection.

The happiness of their meeting was not tarnished by a single word of reproach. On the contrary, whatever pain Sir Everard and Mrs. Rachel had felt during Waverley's perilous encounter with the cunning Chevalier, it was assuaged too well with the principles in which they had been brought up, to inure reproduction, or even censure. Colonel Talbot also had smoothed the way, and when Sir Everard had shown him more than usually affected by dwelling upon his gallant behavior in the military character, particularly his bravery and generosity at Preston; until, warned at the idea of their nephews being thus ungraciously treated and exiled from their country, as the price of their principality and their personal avowal, so distinguished at officer as the Colonel himself, the imagination of the Baronet and his sister ranked the exploits of Edward with those of Edward, Hildesbrand, and Nigel, the vaunted heroes of their line.

The appearance of Waverley, embrowned by exercise, and dignified by the habits of military discipline, had assumed an athletic and hearty character, which not only verified the Colonel's narration, but surprised and delighted all the inhabitants of Waverley-Honour. They crowded to see, to hear him, and to sing his praises. Mr. Pembroke, who secretly envied his spirit and courage in embracing the genuine cause of the Church of England, censured his pupil gently, nevertheless, for being so careless of his manuscripts, which, indeed, he said, had occasioned him some personal inconvenience, as, upon the Baronet's being arrested by a king's messenger, he had deemed it prudent to retire to a concealment called "The Priest's Hole." From the use it had been put to in former days; where, he assured our hero, the butler had thought it safe to venture with food only once in the day, so that he had been repeatedly compelled to dine upon virtuals only, by not being able to put on a good face, but was worse, only half warm, not to mention that sometimes his bed had not been arranged for two days together. Waverley's mind involuntarily turned to the Patronage of the Baron of Bradwardine, who was well pleased with Janet's fare, and a few bunches of strawberries in a clift in the front of a sand-cast, a contrast which could only mortify his worthy tutor.

All was now in a blaze to prepare for the marriage of Edward, an event to which the good old Baronet and Mrs. Talbot had looked forward as if to the renewal of their own youth. The match, as Colonel Talbot had intimated, had seemed to them the highest degree eligible, having every recommendation, but was by no means which the yoke of matrimony, not to mention than enough. Mr. Clippurce was, therefore, summoned to Waverley-Honour, under better auspices than at the commencement of our story. But Mr. Clippurce did not come alone; for, in the days since he had associated with him a nephew a younger vulture, (as our English Juvenile, who tells the tale of Swallow the attorney, might have informed him), and was, in his turn, to be the partner in the charge of Misses Clippurce and Hookum. These worthy gentlemen had directions to make the necessary settle- ments on the most splendid scale of liberality, as Edward was provided a secure inheritance, with her paternal estate tacked to the fringe of her criminal.

But before entering upon a subject of unalloyed delay, I must remind my reader of the progress of the story. It was an afternoon of a pastime at which I was myself expert in my more juvenile years; it moves at first slowly, avoiding by inflection every obstacle of the least importance, but when it has attained its full impetus, and draws near the denouement of the scene near which it gives a loud thunders down, taking a road at every spring, clearing hedge and ditch like a Yorkshire huntsman, and becoming most furiously rapid in its course when it is nearest to being consumed to rest for ever. Ever such is the course of a narrative, like that which you are perusing. The earlier events are studiously dwelt upon, that you, kind reader, may be introduced to the characters, rather by narrative, than by the medium of direct description; but when the story draws near its close, we hurry over the circumstances however important, which your imagination must have foreseen, and leave you to supply the things which it would be abusing your patience to relate at length.

We are, therefore, so far from attempting to trace the full particulars of Misses Clippurce and Hookum, or that of their worthy officious brethren, who had the charge of snuffing out the passions of Edward Waverley and his intended father-in-law, that we are but touching the surface of the circumstances of this occasion, though matchless specimens of eloquence in their various parts. As the summer vanishes, Nor can I tell you at length, how worthy Aunt Rachel, not without a delicate and affectionate allusion to the circumstances which had transferred Rose's unwelcome tidings to the hands of Donald Bean Lenn, stocked her casket with a set of jewels that a duchess might have envied. Moreover, the reader will have the goodwill to imagine that Jeff Houghton and his dozen were suitably provided for; although they could not be persuaded that the son fell otherwise than fighting by the young sisters; so that Alick, who, as a lover of truth, has made many needless attempts to expand the circumstances to them, was finally ordered to say not a word more upon the subject. He indemnifies himself, however, by the liberal allowance of desperate battles, grisly executions, and raw-headed and bloody-bone stories, with which he astonishes the servents-hall.

But although these important matters may be briefly told, for Jeff Houghton's purpose, it is a Chancery suit, yet, with all the urgency which Waverley could use, the real time which the law proceedings occupied, joined to the delay occasioned by the most perplexing delays, as I have hitherto, it is considerably more than two months ere Waverley leaving England, alighted once more at the man- sion of the Laird of Ducharn to claim the hand of his pledged bride.
lay of his marriage was fixed for the sixth day's arrival. The Baron of Bradwardine, with bridegrooms, and friends, as signifiers of high and solemn import, felt a little hurt, including the family of the Duchan, and all the mediators who had title to be present on an occasion, which could not but be a thirty-third of the whole. When he was married, he had three hundred horsemen born, benvetors, and some score or two of Highlanders who never got on horseback, were present on such an occasion as this pride found some consolation in reflecting, and his son-in-law having been so lately in grant government, it might give matter of fear and wonder to the ruling powers, if he were to collect together the kith, kin, and allies houses, arrayed in affect of war, as was the custom of Scotland on these occasions—without dubitation," he concluded with a sigh, of those who would have rejoiced most freely with joyful espousals, are either gone to a bet, or are now exiles from their native land. Doncaster took place on the day following. Mr. Rubrick, kinsman to the noble hospitable mansion where it was solemnly in chaplain to the Baron of Bradwardine, and on the day following he danced up with his usual gallantry, as the Baron, and then to Rose, passing his hands over his clothes, crying, "Bra, bra, Davie," and scarce able to sing a bar to an end of his thousand-and-one exceedings, for the blessings of my days and nights. The dogs also acknowledged their old master with thousands of gambols. "Up maje conscience, Rose," ejaculated the Baron, "the gratitude of thee shall be the brave, the courage, the valor, and the instant fortitude to my aid even, while that schellum Malcolm—but I am obliged to Colonel Talbot for putting my hounds into such good condition, and Likewise for pur Davie. But, Rose, my dear, we must not permit them to a life-enduring burden upon the estate."

As he spoke, Lady Emily, leaning upon the arm of her husband, met the party at the lower gate, with a thousand welcomes. After the ceremony of introduction had been gone through, much abridged by the ease and excellent breeding of Lady Emily, she apologized for having used a little art to wile them back to a place which might awaken some painful reflections—"But as it was to change masters, we were very desirous that the Baron"—

"Mr. Bradwardine, madam, if you please," said the old gentleman.

"Mr. Bradwardine, then, and Mr. Waverley, should see what we have done towards restoring the mansion of your fathers to its former state."

The Baron answered, "That's a low word." Indeed, when he entered the court, excepting that the heavy stables, which had been burnt down, were replaced by buildings of a lighter and more picturesque appearance, all seemed as much as possible restored to the state in which he had left it when he assumed arms some months before. The pigeon-house was replenished; the fountain played with its usual activity, and not only the Bear who predominated over its basin, but all the other Bears whatsoever, were replaced on their several stations, and renewed or repaired with so much care, that they bore no tokens of the last stone Bears, those mutilated Dagenis of his town, over his head, as is now a new proprietor," said he to Edward. "Has mhair gasto, as the Italians call it, in the short time it has had this domain, than that hound Malhough, for all he may have Hesiod, the villain, and amongst others, the race he called. And now I talk of hounds, it is a Ban and Bucar, who come scoping up the with David Gellatley."

At least such a dog is the crest of the marl noot.

Waverley, "for I believe the present master of the house is Colonel Talbot, who will expect to see us. We hesitated to make you our host with our ancient patrimony, property, and even yet, if you do not incline to visit him, we can pass on to the Balile's."

The Baron had a notion for all his magnanimity. However, he drew a long breath, took a long snuff, and observed, since they had brought him so far, he could not pass the Colonel's gate, and he would be happy to see the new master of his old tenants. He was accordingly, as did the other gentlemen and ladies; he gave his arm to his daughter, and as they descended the avenue, pointed out to her how speedily the "Bra e Pocini" of the Southerne—"their iritial duty, he might call her—had removed the marks of spoliation."

In truth, not only had the fallen trees been removed, but, their stumps been grubbed up, and the earth round them levelled and sown with grass, every mark of devastation, unless to an eye intimately acquainted with the spot, was already totally obliterated. There was a similar reform in the outward manner of David Gellatley, who met them, every now and then, stopping to admire the new suit which grace his person, in the same colours as formerly, but bodium of number and elegance to have served Touchstone himself. He was the handsomest man in the usual height, and he danced up with his usual gallantry, as the Baron, and then to Rose, passing his hands over his clothes, crying, "Bra, bra, Davie," and scarce able to sing a bar to an end of his thousand-and-one exceedings, for the blessings of my days and nights. The dogs also acknowledged their old master with thousands of gambols. ren owned Esda of Shawsword, to whom your family are probably blood relations."

"I believe," said the Colonel, smiling, "our dogs are whelps of the same litter—for my part, if crests were to dispute precedence, I should be apt to let them decide it by their bear teeth."

As he made this speech, at which the Baron took another long pinch of snuff, they had entered the house, that is, the Baron, Rose, and Lady Emily, with young Stanley, and the Bailie, for Edward and the rest of the party remained on the terrace, to examine a new green-house stocked with the finest plants. The Baron resumed his favourite topic:
"By the by, the Lord avoweth, in his own honour of your burgess, Colonel Talbot, which is doubtless your humour, as I have seen in other gentlemen of birth and honour in your country, I must again repeat it as a most ancient and distinguished bearing, as well as that of my young friend Francis Stanley, which is the eagle and child."

The bird and bantling they call it in Derbyshire, sir," said Stanley.

"Ye're a daff callant, sir," said the Baron, who had a great liking to this young man, perhaps because he sometimes teased him—"Ye're a daff cal-lang, sir, in language, I mean, and as you say, these days of shaking his great brown fist at him. "But what I meant to say, Colonel Talbot, is, that yours is an ancient praesidium, or descent, and since you have lived in the West—or rather, your ancestors, not yours, which I have lost for me and mine. I wish may remain in your name as many centuries as it has done in that of the late proprietor."

"They," answered the Colonel, "is very handsome, Mr. Bradwardine, indeed."

"And yet, sir, I cannot but marvel that you, Colnel, whom I noted to have so much of the aem patr"- "ier, which you put in Edinburgh, as well as to en-spend other countries, should have chosen to establish your laws, or household gods, procul a patria finibus, and in a manner to expatriate yourself."

"Your Honor will forgive me for mentioning the matter, to keep the sense of these foolish boys, Waverley and Stanley, and of my wife, who is no wiser, one old soldier should continue to impose upon another. You must know then that I have so much of that same prudeniort in favour of my native country, that the sum of money which I advanced to the seller of this extensive barony has only purchased for me a box in ---for goodness sake, do lodge, with about two hundred and fifty acres of land, the chief merit of which is, that it is within a very few miles of Waverley-Honour."

"And, by the way, in the name of Heaven, has bought this property?"

"That," said the Colonel, "it is this gentleman's profession to explain."

I cannot enter into this reference regarded, and who did all this while shifted from one foot to another with great impatience, "like a hen," as he afterwards said, "upon a net girdle;" and chuckling, he must have added, like the said hen in all the glory of laying an egg,—now pushed forward. "That then, I can, that your Honour;" drawing from his pocket a bundle of papers, and untying the red tape with a hand trembling with exasperation. Here is the disposition and assignation, by Malcolm Bradwardine of Inch-Grabbit, regularly signed and tested in terms of the statute, whereby, for a certain sum of sterling money presently contented and paid to him, he has disposed, alienated, and conveyed, the whole estate and barony of Bradwardine, Tully-Veolan, and others, with the forfeit and manor-place;

"For God's sake, to the point, sir; I have all that y heart," said the Colonel.

"To Cosmo? Comyn Bradwardine, Esq.," pursued the Bailie, "be heirs and assigns, simply and in the name of his brother, aie me rd de me—"

Pray read short, sir."

"On the conscience of an honest man, Colonel, I read as short as is consistent with style. Under the account of the marriage of the two—"

"Mr. Macwheebie, this would outright a Russian winter—give me leave. In short, Mr. Bradwardine, your family estate is your own once more in full property, and at your absolute disposal but only burdenened with the sum advanced to re-purchase it, which I understand is utterly disproportioned to its value."

"An auld sang—an auld sang, if it please your lenour," cried the Bailie, rubbing his hands; "look at the rental book."

"Which sum being advanced by Mr. Edward Waverley, chiefly from the price of his father's property which I bought from him, is secured to his lady's daughter, and her family by this marriage."

"It is a catholic security," shouted the Bailie, "to Rosc Comyn Bradwardine alias Waverley, in for-tent, and the children of the said children, in forever, and I made up a wee bit minute of an antenuperial contract, intuitu matrimonii, so it cannot be subject to reduction hercelf, as a donation inter cirum et aurem."

It is difficult to say whether the worthy Baron was most delighted with the restitution of his family property, or with the delicacy and generosity that let him unfeathered to pursue his purpose in disposing of it after his death, and which avoided, as much as possible, the appearance of laying him under pecuniary obligation. When his first pause of joy and the quick attention to the presents which the unworthy heir male, who, he pronounced, had sold his birth-right, like Esau, for a mess of pottage.

"But who cooked the parritch for him?" explained the Bailie, "the Bailie Talbot, and the children of the honour's to command, Duncan Macwheebie? His honour, young Mr. Waverley, put it in my hand:
the beginning—free the first calling o' the summons, as I may say. I circumvented that; I played at bogle about the bush wi' them—I enjoyed them; and if I havana gien Inch-Grabbit and Jamie Howie a bonnie begunk, they ken themselves. Him a writer? I didn't think; he is a laaw-cutter—"a bridegroom, to gar them hand up the market: na; na; I earled them wi' our wild tenantry, and the Mac-Iovars, that are but ill settled yet, till they durate on one crime. But whatever came out of meafter ghamming, for fear John Heatherbutter, or some sican dare-the-dial, shall tak a ball at them; then, on the other hand, I befeemin them wi' Colon Talbot—wad they offer to keep up the price again the Duke's friend? did they na ken who was master had they na seen enough, by the end of example of mony a pair misguided unhappy body."

"Who was the other?" asked Mr. Macwheebie?
"said the Colonel to him, aside.

"O' whicht, Colonel, for the love o' God! let that flee stick 't the wa'. There were many good folk at Derby; and a good week of it, winkin' and wakin' in the east of his eye toward the Baron, who was in a deep reverie.

Starting out of it at once, he took Macwheebie by for several days with laudable prudence, had unloosed his tongue upon beholding the arrival of the carriage.

But, while Edward received Major Melville with politeness, and the clergyman with the most affectionate and grateful kindness, his father-in-law looked a little alienated, as uncertain how he should answer the necessary claims of hospitality to his guests, and forward the festivity of his tenants. Lady Emily relieved him, by intimating, that, though she must be an indifferent representative of Mrs. Edward Waverley in many respects, she hoped the Baron would approve of the entertainment she had ordered, in expectation of so many guests; and that they would find and find in abundance, the remarkable spirit of hospitality, with some degree support the ancient hospitality of Tully-Veolan. It is impossible to describe the pleasure which this assurance gave the Baron, who, with an air of gallantry half appertaining to the stiff Scottish tartar, and half to the officer in the French service, offered his arm to the fair speaker, and led the way in something between a stride and a minuet step, into the large dining parlour, followed by all the rest of the good company.

By dint of Saunders's directions and exertions, all here, as well as in the other apartments, had been done to make the Baron as comfortable as the old arms in the parlour, and where none moveables had been necessary, they had been selected in the same character with the old furniture. There was one addition to this, and that the charming beauty of the Baron's eyes. It was a large and spirited painting, representing Pyma Mac-Ivor and Waverley in their Highland dress, the scene a wild, rocky, and picturesque one, through which the pair were descending in the background. It was taken from a pen-and-ink sketch, drawn while they were in Edinburgh by a young man of high genius, and had been painted by a celebrated Edinburgh artist, Ramburn himself, (whose Highland chiefs do all but walk out of the canvas,) could not have done more justice to the subject; and the ardor, fidelity, and figure, of the unburthened, free and garish style of Gainsborough, was finely contrasted with the contemplative, inarticulate, and enthusiastic expression of his impartial friend. Beside this painting hung the arms which Waverley had borne in the unfortunate civil war. The whole piece was beheld with admiration, and deeper feelings.

Man must, however, eat, in spite both of sentiment and extremity. When the Baron, who had remained at the lower end of the table, insisted that Lady Emily should do the honours of the head, that they might, he said, get a meet example to the young folk. After a few minutes' consultation, the Baron presumed on his own brain the precedence between the Presbyterian Kirk and Episcopal church of Scotland, he requested Mr. Morton, as the stranger, to crown a blessing, which was accordingly pronounced by the Baron, and then the Baron's thanks for the distinguished mercy it had been his lot to experience. The dinner was excellent. Saunders attended in full costume, with all the former domestics, who had been collected, excepting one or two, that had not been heard of since the affair of Culloden. The collars were stuck with wine which was pronounced to be superb, and it had been consumed in the Bear of the Fountain, in the enclosure, should (for that night only) play excellent brandy for the benefit of the lower orders.

When the dinner was over, the Baron, about to propose a toast, cast a somewhat sourful look upon the side-board, which, however, exhibited much of his plate, though neither selected, or purchased by neighbouring gentlemen from the stocklady, and by them gladly restocked to the original owner.

"In the late times," he said, "those must be thankful who have saved life and land; yet when I am about to pronounce this toast, I cannot but regret an occurrence, dear to Lady Emily—a specimen potatorum, Colonel Talbot!"

Here the Baron's elbow was gently touched by his Major Domo, and, turning round, he beheld, in the rear of the room, the person who invested the title of Saint Guthrie, the Blessed Bear of Bradwadine! I question if the recovery of his estate afforded him more rapture. "By my honour," he said, "one might almost believe in brownies and fairies, Lady Emily, when your ladyship is in presence!"

"I am truly happy," said Colonel Talbot, "that by the recovery of this piece of family antiquity, it has fallen within my lot to present these blessings to the deep interest in all that concerns my young friend Edward. But that you may not suspect Lady Emily for a sorceries, or me for a conjurer, which is no joke in Scotland, I must tell you that Frank Stanley, your friend, who has been seized with a tertian fever ever since he heard Edward's tales of old Scottish manners, happened to describe to us at second hand this remarkable spirit of hospitality. Some one else, a true old soldier, observes every thing and says little, gave me afterwards to understand that he thought he had seen the piece of plate Mr. Stanley mentioned, in the possession of a certain Mrs. Nuspling, who, having been originally the helmsmate of a pawa-breaker, had found opportunity, during the late unpleasant scenes in Scotland, to trade a little in her old line, and so become the depository of the more valuable part of the spoil of half the army. You may believe the cup was speedily recovered; and it will give me very great pleasure if you allow me to suppose, that its value is a little enhanced by having been restored through my means."

A tear mingled with the wine which the Baron filled, as he proposed a cup of gratitude to Colonel Talbot, and the "learned and religious Houses of Waverley-Honour and Bradwadine!"

It only remains for me to say, that as no wish was ever uttered with more affectionate sincerity, than the few which allowed for the necessary incidents of human events, have been, upon the whole, more happily fulfilled.

CHAPTER LXII.

A POSTSCRIPT, WHICH SHOULD HAVE BEEN A PREFACE.

Our journey is now finished, gentle reader; and if your patience has accompanied me through these sheets, the contract is, on your part, strictly fulfilled. Yet, like the driver who has received his full hire, I still linger near you, and, with becoming diffidence, a trifling additional claim upon your bounty and good nature. You are as free however, to shut the volume of the one petitioner, as to close your door on the face of the other.

This should have been a prefatory chapter, but for two reasons: First, that most novel readers, as my own conscience reminds me, are apt to be grieved at the stop such an interesting narrative is made to take in the shape of a preface; Secondly, that it is a general custom with that class of students, to begin with the last chapter of a work; so that, after all, the remarks, being introductory, and not introduced last, would not, I think, still be the better chance to be read in their proper place.

There is no European nation, which, within the course of half a century, or little more, has undergone so complete a change as this kingdom of Scotland. The effects of the insurrection of 1745,—the destruction of the patriarchal power of the Highland chiefs,—the abolition of the hereditary jurisdictions of the Lowland nobility and barons,—the total eradication of the Jacobite party, which, averse to intermingling with the English, or adopt their customs, long continued to pride themselves upon maintaining ancient Scottish manners and customs,— commenced this innovation. The gradual influx of wealth, and extension of commerce, have since united to render the present people of Scotland a class of beings as different from their grandfathers, as the existing English are from those of Queen Elizabeth's time. The political and economical effects of these changes have been traced by Lord Neilkirk with great precision and accuracy. He has demonstrated, that this country, which is rapidly progressive, has, nevertheless, been gradual; and, like those who drift down the stream of a deep and smooth river, we are not aware of the progress, unless it be indicated by some point from which we have been drifted. Such of the present generation as can recollect the last wakening or twenty-five years of the eighteenth century, will be fully sensible of the truth of this statement; especially of their acquaintance and connexions lay among those who, in my younger time, were factiously called "folks of the old leaven," who still cherished a lingering, though hopeless attachment, to the house of Stewart. This race has now almost entirely vanished from the land, and with it, doubtless, much absurd political prejudice; but also, many living examples of singular and disinterested attachment to the principles of loyalty which they received from their fathers, and of old Scottish faith, hospitality, worth, and honour.

It was my accidental lot, though not born a Highlander, (which may be an apology for much bad Gaelic) to reside, during my childhood and youth, among persons of the above description; and now, for the purpose of preserving some idea of the ancient manners of which I have witnessed the almost total extinction, I have embodied in imaginary scenes, and ascribed to fictitious characters, a part of the incidents which I then received from those who were actors in them. Indeed, the most romantic parts of this narrative are precisely those which have a foundation in fact. The exchange of mutual protection between a Highland gentleman and an officer of rank in the king's service, together with the spirited manner in which the latter asserted his right to return the favour he had received, is literally true. The accident by a musket-shot, and the heroic reply imputed to Flora, relate to a lady of rank not long deceased. And scarce a gentleman who was "in riding," after the battle of Culloden, but could tell a tale of strange concealments, and of wild and hair's-breadth escapes, as extraordinary as any which I have ascribed to my heroes. Of this, the escape of Charles Edward himself, as the most prominent, is the most striking example. The accounts of the battle of Preston and skirmish at Clifton, are taken from the narrative of intelligent eye-witnesses, and corrected from the History of the Rebellion by the late venerable author of Douglas. The Lowland Scottish gentlemen, and the subordinate characters, are not given as individual portraits, but are drawn from the general habits of the period, of which I have witnessed some remnants in my younger days, and partly gathered from tradition.

It has been my object to describe these persons, not by a caricatured and exaggerated use of the national dialect, but by their habits, manners, and feelings; so as in some distant degree to emulate the admirable Irish portraits drawn by Miss Edgeworth, so different from the "Teagues" and "dear joys," who so long, with the most perfect family resemblance to each other, occupied the drama and the novel.

I feel no confidence, however, in the manner in which I have executed my purpose. Indeed, so little was I satisfied with my production, that I laid it aside in an unfinished state, and only found it again by mere accident among other waste papers in an old cabinet, the drawers of which I was rummaging, in order to accommodate a friend with some fishing tackle, after it had been unread for several years. Two works upon similar subjects, by female authors, whose genius is highly creditable to their country, have appeared in the interval; I mean Mrs. Hamilton's Glenburnie, and the late account of Highland Superstitions. But the first is confined to the rural habits of Scotland, of which it has given a picture with striking and impressive fidelity; and the traditional records of the respectable and ingenious Mrs. Grant, of Laggan, are of a nature distinct from the fictitious narrative which I have here attempted.

I would willingly persuade myself, that the preceding work will not be found altogether uninteresting. To older persons it will recall scenes and characters familiar to their youth; and to the rising generation the tale may present some idea of the manners of their forefathers.

Yet I heartily wish that the task of tracing the evanescent manners of his own country had employed the pen of the only man in Scotland who could have done it justice,—of him so eminently distinguished in elegant literature, and whose sketches of Colonel Caustic and Umphaville are perfectly blended with the finer traits of national character. I should in that case have had more pleasure as a reader, than I shall ever feel in the pride of a successful author, should these sheets confer upon me that envious distinction. And as I have inverted the usual arrangement, placing these remarks at the end of the work to which they refer, I will venture on a second violation of form, by closing the whole with a Dedication;

END OF WAVERLEY.
GUY MANNERING;

OR,

THE ASTROLOGER.

'Tis said that words and signs have power
O'er sprites in planetary hour;
But scarce I praise their venturous part,
Who tamper with such dangerous art.

Lay of the Last Minstrel.
INTRODUCTION TO GUY MANNERING.

The Novel of Romance of Waverley made its way to the public slowly, of course, at first, but afterwards with such accumulating popularity as to encourage the author to a second attempt. He looked about for a name and a subject; and the manner in which the new novel was conceived cannot be better illustrated than by relating the simple narrative on which Guy Mannering was originally founded; but to which, in the progress of the work, the production ceased to bear any of the most distinct resemblance. The tale was originally told me by an old servant of my father's, an excellent old Highlander, without a fault, unless a preference to mountain-dew over less potent liquors be accounted one. He believed as firmly in the story, as in any part of his creed

A grave and elderly person, according to John M'Klaiy's account, while travelling in the wilder parts of Galloway, was beseiged. With difficulty he found his way to a country-seat, where, with the hospitality of the time and country, he was readily admitted. The owner of the house, a gentleman of good fortune, was much struck by the reverend appearance of his guest, and apologized to him for a certain degree of confusion which might attend his reception and could not escape his eye. The lady of the house was, he said, confined to her apartment, and on the point of making her husband a father for the first time, though they had been ten years married. At such a time, he feared his guest might meet with some apparent neglect.

"Not so, sir," said the stranger; "my wants are few, and easily supplied, and I trust the present circumstances may even afford an opportunity of showing my gratitude for your hospitality. Let me only request that I may be informed of the exact minute of the birth; and I hope to be put in possession of some particulars, which may influence, in an important manner, the events destined to take place in the child's life. It comes into the world busy and changeable. I will not conceal from you that I am skilled in understanding and interpreting the movements of these planetary bodies, which exert their influences on the destiny of mortals. It is a science which I do not practise, like others who call themselves astrologers, for hire or reward; for I have a competent estate, and only use the knowledge I possess for the benefit of those in whom I feel an interest." The Laird bowed in respect and gratitude, and the stranger was accommodated with an apartment which commanded a ample view of the astral regions.

The guest spent a part of the night in ascertaining the position of the heavenly bodies, and calculating their probable influence; until at length the result of his observations induced him to send for the father, and conjure him, in the most solemn manner, to cause the assistance to retain the birth, if practicable, were it but for five minutes. The answer declared this to be impossible; and almost in the instant that the message was returned, the father and his guest were made acquainted with the birth of a boy.

The Astrologer on the morrow met the party who gathered around the breakfast table, with looks so grave and ominous, as to alarm the fears of the father, who had hitherto exulted in the prospects held out by the birth of an heir to his ancient property, falling which event it must have passed to a distant branch of the family. He hastened to draw the stranger into a private room.

"I fear from your looks," said the father, "that you have bad tidings to tell me of my young stranger; perhaps God will resume the blessing he has bestowed ere he attains the age of manhood, or perhaps he is destined to be unworthy of the affection which we are naturally disposed to devote to our offspring."

"Neither the one nor the other," answered the stranger; "unless my judgment greatly err, the infant will survive the year of its minority, and in temper and disposition will prove all that his parents can wish. But with much in his horoscope which promises many blessings, there is one evil influence strongly predominant, which threatens to subject him to an unhappiness of which he is not conscious, till about the time when he shall attain the age of twenty-one, which period, the constellation intimates, will be the crisis of his fate. In what shape, or with what peculiar anguish, this temptation may beset him, my art cannot discover."

"Your knowledge, then, can afford us no defence," said the anxious father, "against the threatened evil?"

"Pardon me," answered the stranger, "it can. The influence of the constellations is powerful; but He, who made the heavens, is more powerful still, if we are disposed to attach certainty and truth. You ought to dedicate this boy to the immediate service of his Maker, with as much sincerity as Samuel was devoted to the worship in the Temple by his parents. You must regard him as being separated from the rest of the world. In childhood, in boyhood, you must surround him with the pious and virtuous, and protect him, to the utmost of your power, from the sight or hearing of any crime, in word or action. He must be educated in religious and moral praecepts of the strictest description. Let him not enter the world, lest he learn to partake of its folly, or perhaps of its vices. In short, preserve him as far as possible from all sin, save that of which too great a portion belongs to all the fallen race of Adam.

With the approach of his twenty-first birth-day comes the crisis of his fate. If he survives it, he will be happy and prosperous on earth, and a chosen vessel among those elected for heaven. But if he is otherwise"—The Astrologer stopped, and sighed deeply.

"Sir," replied the parent, still more alarmed than before, "your words are so kind, your advice so serious, that I will pay the deepest attention to your advice and your behaviour in any case. Further in this most important concern? Believe me, I will not be ungrateful."

"I require and deserve no gratitude for doing a good action," said the stranger, in an earnest manner; for he considered it was in my power to save from an abode of horror the harmless infant to whom, under a singular conjunction of planets, last night gave life. There is my address; you may write to me from time to time concerning the child, and the result of your observations. If he be bred up as I advise, I think it will be best that he comes to my house at the time when the fatal and decisive period approaches, that is, before he has attained his twenty-first year complete. If you send him such as I desire, I humbly trust that God will protect his own, through whatever strong temptations his fate may subject him to." He then gave his host his address, which was a country-seat near a post-town in the north of England, and bid him an affectionate farewell.

The mysterious stranger departed, but his words remained impressed upon the mind of the anxious parent. He lost his lady while his boy was still in infancy. This calamity, I think, had been predicted by the heavenly bodies, which, like most people of the period, he had freely given to the science; but he was afterward confirmed. The utmost care, therefore, was taken to carry it's effect the severe and almost ascetic plan of education which the sage had enjoined. A tutor of the strictest principles was employed to superintend the youth's education; he was surrounded by domestics of the most established character, and closely watched and looked after by the anxious father himself.

The years of infancy, childhood, boyhood, passed as the father could have wished. A young Nazarene could not have been bred up with more rigor. All that was evil was witheld from his observation—he only heard what was pure in precept—he only witnessed what was worthy in practice. But when the boy began to be lost in the youth, the attentive father saw cause for alarm. Shadows of sadness, which gradually assumed of darker character, began to overcloud the young man's temper. Tears, which seemed involuntary, broken sleep, moon light wanderings, and a melancholy for which he could assign no reason, seemed to threaten at once his bodily health, and the stability of his mind. The Astrologer was consulted by letter, and returned for answers, that this fitful state of mind was but the commencement of his trial, and that the poor youth was in a stage of waking up from a state of torpor, when he should attack the age of twenty-one, which period, the constellations intimates, will be the crisis of his fate. In what shape, or with what peculiar anguish, this temptation may beset him, my art cannot discover."
INTRODUCTION TO GUY MANRING.

The dispositions of the young man were so excellent, that he combated, by reason and religion, the fits of gloom which at times overset his mind, and it was not till he attained the commencement of his twenty-first year that he assumed a character which made his father tremble for the consequences. It seemed as if the gloomiest and most hideous of mental maladies was taking the form of religious despair. Still the youth was not cast down; he looked up to his father's will, and resisted with all his power the dark suggestions which were breathed into his mind, as it seemed, by some enunciation of the Evil Principle shouting, him, like the wicked witch of Job, to curse God and die. The time at length arrived when he was to perform what was then thought a long and somewhat perilous journey, to the monastery of the early friend who had calculated his nativity. His father, at length, and after several years of the amusement of travelling, more than he himself thought would have been possible. Thus he did not reach the place of his destination till noon, on the day preceding his birth-day. It seemed as if he had been carried away with an unwonted tide of pleasurable sensation, so as to forget, in some degree, what his father had communicated concerning the purpose of his journey. He halted at length before a respectable but solitary old mansion, to which he was directed as the abode of his father's friend.

The servants who came to take his horse, told him he had been expected for two days. He was led into a study, where thePrior to the master, a gentleman, named Lord Curzon, was father's guest, met him with a shade of displeasure, as well as gravity, on his brow. "Young man," he said, "whence so slow on a journey of such importance?"—"I thought," replied the youth, "that, however late I arrive, there was less harm in travelling slowly, and satisfying my curiosity, providing I could reach your residence by this day; for such was my father's charge."—"You were to blame," replied the sage, "in lingering, considering the time of the year; the matter of blood was pressing on your footsteps. BUT you are come at last, and we will hope for the best, though the conflict in which you are to be engaged will be found more dreadful, the longer it is postponed. But first, neglect of such refreshments as nature requires, to satisfy, but not to pamper, the appetite." The old man led the way into a summer parlour, where a frugal meal was placed on the table. As they set down to the board, they were joined by a young lady about eighteen years of age, and so lovely, that the sight of her carried off all the feelings of the young stranger from the peculiarity of his own lot, and riveted his attention to every thing she did or said. She spoke little, and it was on the most serious subjects. She played on the harpsichord at her father's command, but it was hymns with which she accompanied the instrument. At length, on a sign from the sage, she left the room, turning on the young stranger as she departed, a look of inexorable anxiety and interest.

The old man then conducted the youth to his study, and conversed with him upon the most important points of religion, to satisfy the curiosity of young people, and to bring him nearer to the faith of his father, which was in his mind. During the examination, the youth, in spite of himself, felt his mind occasionally wander, and his recollections go in quest of the beautiful vision who had shared their meal at noon. On such occasions, the Astrologer looked grave, and shook his head at this relaxation of attention; yet, on the whole, he was pleased with the youth's replies.

At sunset the young man was made to take the bath; and, having done so, he was directed to till himself in a robe, somewhat like that worn by Armenians, having his long haircombe down on his shoulders, and his neck, hands, and feet bare. In this guise, he was conducted into a remote chamber to the table, and allowed to partake of such refreshments as he would like, and was told to lay a Bible. "Here," said the Astrologer, "I must leave you alone, to pass the most critical period of your life. If you can, by recollection of the great truths of which we have spoken, repel the attacks which will be made on your courage and your principles, you have nothing to apprehend. But the trial will be severe and arduous." His features then assumed a pathetic solemnity, the tears stood in his eyes, and his voice faltered as he added: "Death, and those who come within the circle of conversation with uncommon excellence, has been my grace to support it with firmness!"

The young man was left alone; and hardly did he find himself in the midst of the surrounding silence, when he was seized by a sense of omission and commission, rendered even more terrible by the superficialness with which he had been educated, rushed on his mind, and, like furies armed with fiery scourges, seemed determined by the spirit of the Evil Principle to subdue him with horrible recollections with distressed feelings, but with a resolved mind, he became aware that his arguments were answ the sophistry of another, and that the dispute was no confined to his own thoughts. The Author of Evil was in the room; but his face was in a manner suffused with a melanoucholy cast, was impressing upon him the deep grace of his state, and urging suicide as the readiest mode to end to his sinfull career. Amid's his errors, the pleasure I taken in perusing his writings, and observing his manner of behaving to his associates, which he had bestowed on the beauty of the fair female his thoughts ought to have been dedicated to the religious course of her father, were set before him in the darkest ex rem, and he was treated as one who, having sinned against was, therefore, deservedly left a prey to the Prince of Dae As the fated and influential hour rolled on, the terror to the Prince of Darkness, and no thought of the vicissitudes and the amusements he had enjoyed, the more inextricable in appearance, at least to the prey which surrounded him. He had not power to explain the ease of pardon which he continued to assert, or to name the cause in which he trusted. But his faith did not fail him, though he lacked for a time the power of express "Say what you will," was his answer to the Tempt "I know there is as much between the two boards of this B can ensure me forgiveness for my transgressions, and still my soul." As he spoke, the clock, which announced the hour of the fatal hour, was heard to strike. The speech and actual powers of the youth were instantly and fully reced the calamity, and he enjoyed the peace of mind of the vels himself, his reliance on the truth, and on the Author, of theiel. The demon retired, yelling and disinclined, and t, man, entering the apartment, with tears congratulated his pleasant and delightful manner.

The young man was afterwards married to the maiden, the first sight of whom had made such an imp on him, and they were consigned over at the close of the vels to domestic happiness. —He ended John McKinn's life of a woman.

The Author of Waverley had imagined a possibility of an interesting, and perhaps not an unedifying, tale, out incidents of the life of a doomed individual, whose ef good and wise, the shooting of the poppy, the furnishing of the intervention, as it were, of some malevolent being, ar was at last to come victorious from the fearful struggle short, something was mediated upon a pian resembles imaginative tale of Histram and his Companions, by Mc Baron de la Motte Foulqué, although, if it then existed, lord had not seen it.

The scheme projected may be traced in the three or fo chapters of the work, but further consideration induced theor to lay his purpose aside. It appeared, on mature c onclusion, that Astrology, though its influence was once re and admitted by Bacon himself, does not now retain its over the great mass of minds; and sufficient evidence of the spring of a romance. Besides, it occurred, that to do ju such a subject would have required not only more talent the author could be conscious of possessing, but also in the doctrines essential to the faith of his father, and for the character of the narrative. In changing hi however, which was done in the course of printing, thats retained the vestiges of the original tenor of the although they now hang upon it as an unnecessary and u ral incumbrance. The cause of such vestiges occurring explained, and apologized for.

It is here worthy of observation, that while the astro doctrines have fallen into general contempt, and been sup erstitions of a more gross and far less beautiful c het, they have, even in modern days, retained some votary.

One of the most remarkable believers in that forgot the settled system, was a man of great reputation in the legendarium. One would have thought that a person of description ought, from his knowledge of the thousand which human eyes could be deceived, to have been less others subject to the fancies of antiquation. Perplexed human habits, and was much given to prophetic communications.

He constructed a scheme of his own nativity, calculated to such rules of art as he could collect from ti as it is known to the known world, and from how to what he hitherto been belted him, but in the important pe of the future a singular difficulty occurred. Their two years, during the course of which he could by no obtain any information that would have confirmed their sa of being dead or alive. Anxiety concerning so remark circumstance, he gave the scheme to a brother Astrologer, who was also baffled in the same manner. At one period he found the native, or subject, was certainly alive; at another, that he was unquestionably dead; but a space of two years extended between these events, during which he could find no certainty as to his death or existence.

The Astrologer marked the remarkable circumstance in his Diary, and continued his exhibitions in various parts of the republic until the period was about to expire, during which his existence had been warrantied as actually ascertained. At last, while he was exhibiting to a numerous audience his usual tricks of legendarium, the hands, whose activity had so often baffled the most observant, ceased, and suddenly their power, the cards dropped from them, and he sunk down a disabled parasite.

In this state the artist languished for two years, when he was at length removed by death. It is said that the Diary and the papers of this Astrologer filled a large public library.

The fact, if truly reported, is one of those singular coincidences which occasionally appear, differing so widely from ordinary calculation, yet without which irregularities, human life would not present to mortals, looking into futurity, the abyss of impenetrable darkness, which it is the pleasure of the Creator it should offer to them. Were every thing to happen in the ordinary train of events, the future would be subject to the restraint of the present, and future events, so far as these are similar to ordinary events, and wonderful runs of luck, defy the calculations of mankind, and throw impenetrable darkness on future contingency.

In the above anecdote, another, still more recent, may be added. The author was lately honoured with a letter from a gentleman deeply skilled in these mysteries, who kindly undertook to calculate the nativity of the writer of Guy Mannering, and to narrate the history of his life, which he professed. But it was impossible to supply data for the construction of a horoscope, had the native been otherwise disposed of, as those who could supply the minutiae of day, hour, and minute, have been long removed from the mortal sphere.

Having thus given some account of the first idea, or rude sketch, of the story, which was soon deserted from the author, as far as his concern was the natural development of the prototype of the principal characters in Guy Mannering. Some circumstances of local situation gave the author, in his youth, an opportunity of seeing a little, and learning a great deal, about that degraded class who are called gipsies; who are in most cases a mixed race, between the ancient Egyptians who arrived in Europe about the beginning of the fifteenth century, and vagrants of European descent.

The individual gipsy upon whom the character of Meg Merlin was founded, was well known about the middle of the last century, by the name of Jean Gordon, an inhabitant of the village of Kirk Yetholm, in the Cheviot hills, adjoining to the English Border. He was a very well-known personage in the neighborhood. The author met with one of the prototypes of the principal characters in Guy Mannering, in one of the early numbers of Blackwood's Magazine, to the following purpose:

"My father remembered old Jean Gordon of Yetholm, who had a reputation of a very dangerous and worthless sort, a Meg Merlin, and possessed the savage virtues of idolatry in the same perfection. Having been often hospitably received at the farmhouse of Lochside, near Yetholm, she had carefully abstained from committing any depredations on the farmer's property. But her sons (nine in number) had not, it seems, the same delicacy, and stole a brood-sow from their kind entertainer. Jean was mortified at this ungrateful conduct, and so much ashamed of it, that she abanoned herself from Lochside for several years."

"It happened, in course of time, that in consequence of some temporary pecuniary necessity, the Goodmat of Lochside was obliged to go to Newcastle to raise some money to pay his rent. He was a very honest man, but, according to the mountains of Cheviot, he was acquainted and lost his way."

"A light, shimmering through the window of a large waste barn, which had survived the farm-house to which it had once belonged, guided him to a place of shelter; and when he knocked at the door, it was opened by Jean Gordon. Her very remarkable figure, for she was nearly six feet high, and her equally remarkable features and dress, rendered it impossible to use her as prey. She was employed in weaving, which she had done for half a century; and to meet with such a character in so solitary a place, and probably at so great distance from her clan, was a grievous surprise to the poor man, whose rent (to lose which would have been a heavy blow to his way of living) and, good enough in his situation to keep the wolves at bay."

"Jean set up a loud shout of joyful recognition—"Eh, sir! the wi'some Goodman of Lochside! Light down, light down: for ye maunna gang further the aight, and a friend's house me near./" The runner was obliged to dismount, and accept of the gipsy's offer of supper and a bed. There was plenty of meat in the barn, however it might be come by; and preparations were going on for a plentiful repast, which the farmer, to the great increase of his anxiety, observed, was calculated for tea or coffee, during guest, of the same description, probably, with his landlord."

"Jean left him in no doubt on the subject. She brought to his recollection the story of the stolen sow, and mentioned how much pain and anxiety it had caused. She added that the farmer, during the whole period of his absence, had been looking for her, and that, on the return of his goods, she had, as it were, thrown herself into his arms."

"This end of all this was, an inquiry what money the farmer had about him; and an urgent request, or command, that he would make her his housekeeper, since the damsels, as she called her name, would be very serviceable to him. Jean, in this instance of necessity, told his story, and surrendered his gold to Jean's custody. She made him put a few shillings in his pocket, observing it would excite suspicion should he be found travelling altogether penniless."

"This arrangement being made, the farmer lay down on a sort of sketl-drear, as the Scotch call it, or bed clothes disposed upon some straw, but, as will easily be believed, slept not."

"About midnight he dozed off into a light slumber, full of pleasant dreams of plunder, and talked over their exploits in language which made the farmer tremble. They were not long in discovering they had a guest, and demanded of Jean whom she had got there."

"'Een this', says the wiser of the two, 'the man of the blackest hair had applied Jean; 'he's been at Newcastle seeking wikler to pay his rent, honest man, but deed be-likkit he's been able to gather in, and sae he's gaun e'en hame wi' a strong purse and a sair heart.'"

"'That maun be a beau lump o' money,' said the other. 'It's mair man in his pocket than is ever seen. He's caund his man to rie his poucheis a bit, and see if the tale be true or no.' Jean set up her threat in exclamations against this breach of hospitality, but without producing any change in their determination. The farmer soon heard their stifled whispers and light steps by his bedside, and understood they were rummaging his clothes. When they found the money which the providence of Jean Gordon had made him in retain, he held a con conspiring council of war, to divide the spoil, and to determine the order of the booty, and the vivacity of Jean's remembrances, determined them in the negative. They calmed and went to rest. As soon as day dawned, Jean roused her guest, produced his horse, which she had accommodated behind the sashin, and guided him for some miles, till he was on the high-road to Lochside. She then restored his whole property: nor could his earnest entreaties prevail on her to accept so much as a single guinea."

"I have heard the old people at Jedburgh say, that all Jean's sons were consigned to die there on the same day. It is said the jury were equally divided, but that a friend to justice, who had slept during the whole discussion, waked suddenly, and cut the Gordans' throats, and cried, 'Let us die not as gouls at a!' Unanimity is not required in a Scotch jury, so the verdict of guilty was returned. Jean was present, and only said, 'The Lord help the innocent in this like thing.' Her on a large scaffold, was publicly burnt as a witch. I am informed the guillotine of poor Jean was in many respects wholly undeserving. She had, among other dementies, or merits, as the reader may choose to rank it, that of being a staunch Jacobite. She chanced to be at Carlisle upon a fair or market-day, soon after the year 1746, where she gave vent to her political partiality, to the great offence of the rabble of that city. Being seized in their loyalty, when there was no danger, in proportion to the tameness with which they had surrendered to the Highlanders in 1745, the mob inflicted upon poor Jean Gordon no lighter penalty than that of ducking her to death in the Eden. It was an operation of some time, for Jean was a stout woman, and, struggling fiercely, and bitting the hands of the men who had seized her, and, while she had voice left, continued to exclaim at such intervals, 'Charlie yet! Charlie yet!' When a child, and among the scenes which she frequented, I have often heard these stories, and cried piteously for poor Jean Gordon."

"Before quitting the Border gipsies, I may mention, that my grandfather, while riding over Cawtershoot moor, then a very extensive common, fell suddenly among a large band of them, and had no escape but to run into the bushes. They instantly seized on his horse's bridle with many shouts of welcome, exclaiming (for he was well known to most of them) that they had often dined at his expense, and he must now stay and drink with them. My grandfather, a little alarmed, for, like the Goodman of Lochside, he had more money about his person than he cared to risk in such society. However, being naturally a bold lively-spirited man, he entered into the humour of the thing, and took down to the beast, which was sated of all the varieties of game, poultry, pigs, and so forth, that could be collected by a wide and indiscriminate system of plunder. The dinner was a very merry one; but my relative got a hint from some of the older gipsies to retire just when

'T the mirth and fun grew hot and furious,' and, mounting his horse accordingly, he took a French leave of his entertainers, but without experiencing the least breach of hospitality. I believe Jean Gordon was at this festival.'—(Blackwood's Magazine, vol. i. p. 84.)

Notwithstanding the failure of Jean's issue, for which,

Weary at the waste's end, a grand-daughter survived her whom I remember to have seen.

That is, as Dr. Johnson had a shadowy recollection of Queen Anne, as a stately lady in black, adorned with diamonds, so my memory is haunted by a solemn remembrance of a woman of more than feminine height, dressed in a long red cloak, who commenced acquaintance by giving me an apple, but whom, nevertheless, I looked on with as much awe, as the future Doctor, High Church and Tory as he was doomed to be, could look upon the Queen. I conceive this woman to have been Madge Gordon, of whom an impressive account is given in the same article in which her Mother Jean is mentioned, but not by the present writer:—

"The late Madge Gordon was at this time accounted the Queen of the Yetholm clans. She was, we believe, a grand-daughter of the celebrated Jean Gordon, and was said to have much resembled her in appearance. The following account of her is extracted from the letter of a friend, who for many years enjoyed frequent and favourable opportunities of observing the characteristic peculiarities of the Yetholm tribes:—"Madge Gordon was descended from the Faas by the mother's side, and was married to a Young. She was a remarkable personage of a very commanding presence, and high stature, being nearly six feet high. She had a large aquiline nose—penetrating eyes, even in her old age—bulky hair that hung around her shoulders from beneath a gipsy bonnet of straw—a short cloak of a peculiar fashion, and a long staff nearly as tall as herself. I remember her well—every week she paid my father a visit for her assmess, when I was a little boy, and I looked upon Madge with no common degree of awe and terror. When she spoke vehemently, (for she made loud complaints,) she used to strike her staff upon the floor, and throw herself into an attitude which it was impossible to regard with indifference. She used to say that she could bring from the remotest parts of the island, friends to revenge her quarrel, while she sat motionless in her cottage; and she frequently boasted that there was a time when she was of still more considerable importance, for there were at her wedding fifty saddled asses, and unsaddled asses without number. If Jean Gordon was the prototype of the projector of Meg Marillan, I imagine Madge must have sat to the unknown author as the representative of her peace."—(Blackwood's Magazine, vol. i. p. 85.)

How far Blackwood's insipid correspondent was right, how far mistaken in his conjecture, the reader has been informed.

To pass to a character of a very different description, Dominie Sampson, the reader may easily suppose that a poor modest humble scholar, who has won his way through the classics, yet has fallen to leeward in the voyage of life, is no uncommon personage in a country, where a certain portion of learning is easily attained by those who are willing to suffer hunger and thirst in exchange for acquiring Greek and Latin. But there is far more exact prototype of the worthy Dominie, upon which is founded the part which he performs in the romance, and which, for certain particular reasons, must be expressed very generally.

Such a preceptor as Mr. Sampson is supposed to have been, was actually tutor in the family of a gentleman of considerable property. The young lady, his pupil, grew up and went out in the world, but the tutor continued to reside in the family, no uncommon circumstance in Scotland, (in former days,) where food and shelter were readily afforded to humble friends and dependants. The Laird's predecessors had been imprudent, he himself was inactive and unfortunate. Death swept away his sons, whose success in life might have balanced his own bad luck and incapacity. Debts increased and funds diminished, until ruin came. The estate was sold; and the old man was about to remove from the house of his fathers, to go he knew not whither, when, like an old piece of furniture, which, left alone in its wasted corner, may hold together for a long while, but breaks to pieces on an attempt to move it, he fell down on his own threshold under a paralytic affection.

The tutor awakened as from a dream. He saw his patron dead, and that his patron's only remaining child, an elderly woman, now neither graceful nor beautiful, if she had ever been either the one or the other, had by this calamity become a homeless and penniless orphan. He addressed her nearly in the words which Dominie Sampson uses to Miss Berton, and prosecutes his determination not to leave her. Accordingly, reused to the exercise of talents which had long slumbered, he opened a little school, and supported his patron's child for the rest of her life, treating her with the same humble observance and devoted attention which he had used towards her in the days of her prosperity.

Such is the outline of Dominie Sampson's real story, in which there is neither romantic incident nor sentimental passion; but which, perhaps, from the rectitude and simplicity of character which it displays, may interest the heart and fill the eye of the reader as irresistibly, as if it respected distresses of a more dignified or refined character.

These preliminary notices concerning the tale of Guy Mancering, and some of the characters introduced, may save the author and reader, in the present instance, the trouble of writing and perusing a long string of detached notes.

Aberfoyle, January, 1829.
CHAPTER I.

He could not deny that looking round upon the dreary region, and seeing nothing but bleak fields, and naked trees, hills obscured by fog, and pits covered with stagnations, he did feel some time surfeit melancholy to prevail upon him, and wished himself again safe at home.

It was in the beginning of the month of November 17—, when a young English gentleman, who had just left the university of Oxford, made use of the liberty afforded him, to visit some parts of the north of England; and curiosity extended his tour into the adjacent frontier of the six sister counties. He had visited, on the day that opens our history, some monastic ruins in the county of Dumbfries, and spent much of the day in making drawings of them from different points; so that on mounting his horse to resume his journey, the brief and gloomy twilight of the season had already commenced. His way lay through a wide tract of black moor, extending for miles on each side before him. Little eminences arose like islands on its surface, bearing here and there patches of corn, which even at this season was green, and sometimes a hut, or farm-house, shaded by a willow or two, or surrounded by large elder-bushes. These isolated dwellings communicated with each other by winding passages through the moss, impassable by any but the natives themselves. The public road, however, -in the south-west corner of the country, as it passed through the midst of gray moorness. To this was now joined the distant roar of the ocean, towards which the traveller seemed to be fast approaching. This was no circumstance to make his mind easy. Many of the roads in that country lay along the sea-beach, and were liable to be flooded by the tides, which rise with great height, and advance with extreme rapidity. Others were intersected with creeks and small islands; and it was not to be expected that it was to be possible to get to the houses of the inhabitants, however poor, he might chance to reach, unless he could procure a guide to this unhappy village of Kippletringan.

A miserable want of light afforded him an opportunity to execute his purpose. He had found the door with no small difficulty, and for some time knocked without producing any other answer than a request for the female servant, the door being opened by a servant, who was already become quite disposed to be well acquainted with the keeper of the house and the girl of the house, which was the case with the present situation of the matter. The girl was not disposed to have her heart out, or the other screaming in chorus. By degrees the human tones predominated; but the angry bark of the dog being at the instant changed into a howl, it is probable something more than fair strength of lungs had contributed to the ascendency.

"Sorrow in your throat then!" these were the first articulate words, "will ye no let me hear what the man wants, wi' yer yapping?"

"Am I far from Kippletringan, good dame?"

"Praise Kippletringan! I'll in an exalted tone of wonder, which we can but faintly express by three points of admiration; "Ow, man! ye should nae hadden caist to Kippletringan—ye maun gae back as far as the Whasp, and hau the Whasp till ye come to Ballenloan, and then—"

"This will never do, good dame! my horse is almost quite knocked up—can you not give me a night's lodgings?"

"The Hope, of the overgrown Whasp, is the sheltered port or hollow of the Islay, such and such—what regulations of the same sort.
"Troth can I no—I am a lone woman, for James he's awa to Drumshayrouch fair with the year-salad, and I daurna for my life open the door to ony o' your gang-there-out sort o' bodies.

"If then, good dame? for I can't sleep here upon the road all night."

"Troth, I kenna, unless ye like to gae down and speak for quarters at the Place. I 'se warrant they'll take you in, whether ye be gentle or common.

"Simple enough, to be wandering here at such a time of night," thought Mannerings, who was ignorant of the meaning of the phrase; "but how shall I get the door open to it?"

"Ye maun hand weesed by the end o' the loon, and take tient o' the jaw-hole."

"O, if ye get to casset and weeset again, I am undone—is there anybody that could make me to this place? I will pay him handsomely."

The word pass operated like magic. "Jock, ye villain," exclaimed a voice from the interior, "are ye lying round there, and a young gentleman seeking the way to the Place? Get up, ye false loon, and show him the way down the muckle eloaming.—He'll show you the way, sir, and I 'se warrant ye'll be well pleased with the manner of the door; and ye'll be come in the canny moment, I'm thinking, for the laird's servant—that's no to say his body servant, but the helper like—rude express by this c'en to the place, and a short raid the drinking o' twa pints o' tippenny, to tell us how my laddie was ta'en wi' her pain."

"Perhaps," said Mannerings, "at such a time a stranger might be inclined to wait.

"Hout, na', ye need be blee and amit that; their house is muckle enough, and clockin' time's aye canti time.

In this time Jock had found his way into all the intricacies of a tattered doublot, and more a tattered pair of breeches, and sailed forth, a great white-headed, bare-legged, ribberboy hoof of twelve years old, so exhibited by the glimpse of a rush-light, which his half oiled red whiskers, and a black coat and brown frock jacket, ne'er having slept in the same bed or stowed together a patch, and a patch, the winter of the year. He had the little patch which bordered the formidable jaw-hole, whose vicinity the stranger was made sensible of by means of more organs than one. His guide then disappeared, and Jock, walking some distance, arrived at a cart-track, next over a ploughed field, then broke down a stop, as he called it, in a dry-stone fence, and lugged the unresting animal through the breach, abounding with the lust of the chase, and the spleen of the wayfarer, with which he passed. Finally, he led the way, through a wicket, into something which had still the air of an avenue, though many of the trees were cut, and some of the edges near the gate were split and full, and the moon, which began to make her appearance, gleamed on a turreted and apparently a ruined mansion, of considerable extent. Mannerings fixed his eyes upon it with a disconsolate sensation."

"Why, my little fellow," he said, "this is a ruin, not a house."

"Ah, but the lairds lived there Langsyne—that's Ellangowan Auld Place; there's a hantie bogies about it—but ye needna be feared—I never saw omy myself, and we're just at the door o' the New Place."

Accordingly, leaving the ruins on the right, a few steps brought the traveller in front of a modern house of moderate size, at which his guide rapped with great importance. Mannerings told his circumstances to the servant; and the gentleman of the house, who heard his tale from the parlour, stepped forward, and welcomed the stranger hospitably to Ellangowan. The young man, made happy with half-a-crown, was haimed to his cottage, the weary horse was conducted to a stall, and Mannerings found himself in a few minutes seated by a comfortable supper, for which his cold ribs and his hearty appetite.

but on the breaking out of Appy's rebellion, Dennis Benjamin, the present possessor, appointed by government, appeared, on the 28th of April, 1715, he was summoned to the bar, and there he was had in charge, his conduct was then charged, and he was detained for a considerable time, during which time he was compelled to stay, and the court was opened, and the case was tried, and the verdict was given in favor of the defendant, and the case was remanded for further proceedings. The court then adjourned, and the defendant was sent to prison, and there he remained until he was discharged, and then he was released.

Donohoe Jr., with somewhat of an Irish name, and so great a thirst for the past, that he went to the house of the Rev. Aaron Macfarlane, his mother's chaplain, (it is said they quarrelled about the good graces of a milkmaid,) drank himself daily drunk with brimming health to the king, council, and bishops; held orgies with the Laird of Lagg, Theophilus Oglethorpe, and Sir James Turner; and lastly, took on his drink, and joined Clavers at Killecrankie. At the skirmish of Dunkeld, 1699, he was shot dead by a Cameronian with a silver button, (being supposed to have, from the evil One against lead and steel,) and his grave is still called, the "Wicked Laird's Lair." He was, so the story goes, more given up to his lusts than usual to have belonged to the family. He nourished what property was yet left to him; for Donohoe's excesses, as well as fines and forfeitures, had made as much of a fortune of it. But though one, he did not escape the fury which induced the Lords of Eillangowan to interfere with politics, he had yet this prudence, ere he went out with Lord Eglinton's army. He had the fear of a man of sense, in order to avoid perjury and penalties, in case the Earl of Mar could not put down the Protestant succession. But Scylla and Charybdis—a word to the wise and wicked, a word of a life without a suit, which again subdivided the family property. He was, however, a man of resolution. He sold part of the lands, evacuating the old castle, where the family had passed their decadence, as a mouse (said an old farmer) lives under a firtol. Pulling down part of these venerable ruins, he built with the stones a narrow house of three stories high, with a front like a grenadier's cap, having in the very centre a round window, like the single eye of a Cyclops, two windows on each side, and a door in the middle, leading to a parlour and withdrawing room, full of all manner of furniture.

This was the New Place of Eillangowan, in which we left our hero, better amused perhaps than our readers, and to this Lewis Bertram retreated, full of prosperity, wearing the prosperity of his family. He took over land, planted it, sent some of the proceeds from neighbouring proprietors, bought and sold Highland cattle and Cheviot sheep, rode to fairs and tayset, fought hard bargains, and held necessity at the end as well as he might. But what he gained in purse, he lost in honour, for such agricultural and commercial negotiations were very ill looked upon by his brother lairds, who minded nothing but cock-fighting, hunting, courting, and horse-racing, with now and then the alteration of a desperate duel. The occupations which he followed encroached, in their opinion, upon the estate of Eillangowan's gentry, and, as a gentleman, he was an enemy to the laird himself, from their society, and sink into what was then a very ambiguous character, a gentleman farmer. In the midst of his schemes death claimed his tribute, and the heavy clouds of a large property descended upon him. The brothers of the Gentleman Farmer, Godfrey Bertram, the present possessor, his own son.

The danger of the father's speculations was soon seen. Deprived of Laird Lewis's personal and active support of his speculative schemes, he became more and more involved, and became an object of derision and ridicule. Without a single spark of energy to meet or repel these misfortunes, Godfrey put his faith in the activity of another, and the severity of a large property descended upon him, and two brothers from other northern preliminaries to ruin; but as he has been observed of his countrymen, he kept a man of business, who answered the purpose equally well. Under this gentleman's supervision small debts grew into large, interests were accumulated upon capi-

CHAPTER III.

Do not make the history of all ages

Pore upon the face of God.

The circumstances of the landlady were pleaded to Manning, first, as an apology for her not appearing to welcome her guest, and for those deficiencies in her entertainment which her attention might have supplied, and then as an excuse for pressing an extra bottle of good wine.

"I cannot keep my mouth shut," said the Laird, with the anxious feelings of a father in such a predicament, "till I hear she's got a woman with it—and if you, sir, are not very sleepy, and would do me the honour to sit up with me, I am sure we will not detain you very late. Luckie Howatson is very expedient—there was once a lass that was in that way—she did not live far from hereabouts—ye needna shake your head at her. Good man, Domingue—I am sure the kirk does weep a' weel paid, and what can man do mair?—it was laid till her ere she had a kirk over her head, and the man that she since washed does not think her a pin the war for the munificence. They live, Mr. Manning, by the shore-side, at Annan, and a mair decent, orderly couple, with six as fine bairns as ye would wish to see splash in a salt-water dune and little curlie Godfrey—that's the eldest, the come o' will, as I may say—he's on board an excise yacht—I have a cousin at the board of excise—that's Commissioner Bertram; he got his commsittee, I believe, through the Bishop, who had been auld familiar with high huzzaers, and had his hopes and prospects, to share the poverty of his parents. As he had neither friend nor confidant, hardly even an acquaintance, no one had the means of knowing that the Bishop saw him. In his relations to the patron, he was a young man, a young student, of humanity, of the holy influence of the Principal, that the fugitive had not, in imitation of his mighty namesake, taken the college gates as a means of entry in his vocation.

To all appearance, the eagerness of Sampson was unshaken. He sought to assist his parents by teaching a school, and soon had plenty of scholars, but very few fees. In fact, he taught the sons of farmers for what they chose to give him, and the poor for nothing; and, to the shame of the former he is spoken, the pedagogue's gains never equalled those of a skilful ploughman. He wrote, however, a good hand, and added something to his pittance by copying accounts and writing letters for Ellangowan. By degrees, the Laird, who was much estranged from general business, became partial to the views of Domingue Sampson. Conversation, it is true, was out of the question, but the Domingue was a good listener, and stirred the fire with some address. He attempted everything, but, whenever he became successful, was so relished that ambitious post of constable after having twice reduced the parlor to total darkness. So his civilities, therefore, were confined to taking off his glass of ale in exactly the same time and measure with the Laird, and in uttering certain in distinct murmurs of acquiescence at the conclusion of the long and winding stories of Ellangowan.

On one of those occasions, by presentment, for the first time to Manning, his face, so gaunt, so wasted, so bony, figure, attired in a threadbare suit of black, with a coloured handkerchief, not over clean, about his snifter, his grey mustache, and his mother person arrayed in gray breeches, blue stockings, clouted shoes, and small copper buckles.

Such was a brief outline of the lives and fortunes of those two persons, in whose society Manning now found himself comfortably seated.

"It's Meg Merrilies, the gipsy, as sure as I am a sinner," said Mr. Bertram. The Domingue ground deep, uncrossed his legs, drew in the huge spay foot which his former posture had extended, placed it perpendicularly, and stretched the other limb over it instead, passing out between whiles huge volumes of tobacco smoke. "What need ye grieve, Domingue? I am sure Meg's sangs do nae ill.

"Nor good neither," answered Domingue Sampson, in a voice whose untuneable harshness corresponded with the awkwardness of his figure, they were the first words that Manning had heard him speak, and as he had been watching with some curiosity, when this eating, drinking, moving, and smoking automation would perform the part of speaking, he was a good deal disconcerted with the harsh tongue on which issued from him. But at this moment the door opened, and Meg Merrilies entered.

Her appearance made Manning start. She was full six feet high, and wore a broad hat over the rest of her dress, had in her hand a goodly sloe-thorn cudgel, and in all points of equipment, except her petticoats, seemed rather masculine than feminine. Her dark eyes were shot out like the snakes of the gorgon, between an old-fashioned bonnet called a bongrace, heightening the singular effect of her strong and weather-beaten features, which they partly shadowed while her eye cut like a thorn in the indicated something like real or affected insanity.

"Aweel, Ellangowan," she said, "wa' it no has been a bonnie thing, an' the leddy had been brought-to-bed, and the lad out o' Drummurru, or fair o' Drummore is com- ming, nor dreaming a word about it! Wha was to keep awa the worceeres, I trow? Ay, and the elves and grye-carlings frae the bonny bairn, grace be in their bed! Ay, and what Colme's chair's like the chair I the chair?" And without waiting an answer she began to sing—
"Treflig, vereina, John's-wo't, dill, Hinders wi' shes of their will;
Weel is thim, that weel may Fart upon, Andrew's day.

Saint Bride and her brat, Baint Coline and his cat,
Keep the house from rain and dirt.

This charm she sung to a wild tune, in a high and shrill voice, and cutting three capers with such strength and force, it almost to touch the roof of the room, concluded, "And now, Laird, will ye no order me a tass o' brandy?"

"That you shall have, Meg—sit down yont there at the table and tell us what news yo have heard at the fair o' Drumshourloch.

"Truth, Laird, and there was muckle want o' you, and the like o' you; for there was a whin bonnie lass's

"Forbye myself, and deil ane 'to gie them hands!"

"Weel, Meg, and how many gipsies were sent to the tolbooth?"

"Three, Laird, for there were nane mair in the fair. bbye myself, as I said before, and I e'en gie them leg-bad, for there's nae ease in dealing wi' quarrelseome folk. And there's Dunobg has warned the Red Rotten and John Young all his grunde-black be his cast? he's nae man's guid but a gentleman, was grudge twa gangrel puir bodies the shelter o' a waste house, and the thistles by the road-side for a bit cuddy, and the bits o' rotten birk to boil their dunghill auld wath. Weel, it was a—"but we'll see if the red cock cran not in his bonnie barn-yard ae morning before day-dawing."

"Hush! Meg, hush! hush that's no safe talk."

"What does the mean?" said Manning to Sampson, in an under tone.

"Fire-raising," answered the laconic Dominie.

"Who, or what is she, in the name of wonder?"

"Hart, flicht, witch, and gypsy," answered Sampson again.

"O true, Laird," continued Meg, during this by-talk, "it's but to the like o' you ane can open their hearts, and does this the man?" Manning and Sampson is no mair a gentleman than the blunter that's biggit the bonnie house down in the howm. But the like o' you, Laird, that's a real gentleman for sane mony hundreds of years, and never hundr' puir folk a' aff your ground as if they were mad tykes, nae o' our fowl was stir your yarn if ye had as mony capons as there's leaves on the trayting-tree.—And now some o' ye man lay down your warm, and seat yoursel' in the hour the wean's born, and I'll spae its fortune."

"Ay, but, Meg, we shall not want your assistance, for here's a student from Oxford that ken's mair better how you how to spae its fortune—he does it by the stars."

"Certainly, sir," said Manning, entering into the simple humour of his landlord, I will calculate his security according to the rule of the Triplificites, as recommended by Pythagoras, Hippocrates, Diocles, and Aviceenna. Or will I begin ab hora questionis, as Haly, Messahala, Ganehwaik, and Guido Bonatus, have recommended.

One of Sampson's great recommendations to the favour of Mr. Bertram was, that he never detected the most gross attempt at imposture, so that the Laird, whose position at Oxford was considered to be chiefly confined to what were then called bits and bane, since denominated knaves and quizzes, had the fairest possible subject of wit in the unsuspecting Dominie. It is true, he never laughed, or joined in the laugh which his own simplicity afforded—nay, it is said, he never laughed but once in his life; and on that memorable occasion his landlady miscarried, partly through surprise at the event itself, and partly from terror at the hideous grimaces which attended this unusual cackhastening. The only effect which the discovery of such impostures produced upon this saunterer, was a compensation for the slight encroachments of his conversation. The word "prodigious!" or "very facetious!" pronounced syllabically, but without moving a muscle of his own countenance.

On the present occasion, he turned a gaunt and glassy stare upon the youthful astronomer, and seemed to doubt if he rightly understood his answer to his patron.

"I am afraid, sir," said Manning, turning to wards him, "you may be one of those unhappy persons, who, their dim eyes being unable to penetrate the starry vault, and discerned through the smokes of heaven at a distance, have their hearts bars against conviction by prejudice and misprision."

"Truly," said Sampson, "I opine with Sir Isaac Newton, Kneller, and Linnell, that the peculiar scienty's mini, that the (pretended) science of astrology is altogether vain, frivolous, and unsatisfactory." And here he repised his oracular jaws.

"Really, sir," said the treoler, "I am sorry to see a gentleman of your learning and gravity labouring under such strange blindness and delusion. Will you place the brief, the modern, and, as I may say, the vernacular name of Isaac Newton, in opposition to the grave and reverend authorities of Drury, Bo-

natus, Prolomus, Holby, Exeter, Dieterick, Naiob, Harfurt, Zael, Tausticket, Agrippa, Dureutus, Magi-

Iqen, Origen, and Argol? Do not Christians and Heathens, and Jews and Gentiles, and poets and philosophers, unite in allowing the starry influences?""

"Communi error—it is a general mistake," answered the inflexible Dominic Sampson.

"Not so," said the viscount, "it is a general and well-grounded belief."

"It is the resource of cheaters, knaves, and co-zours," said Sampson.

"Abusus non facit eum nocens. The abuse of any thing does not abrogate the lawful use thereof."

During this discussion, Ellangowan was somewhat like a woodcock caught in his own springe. He turned his face alternately from the one spokesman to the other, and began, from the gravity with which Manning pled his adversary, and the learning which he displayed in the controversy, to give him credit for being half serious. As for Meg, she fixed her bewildered eyes upon the astrologer, overpowered by a jargon more mysterious than her own.

Manning pressed his advantage, and ran over all the hard words of the Dominie; Describing his munro-supplied, and which, from circumstances hereafter to be noticed, had been familiar to him in early youth.

Signs and planets, in aspects sextile, quartile, trine, conjoint or opposite; houses of heaven, with their cusps, hours, and minutes; Almucet, Almachoden, Alanibazon, Catalibazon; a thousand terms of equus, thousand and one thousand, pounds, on the unshrinking Dominie, whose stubborn incredulity bore him out against the pelting of this pitetor storm.

At length the joyful announcement that the lady had presented her husband with a fine boy, and was (or course) as well as could be expected, broke off this intercourse. Mr. Bertram hastened to the lady's apartment, Meg Merriell descended to the kitchen to secure her share of the groaning malt, and the "ken-no," and Manning, after looking at his watch, and noting, with great exactness, the hour and minute of the birth, requested, with becoming gravity, that the Dominie would conduct him to some place where he might have a view of the heavenly bodies.

The schoolmaster, without further answer, rose and threw open a door half railed with glass, which led to an old-fashioned terrace-walk, behind the modern house, communicating with the platform on

* The groaning malt mentioned in the text was the ale brewed for the purpose of being drunk after the lady or gentleman's safe delivery. The beer was a more stringent service, and perhaps the custom may be derived from the secret rites of the Bond Des. A large and rich cheese was made by the women of the family, with great art, and secrecy, for the benefit of the guests who were to attend at the coming minute. This was the cheese des-se, so called from the assistance of ten men (or more) supposed to be so) from all the males of the family, but especially from the head of the family. He was always, accordingly, on hand to conduct himself as if he knew of no such preparation, so as to derive the female guests to refreshments, and to make them surprised at the great entertainment which was being turned the Arse was produced; and after all had been done to satisfy their appetite, the proper accomplishment of malt, the remainder was divided among the guests, each carry-which the ruins of the ancient castle were situated. The wind had arisen, and swept before it the clouds which had formerly obscured the sky. The moon was high, and at the full, and all the lesser satellites of Jupiter and Mars, with the fixed stars, were bright. The scene which their light presented to Manning, was in the highest degree unexpected and striking.

We have observed, that in the latter part of his journey our travelers approached the sea-shore, without being aware how nearly. He now perceived that the ruins of Ellangowan castle were situated upon a promontory, or projection of rock, which formed one side of a small bay and a placed island on the sea-shore. The modern mansion was placed lower, though closely adjoining, and the ground behind it descended to the sea by a small swelling green bank, divided into lovely natural terraces, on which grew some old trees, and terminating upon the white sand. The other side of the bay, opposite to the old castle, was a sloping and varied promontory, covered chiefly with coppice, which on that favoured coast grows almost within water-mark. A fisherman's cottage peeped from among the trees. Even at this dead hour of night there were lights moving upon the shore, probably in the unceasing anagnorisis of the lugger from the Isla of Man, which was lying in the bay. On the light from the shaven door of the house being observed, a halloo from the vessel, of Ware head, was sent to the shore and answered. The lugger were on shore, and the lights instantly disappeared.

It was one hour after midnight, and the prospect around was lovely. The gray old towers of the ruin, partially concealed by the bare, leafless, weather-stains of ages, and those pantingly ured with ivy, stretched along the verge of the dark rock which rose on Manning's right hand. In his front was a little lake, and a little stream running sparkling to the moonbeams, rolled successively along its surface, and dashed with a soft and murmuring ripple against the silvery beach. To the left the moon was reflecting in the coolness of the moonlight along ground of an undulating and varied form, and presenting those varieties of light and shade, and that interesting combination of glade and thickets, upon which the eye delights to rest, charmed with what it sees, yet curious to pierce still deeper into the intricacies of the woodland scenery. Above rolled the planets, each, by its own liquid orbit of light, distinguished from the interior or more distant stars. So strangely can imagination deceive even those whose vocation it has been excited, that Manning, while gazing upon these brilliant bodies, was seized with the idea that they had sent Him a message from the stars, a message of love and kindness, revalued in the Ephebe, and rectified their poet the hour and moment of the nativity. Without blaring our readers with the general prognostic which judicious astrology would draw from these circumstances, in this diagram there is a signification, which pressed remarkably upon orator's attention. Mars having dignity in the twelfth house, threatened captivity, or a violent death, to the native: and Manning giving recourse to those further rules by which he pretend to ascertain the vehemence of this evil, observed from the result, that the period of these circumstances was on the third twenty-first year.

It was somewhat remarkable, that Manning once before met a similar case of folly, at a distance of Sophy Wallou, on the road from London to the north, when he was attached, and that a similar conjunct planetary influence threatened her with death; and, prison, in her thirty-ninth year. She was this time only twenty, so that, according to the scheme of both cases, the same year thrashed her with the same misfortune that was predicted to the nation in eighteen hundred and forty-four; whom that night had recency to the world. Struck with the results, Manning repeated his calculations; and the events predicted, until, at the same month, and day of the month, seem signed as the period of peril to be.

It will be readily believed, that, in such a case, we lay no weight whatever upon pretted information thus conveyed. But it often happens, such as our natural love for the marvellous, that we willingly contribute our own efforts to bring forth better judgments. Whether the coincidence which I have been led, through repeated operation of these obscure influences, which sometimes happen against all ordinary calculations; or whether Manningering, bewildered amid the archaic labyrinth and technical jargon of all ages, has innumerable times followed the same clue to guide him out of the maze; or whether his imagination, seduced by some point of apparent resemblance, lent its aid to make the similitude between the two operations more of exact truth than it might otherwise have been, it is impossible to guess; but the impression upon his mind, that the results exactly corresponded, was vividly and indelibly strong.

He could not help feeling two instants a conviction so singular and unexpected. "Does the devil mingle in the dance, to avenge himself for our trifling with an art said to be of magical origin? Or is it possible, as Bacon and Sir Thomas Browne admit, that there is some truth in a sober and regulated astrology, and that the influence of the stars is not to be denied, though the due application of it, by the ignorance of the regular ascet, led from the heavens as greatly as it could be suspected?"—A moment's consideration of the subject induced him to dismiss this opinion as fantastical, and only sanctioned by those learned men, who have not the universal prejudices of their age, or because they themselves were not altogether freed from the contagious influence of a prevailing superstition. Yet the result of the research that he had left so pleasing an impression on his mind, that, like Prosper, he mentally relinquished his art, and resolved, neither in jest nor earnest ever again to practise j sympathetic astrology.

He hesitated a good deal what he should say to the Lord of Ellangowan, concerning the futility of his first-born; and, at length, resolved plainly to tell him. This he did the very next day, at the same time acquainting him with the futility of the rules of art on which he had proceeded. With this resolution he walked out upon the terrace.

If the view of the scene around Ellangowan had been pleasing by moonlight, it lost none of its beauty by the light of the morning sun. The land, even in the month of November, smiled under its influence. A smile, however, but a smile, led from the terrace to the neighbouring eminence, and conducted Manningering to the front of the old castle. It consisted of two massive round towers, projecting, deeply and darkly, at equal distances from a less fine wall which united them, and thus protecting the main entrance, that opened through a lofty arch in the centre of the curtain, into the inner court of the castle. The area of the court, in front of the gateway, and the portal showed the spaces arranged by the architect for lowering the portcullises, and raising the drawbridge. A rude farm-gate, made of young fir-trees nailed together, now formed the only safeguard of this once formidable entrance. The escarpment in front of the castle commanded a noble prospect.

The dreary scene of desolation, through which Manningering's road had lain on the preceding evening, was excluded from the view by some rising ground, and the landscape showed a pleasing alternation of woods and dale, intersected by a river, which was in some places visible, and hidden in others, where it rolled between deep and wooded banks. The spire of a church, and the appearance of some houses, indicated the situation of a village at the place where the stream had its junction with the ocean. The vales seemed well cultivated, the little enclosures into which they were divided skirted the bottom of the hill, so that the eye could only trace the winding hedge-rows a little way up the ascent. Above these were green pastures, tenanted chiefly by herds of black cattle, then the staple commodity of the country, lowing, and forming an impressive ornament to the landscape. The remoter hills were of a stern character, and, at still greater distance, swelled into mountains of dark heath, bordering the horizon with a screen which gave a defined and limited boundary to the cultivated country, and added, at the same time, the pleasing idea, that it was sequestered and solitary. The sea coast, which Manningering noticed not of these singularities, looked like an easy guide to him out of the maze; or whether his imagination, seduced by some point of apparent resemblance, lent its aid to make the similitude between the two operations more of exact truth than it might otherwise have been, it is impossible to guess; but the impression upon his mind, that the results exactly corresponded, was vividly and indelibly strong.

make himself master of the exact words of her song; afterwards attempted the following paraphrase of what, from a few intelligible phrases, he concluded to be its purport:

Twist ye, twice ye! even so Mingle studies of joy and we,
Hope, and fear, and peace, and strife,
Still the thread of human life.

While the mystical twist is spinning,
And the infant's life beginning,
Birdly seen through twilight winging,
Lo! what varied shapes attending Passions wild, and Polly's rain;
Pleasures soon exchanged for pain
Doubt, and jealousy, and fear,
In the magic dance appear.

Now they was, and now they dwindled,
And now they grew, and now they dwindled.

Mingled human bliss and woe.

Bere our translator, or rather our free imitator, had arranged those stanzas in his head, and while he was yet hammering out a rhyme for duidle, the task of the ably was accomplished, or her wool was expended. She took the spindle, now charged with her laborious product, measured the wool, and cast it, by casting it over her elbow, and bringing each loop round between her forefinger and thumb. When she had measured it out, she merrierd herself—"A hat, king, kid, and a new coat before this month is gone, and ten, and but this broke, and then to cope, H. C. to unite, he'll be a lucky man if he win through with it."

Our hero was about to speak to the prophetess, when the voice of the ably rang out: "{Miss, Miss Murtle!—Gipsy—hag—and thousands more."

"I am coming, I am coming, Captain," answered Miss; and in a moment or two the impatient commander whom she addressed made his appearance from the broken part of the ruins.

He was apparently a small man, rather under the middle size, and with a countenance bronzed by a thousand conflicts with the north-east wind. His frame was prodigiously muscular, strong, and thickset; so that it seemed as if a man of much greater height would have been an inadequate match in any close personal conflict. He was hard-favoured, and, which was worse, his face bore nothing of the inquisitive, the careless frown, the pitty and vacant curiosity which so often follow on their own merits, perhaps as much as any others, contribute to the high popularity of our seamen, and the general good inclination which our society expresses towards them. The look of the man was one of那, which excite reverence, and perhaps rather humble pacific mendicant in their presence; and neither respect, nor a sense of humiliation, are feelings easily combined with a familiar fondness towards those who inspire them. But the boyish frolics, the exulting high spirits, the unrelenting mirth of a sailor, when enjoying himself on shore, temper the more formidable parts of his character. There was nothing like these in this man's face; on the contrary, a surly and even savage scowl appeared to darken features which would have been harrow and unpleasant to be any expression or modification. "Where are you, Mother Deivyson?" he said, with somewhat of a foreign accent, though speaking perfectly good English. "Donner and blitzen! we have been staying this half hour, and the time is going and the voyage, and be cursed to ye for a hag of Satan!"

At this moment he noticed Manneering, who, from the position which he had taken to watch Miss Murtle's incantations, had the appearance of some one who was concealing himself, being half hidden by the utters behind which he stood. The Captain, for such he styled himself, made a sudden and startled pause, and thrust his right-hand into the bosom of his jacket and waistcoat, as if to draw some weapon, "What cheer, brother? you seen on the outlook, eh?"

Manneering, somewhat struck by the man's sanguine and insolent tone of voice, had made any answer, and waited for his raft to emerge from her vault and joined the stranger. He questioned her in an looking at Manneering—"A shark alongside."

She answered in the same tone of voice, and with the same language—"Shall we go?"

"The fellow's cloudy visage cleared up. of the morning to you, sir; I find you are my friend Mr. Bertram—l'm beg pardon, but for another man—Whatis and show them a gentry cove of the fellow's cloudy visage cleared up. of the morning to you, sir; I find you are my friend Mr. Bertram—l'm beg pardon, but for another man—Whatis and show them a gentry cove of Manneering, replied, "And you, sir, I'm the master of that vessel in the bay?"

"Ay, ay, sir; I am Captain Dirk Hatter Yungfrau Hagenaslopen, well known on Man—next cognizant, the Keys, and the Muckin face, if you want any—Right coo bumped ashore a hundred kugs last night."

"Really, sir, I am only a traveller, a sort of occasion for anything the kind of thing."

Why, then, good morning to you, it must be minding—"You know no of that?—you shall have a pouch-full of Dirk Hatterack knows how to be civil."

There was a mixture of impudence, hard suspiciously from about that scene, and the whole of the room was dismally disgusting. His manners were then thin, conscious of the suspicion attending him, yet aiming to bear it down by the air of careless and hard familiarity. Manneering determined his proffered civilities; and after a while, Hatterack retired with the rail of the ruins from which he had fire appearance. A very narrow stretch of water to the beach, intended probably for the cook of the garrison during a siege. By this couple, equally amiable in appearance, as able by profession, descended a small convict embarked in a small boat who appeared to wait for him, and then mained on the shore, reciting or singing, culling with great vehemence.

CHAPTER V.

You have fed upon my seigneur's,
Disparce from my side, and follow me,
From mine own windows turn my house-hold,
Razed out my impress, leave me to mine,
Have me for a dream's, and my soul to God,
To show the world I am a gentleman.

When the boat which carried the wort on board his vessel had accomplished the sail, he began to ascend, and the ship was to be seen.

"Ay, ay," said the Laird, who had something for some time, and now joined him;—go—there go the free-traders—the go on Hatterack, and the Yungfrau Hagenaslopen, half Dutchman, half devil, no spirit, up main sail, top and top-gallant and sky-scrapers, and away—follow me for a fellow, Mr. Manneering, is the terror of all and custom-house cruisers; they can make him of him; they drubs them, or he dances till speaking at excess, I came to bring you to you and you shall have some tea, that's."

Manneering, by this time, was aware thought strangely on to another incantation of worthy Mr. Bertram's ideas,

"Like orient pearls at random strung; and therefor before the current of his assos drifted further from the point he had left, him back by some inquiry about Dirk Hatterack's meaning—Stop your unchristian language— I am from the house below."

"A drum of liquor.
"O he's a—a—guds sort of blackguard fellow enough—somebody cares to trouble him—smugger, when his guns are in ballast—privacy or pyrate fellow—way and then others. He has done more mischief to the folk than any rogue that ever came out of Ramsay."

"But, my good sir, such being his character, I wonder he has any protection and encouragement on this coast."

"Why, Mr. Manning, people must have brandy and tea, and there's none in the country but what comes from the sea, and that's tempests and other—maybe a keg or two, or a dozen pounds left at your stable door, instead of a—plum lang account at Christmas from Duncan Robb, the grocer at Kipplinger, or a sum to pay and another wants ready money, or a short-dated bill. Now, Hatterricks will take wood, or he'll take bark, or he'll take barley, or he'll take just what's convenient at the time. I'll tell you a quiet story about that. There was once a laird—that's Macle of Gudgeonford—he had a great number of kain hens—that's hens that the tenant pays to the landlord—a sort of rent in kind. He had a few more at his kail—one Miss Finister went up there three that were to be seen only last week, but they had twelve bowa, or twenty, or all the standard. Indeed, her Miss Finister—that's him. Miss Finister (meant, of course, Mr. Manning; that's ow'r true) and speaking of that, let us live in the meanwhile, for here's breakfast on the table, and the Dominie ready to say the grace."

Tereupon Mr. Manning pronounced a benediction, that exceeded in length any speech which Manning had yet heard him utter. The tea, which of course belonged to the noble Captain Hatterricks's table, was produced elsewhere. Mr. Manning hinted, with due delicacy, at the risk of encouraging such desperate characters: "Were it but in justice to the revenue, I should have supposed—"

Mr. Manning never embraced a general or abstract idea, and his notion of the revenue was personified in the commissioners, surveyors, comptrollers, and riding officers, whom he happened to know—"the revenue-lads can look sharp enough out for themselves; no one needs to help them—and they have a soldiers to assist them besides—and as to justice—you'll be surprised to hear it, Mr. Manning—but I am not a justice of peace!"

Manning assumed the expected look of surprise, but thought within himself that the worshipful bench suffered no great deprivation from wanting the assistance of his gentle laird and land. Mr. Manning had now hit upon one of the few subjects on which he felt sore, and went on with some energy.

"No, sir, the name of Godfrey Bertram of Ellamornie, over the revenue lands!—for Mr. Bertram has never ran carte in the country that has a plough-gate of land, but what he must ride to quarter sessions, and write J. P. after his name. I ken fu' well whom I am obliged to—Sir Thomas Kittlecarr, as good as to tell me he would sit in my kirties, if he had not my interest at the last election; and because I chose to go with my own blood and third cousin, the Laird of Ballinderry, they keep me off the roll of freeloaders! and now there comes a new nomination of justices, and I am left out! And whereas they pretend it was because I let David Mac-Guffog, the constable, draw the money out of the bank and his ain gate, as if I had been a noce o' wax, it's a main untruth; for I granted but seven warrants in my life, and the Dominie wrote every one of them, and if it had not been that unlucky business of Sandy MacGrathin's, that the constables should have kept it twa or three days up yonder at the auld castle, just till they could get a witness to send him to the county jail—and then there was a forfet, none was in kilt, Thomas wants very well—it was just sie and sic like about the seat in the kirk o' Kilnigurde—was I not entitled to have the front gallery facing the minister's seat?—and then we come to the son of Deacon MacCorske, the Dumfriesweaver?

Manning expressed his acquiescence in the justice of these various complaints.

"And then, Mr. Manning, there was the story about the road, and the faid-lide—I kon Sir Thomas was behind there, and I said plainly to the clerk to the trustees, 'Why! and you take it as they like. Would any gentlemen, or set of gentlemen, go and drive a road right through the corner of a faid-lide, and take away, as my agent observed it, the two roads of good inland pasture?—And there was the story about choosing the collector of the cens'—"

Certainly, sir, it is hard you should meet with any neglect in your business, and I account judge from the extent of their residence, your ancestors must have made a very important figure."

"Very true, Mr. Manning—I am a plain man, and do not own any of these things; and I must needs say, I have little memory for them; but I wish ye could have heard my father's stories about the auld sights of the Mac-Dingwawes—that's the Bertrams that now is—er Theatre, and the Highlanders, that came here in their beringhs from Ilay and Cantray—and how they went to the Holy Land—that is, to Jerusalem and Jericho, wi' a clan at their heels—they had better have gone to Jamaica, like the Thomas Kittlecourt's uncle—and how they brought home relics, like those that Catholics have, and a flag that's up yonder in the garret—if they had been on the monscaats of Mecca, and they had, they would have been better for the estate at this day—but there's little comparison between the auld keep at Kittlecourt and the castle o' Ellamornie—I doubt if the auld keep's worth as much as a decent dinner—But I'll not trouble Mr. Manning; ye're no eating your meat; allow me to recommend some of the kipper—it wis John Hay that catch it, Saturday was three weeks, down at the street, out of the famous word."

The Laird, whose indignation had for some time kept him pretty steady to one topic, now launched forth into his usual roving style of conversation, which gave him much advantage, for the disadvantages attending the situation, which, an hour before, he had thought worthy of so much envy. Here was a country gentleman, whose most estimable quality seemed his perfect good nature, steadily fretting himself and murmuring against others, for causes which, compared with any real evil in life, must weigh like dust in the balance. But such is the equal distribution of Providence. To those who lie out of the road of great afflictions, are assigned petty vexations, which answer all the purpose of disturbing their serenity; and every reader must have observed, that a little scepticism in this philosophy can render country gentlemen insensible to the grievances which occur at elections, quarter sessions, and meetings of trustees.

Curious to know how the gentlemen of the country, Manning took the advantage of a pause in good Mr. Bertram's string of stories, to inquire what Captain Hatterrick so earnestly wanted with the gipsy woman.

"O, to bless his ship, I suppose. You must know, Mr. Manning, that these free-traders, whom the law calls smugglers, having no religion, make it all up in superstition; and they have an many spells, and charms, and nonsense."

"Vanity and waur!" said the Dominie: "it's a trafficking with the Evil One. Spells, prayers, and charms are his device—choice arrows out of Apollonius's quiver."

"Hold your peace, Dominie—we're speaking for ever—(by the way they were the first words that our man had uttered that morning, excepting that he said grace, and returned thanks)—Mr. Manning cannot get in a word for ye!—and so Mr. Manning, talking of astronomy and spells, and those sorts of matters, he couldn't consider what we were speaking about last night?"

"I begin to think, Mr. Bertram, with your worthy friend here, that I have been rather jesting with those tools; and if this man, the most extravagant and impudent fellow in the world, can put faith in the predictions of astrology, yet as it has sometimes happened that inquires upon futurity, undertaken in jest, have in their results produced serious and unpleasant effects both wise and simple.

It was easy to see that this evasive answer only rendered the Laird's curiosity more unceasing. He Mannering, however, was determined in his own mind, not to expose the infant to the inconveniences which might have arisen from his being supposed the object of evil prediction. He therefore delivered the paper into Mr. Herron's hand, and, entrusting it to his care, was careful to keep it for five years with the seal unbroken, until the month of November was exp After that date had arrived, he sent for him to liberty to examine the writing, trusting that the first fatal period being then safely overpast, no credit would be paid to its further contents. This Mr. Bertram was content to promise, and Mannering, to ensure his fidelity, handed at mirtoun's house which would certainly take place if his instructions were neglected. The rest of the day, which Mannering, by Mr. Bertram's invitation, spent at Ellangowan, passed over without any thing remarkable; and on the morning of that which followed, the traveller mounted his palfrey, had a courteous acquit to his hospitable landlord, and to his clerical attendant, repeated his good wishes for the prosperous issue of the plans he had laid, and his head towards England, disappeared from the sight of the inmates of Ellangowan. He must also disapprove from that of our readers, for it is to another, and later period of his life, that the present narrative relates.

Nest, the Journal.
In fair round fields, with good espalier'd borders, with eyes severe, and heart of formal cut, Patter's spasmodic instances.
And so he plays his part.

When Mrs. Bertram of Ellangowan was able to hear the news of what had passed during her confusion, her first emotion was surprise. She could imagine no reason for all these nervous agitations, possessing respecting the handsome young student from Oxford, who had told such a fortune by the stars to the young Laird, "blessings on his dainty face." The form, accent, and manners, of the stranger, were expatiated upon. His horse, bridle, saddle, and stirrups, did not remain unnoticed. All this made a great impression upon the mind of Mrs. Bertram, for the good lady had no small store of super-sition.

Her first employment when she became capable of a little work, was to make a small velvet bag for the senator of the college, and to frame a mask from her husband. Her fingers stilled to break the seal, but credibility proved stronger than curiosity; and she had the firmness to inclose it, in all its integrity, within two slips of paper, which she sewed round it, to prevent its being chafed. The whole was then put into the velvet bag afresh, and hung as a charm round the neck of the infant, where his mother resolved it should remain until the period for the legiti-mate satisfaction of her curiosity should arrive.

The father also resolved to do his part by the child, in securing him a good education; and with the view that it should commence with the first dawnings of reason. Donnie Sampson was highly induced by the offer of his public profession of parson-master, to make his constant residence at the Place, and, in consideration of a sum not quite equal to the whole of the expenses, he undertook to teach the child to communicate to the future Laird of Ellangowan all the condition which he had, and all the grace and accomplishments which—had he not indeed, which he had never discovered that he was blessed.
In this arrangement, the Laird found also his private advantage: securing the constant benefit of a patient auditor, to whom he told his stories when they were exchangeable; and hence he could break a jest while he had company.

About four years after this time, a great commotion took place in the county where Ellangowan is situated.

Those who watched the signs of the times, had been of opinion that a change of ministry was about to take place; and, at length, after a proportion of hope, fears, and delays, rumours to the effect of a change in the creditor, good authority, and bad authority, and no subsequent thing, all after the day. Now was the time when the deal was dissolved, and parliament, as a consequence, was dissolved also.

Mr. Bertram, like other members of the same party, retired down to the county, and, after an indifferent reception. He was a person of the old administration; and the friends of the had already set about an active canvass in behalf of John Featherbed, Esq., who kept the best bars and inns in the place of fortune, who was a man of the same materials as himself, whose standard of wealth was Gilbert Glossin, who Beggars’ Bush.

Although the character of those gipsy tribes, which formerly inundated most of the nations of Europe, and which in some degree still subsist among them as a distinct people, is generally understood, the reader will please to hear a few words respecting their situation in Scotland.

It is well known that the gipsies were, at an early period, acknowledged as a separate and independent race by one of the Scottish monarchs, and that they were less favourably distinguished by a subsequent law, which rendered the character of gipsy equal, in the judicial balance, to that of common and habitual thieves, and upon that general principle. Notwithstanding the severity of this and other statutes, the fraternity preserved amid the distresses of the country, and received large accessions from among those whom famine, oppression, or the sword of war, had deprived of the ordinary means of subsistence. They lost, in a great measure, by this intermitgence, the national character of Egyptians, and became a mixed race, having lost all the silences and profligate habits of their Eastern ancestors, with a foracity which they probably borrowed from the men of the north who joined their society. They travelled in different bands under the rules of ancient custom, which each tribe was confined to its own district. The slightest invasion of the precincts which had been assigned to another tribe produced desperate skirmishes, in which there was often much blood shed.

The patriotic Fletcher of Saltoun drew a picture of those banditti about a century ago, which my readers will pursue with amusement.

"There are at this day in Scotland (besides a great many poor families very meanly provided for by the church-boxes, with others, who, by living on bread, fall into various diseases) two hundred thousand people: and of these two hundred thousand people, not only no way advantageous, but a very grievous burden to so poor a country. And though the number of them be perhaps double to what it was formerly, by reason of this present great distress, yet in all times there have been about one hundred thousand of these vagabonds, who have lived without any regard or subversion either to the laws of the land, or even to those of God, having nothing but a name among them, which no magistrate could ever discover, or be informed, which way one in a hundred of these wretches died, or that ever they were baptized. Many murders have been discovered and covered among them, and the unspeakable oppression to poor tenants, (who, if they give not bread, or some kind of provision, to perhaps forty such villains in one day, are sure to be chastised with the most cruel blows and death,) has made their houses distant from any neighbourhood. In short, a great many thousands of them meet every year to the..."
mountains, where they feast and riot for many days; and at country weddings, markets, burials, and other like public occasions, they are to be seen, both on horseback and on foot, with red caps on their heads, an indifferent sort of cake and ale, and other refreshments, a definition for a drunkard, cursing, blasphemying, and fighting together.

Notwithstanding the deplorable picture presented in this extract, and which Fletcher himself, though the great poet andInteresting friend of many antiquarians, saw in a letter of converting than by introducing a system of domestic slavery, the progress of time, and increase both of the means of life and of the power of government, saw that the sins of many former evil with far more boundless. The tribe of gipsies, jockies, or carnds—for by all these denominations such banditti were known—became few in number, and many, however, a sufficient number remained to give occasional alarm and constant vexation. Some rude handicrafts were entirely resided to these itinerants, particularly the making of horse and cart spoons, and the whole mystery of the tinker. To these they added a petty trade in the coarse sorts of earthenware. Such were their ostensible means of livelihood, and the simple life of a banditti, which they occasionally occupied and considered as their standing camp, and in the vicinity of which they generally abstained from depredation. They had their own food and accommodations, which were occasionally useful to them. Many cultivated music with success; and the favourite fiddler or piper of a district was often to be found in a gipsy town. They understood all out-of-door sports, and were generally spent in gaming and foxhunting. They bred the best and boldest terriers, and sometimes had good pointers for sale. In winter, when the women told fortunes, the men showed tricks of legerdemain; and these accomplishments often helped to while away a weary or stormy evening in the circle of the 'farmer's ha.' The wildness of their character, and the indomitable pride with which they defended their honor, were often the cause, which was not diminished by the consideration, that these strollers were a vindictive race, and were restrained by no check, either of fear or conscience, from taking desperate vengeance upon those who had offended them. These tribes were, in short, the Parias of Scotland, living like wild Indians among European settlers, and, like them, judged of rather by their own customs, heathen opinions, than as if they had been members of the civilized part of the community. Some of these have, however, remained, chiefly in such situations as afford a ready escape either into a wild wilderness or into another country. Nor are the features of their character much softened. Their numbers, however, are so greatly diminished, that, instead of one hundred thousand, as calculated by the most creditable administration, there should be perhaps no more than one hundred and fifty collect above five hundred throughout all Scotland.

A tribe of these itinerants, to whom Meg Merriles appertained, had long been as stationaries as their habits permitted, in a glen upon the estate of Ellangowan. They had there erected a few huts, which they denominated their city of refuge, and where, when absent on excursions, they harboured unmolested, as the crimes which rested in the old abbey were there. They had been long occupiers, that they were considered in some degree as proprietors of the wreathed shielings which they inhabited. This protection they were said anciently to have re- paid, by service to the laird in war, or, more frequently, by infesting or plundering the lands of those neighbouring baronies, with whom he chanced to be at feud. Lately, their services were of a more pacific nature. The women spun mittens for the laird, and knitted bonnet-hose for the laird, which were annually presented at Christmas with great form. The aged sisters were respected beds of married, and the cradle of the heir when born. The men repaired her ladyship's crack'd china, and assisted the laird in his sporting parties, wormed his dog, and taught his horse to obey. The little children gathered nuts in the woods, and cranberries in the moors, and mushrooms on the pastures, for tribute to the place. These acts of charity, and acknowledgments of dependance, were returned to graze by the road-side, against the provision of the turnpike acts; that the constable began to make curious inquiries into their mode of gaining a livelihood, and expressed his surprise that the men should sleep in the hovels all day, and be abroad the greater part of the night.

When matters came to this point, the gipsies, without a word, or the usual manner of mitting up, or asking for charity, were in the act of taking off their hats when Ellangowan's hen-roosts were plundered, their linen stolen from the lines or bleeding ground, his fishings poached, his dogs kidnapped, his growing trees cut or broken, his hedges trampled down, and some of the dogs killed. This was evidently for the mischief of the sake. On the other hand, warrants went forth, without mercy, to pursue, search for, take, and apprehend; and, notwithstanding their desperate sallies out of the district, these无法ables were not able to escape conviction. One, a stout young fellow, who sometimes had gone to sea a-fishing, was handed over to the Captain of the impress service at D——; two of the remaining and most likely children that ever made a sword and grenadier's cap of rushes, now approached his fifth revolving birth-day. A hand-load of disposition, which early developed itself, had led to the principle of his native wood, so that he had quitted with every patch of low ground and dingle around Ellangowan, and could tell in his broken language upon what baulks grew the best mast for ships, and what copse had the ripest nuts. He repeated terrified his attendants by clambering about the ruins of the old castle, and had more than once made a stolen excursion as far as the gypsy hamlet.

On these occasions he was brought back by Meg Merricles, who, though she could not be prevailed upon to enter the Place of Ellangowan after her nephew had been given up to the pressgang, did not apparently extend her resentment to the child. On the contrary, she often contrived to waylay him in his walks, sing him a gipsy song, give him a ride upon her jackass, and thrust into his pocket a piece of gingerbread. She was the woman's ancient attachment to the family, repelled and checked in every other direction, seemed to relieve in having some object on which it could yet repose and expand itself. She prophesied a hundred times, that young Mr. Harry would be the pride of the family, and there hadn't been a sib sprout free the auld kail since the death of Arthur Macl-Dingwaize, that was killed in the battle of the Bloody Bow, for the present stick, it was good for nothing but firewood.

On one occasion, when the child was ill, she lay all night below the window, chanting a rhyme which she had learned in her infancy, and could not be prevailed upon to enter the house, nor to leave the station she had chosen, till she was informed that the crisis was over.

The affection of these women became matter of suspicion to the Laird, who was never hasty in suspecting evil, but to his wife, who had indifferent health and poor spirits. She was now far advanced in a second pregnancy, and, as she could not walk abroad herself, and the woman who attended upon Harry was young and thoughtful, she prayed the Domingie of the Laird's household, and the lady, to watch the boy in his rambles, when he should not be otherwise accompanied. The Domingie loved his young charge, and was enraptured with his own success, but having his own family to mind, and being unprovided with means to follow his young ward, he was at a loss as to spell words of three syllables. The idea of this early proving of eminence being carried off by the gipsies, like a second Adam Smith, was not to be tolerated; and, accordingly, through the charge was contrary to all his habits of life, he readily undertook it, and might be seen walking about with a mathematical problem in his head, and his eye upon a child of five years old, whose rambles led him into a hundred awkward situations. Twice was the Domingie chased by a cross-grained cow, once he fell into the brook crossing at the stepping-stones, and another time he fell from a stag without, by not being heedful of hostilities on either side.

Scenes of Insecurity.

In tracing the rise and progress of the Scottish Maroon war, we must not omit to mention that years had rolled on, and that little Harry Bertram, one of the bravest and most likely children that ever made a sword and grenadier's cap of rushes, now approached his fifth revolving birth-day. A hand-load of disposition, which early developed itself, had led to the principle of his native wood, so that he had quitted with every patch of low ground and dingle around Ellangowan, and could tell in his broken language upon what baulks grew the best mast for ships, and what copse had the ripest nuts. He repeated terrified his attendants by clambering about the ruins of the old castle, and had more than once made a stolen excursion as far as the gypsy hamlet.

On these occasions he was brought back by Meg Merricles, who, though she could not be prevailed upon to enter the Place of Ellangowan after her nephew had been given up to the pressgang, did not apparently extend her resentment to the child. On the contrary, she often contrived to waylay him in his walks, sing him a gipsy song, give him a ride upon her jackass, and thrust into his pocket a piece of gingerbread. She was the woman's ancient attachment to the family, repelled and checked in every other direction, seemed to relieve in having some object on which it could yet repose and expand itself. She prophesied a hundred times, that young Mr. Harry would be the pride of the family, and there hadn't been a sib sprout free the auld kail since the death of Arthur Macl-Dingwaize, that was killed in the battle of the Bloody Bow, for the present stick, it was good for nothing but firewood.

On one occasion, when the child was ill, she lay all night below the window, chanting a rhyme which she had learned in her infancy, and could not be prevailed upon to enter the house, nor to leave the station she had chosen, till she was informed that the crisis was over.

The affection of these women became matter of suspicion to the Laird, who was never hasty in suspecting evil, but to his wife, who had indifferent health and poor spirits. She was now far advanced in a second pregnancy, and, as she could not walk abroad herself, and the woman who attended upon Harry was young and thoughtful, she prayed the Domingie of the Laird's household, and the lady, to watch the boy in his rambles, when he should not be otherwise accompanied. The Domingie loved his young charge, and was enraptured with his own success, but having his own family to mind, and being unprovided with means to follow his young ward, he was at a loss as to spell words of three syllables. The idea of this early proving of eminence being carried off by the gipsies, like a second Adam Smith, was not to be tolerated; and, accordingly, through the charge was contrary to all his habits of life, he readily undertook it, and might be seen walking about with a mathematical problem in his head, and his eye upon a child of five years old, whose rambles led him into a hundred awkward situations. Twice was the Domingie chased by a cross-grained cow, once he fell into the brook crossing at the stepping-stones, and another time he fell from a stag without, by not being heedful of hostilities on either side.

The Laird, by this time, determined to make root-and-branch work with the Maroons of Demer-}

The old servants shook their heads at his proposal, and even Domingie Sampson ventured upon an indirect address to Bertram. As, however, it was couched in the oracular phrase, "Ne moratus Camerinam," neither the allusion, nor the language in which it was expressed, was capable of being understood. Mr. Bertram's address was immediately pressed and matters proceeded against the gipsies in form of law. Every door in the hamlet was closed by the ground-officer, in token of a formal warning to remove at new term. Still, however, they continued the symptoms of resistance or of compliance. At length the term-day, the fatal Martinmas, arrived, and violent measures of ejection were resorted to. 'A strong posse of peace-officers, sufficient to render all resistance vain, charged the inhabitants to depart by noon; and, as they did not obey, the officers, in terms of warrant, proceeded to unroof the cottages, and pull down the wretched huts which of late had been called the doors of ejection actually practised in some remote parts of Scotland, when a tenant proves refractory. The gipsies, for a time, beheld the work of destruction in fallen silent and inanimate; they cowered and hid their heads, and loading their asses, and making preparations for their departure. These were soon accomplished, where all had the habit of wandering Tartars; and they set forth at the journey's end, on their way to distant countries, where their patrons should neither be of the quorum, nor custodes rustorum.

Certain qualms of feeling had deterred Ellangowan from attending in person to see his ten acres expelled. He left the executive part of the business to the officers of the law, under the immediate direction of Frank Kennedy, a supervisor, or ruling-officer, belonging to the Master of the Rolls, and the latter draw a map of his intentions; to the effect that the Laird should meet the gipsy procession. Four or five men formed the advanced guard, wrapped in long loose great-coats that hid their tall slender figures, as large as elephants they looked, and concealed their wild features, dark eyes, and swarthy faces. Two of them carried long fowling pieces, one wore a broadsword without a scabbard, and all had the Highland dirk, though they did not wear that weapon in her mode of adjusting it, something of a forensic costume, artfully adopted, perhaps for the purpose of advertising an effect of her skills and pretensions, or perhaps from some traditional notions respecting the dress of her ancestors. On this occasion she had a tattered old pair of red cotton cloth rolled about her head in the form of a turban, from beneath which her dark eyes flashed with uncommon lustre. Her long and tangled black hair fell in all-locks from the folds of this singular attire. Her face was of a blood-red silk in frenzy, and she stretched out, in her right hand, a sable bough, which seemed just pulled.

I'll be d—d, said the groom, if she has not been cuttin' the young lady of Ellangowan.

—The Laird made no answer, but continued to look at the figure which was thus perched above his path.

"Ride your ways," said the groom, "ride your ways, Laird of Ellangowan—ride your ways, Godfrey Bertram!—This day have ye quenched seven smoking heart's—see if the fire in your ain perburn burn the blyther for that. GUY MANNERING.

A good song, he was admitted to the occasional society of the gentlemen of the country, and was a member of most of the clubs in the set, and a regular client at the Queen's, at which he was particularly expert.

At Ellangowan, Kennedy was a frequent and always an acceptable guest. His vivacity relieved Mr. Bertram's gloom, and the latter gained in his light for the taxes, which it cost him to support a detailed communication of ideas; while the darig and dangerous expedition which he had undertaken in the discharge of his duties, formed excellent conversation. To all these revenue adventures did the Laird of Ellangowan seriously incline, and the amusement which he derived from Kennedy's society, forms an excellent reason why that gentleman was a frequent and a considerable visitor in the execution of his invidious and hazardous duty.

"Frank Kennedy," he said, "was a gentleman, though on the wrong side of the blanket—he was connected with the family of Ellangowan through the house of Glenubble. The last Laird of Glenubble would have brought the estate into the Ellangowan line; but happening to go to Harriet's, he met with Miss Jean Hasdawy—at the by, the Green Dragon at Harriet's is the best house of the town—but for Frank Kennedy, he's in one sense a gentleman born, and it's a shame not to support him and the tax collector's friend.

After this league had taken place between judgment and execution, it chanced that Captain Dirk Hatterracker had landed a cargo of spirits, and other contraband goods, on the coast of the Highlands, and enlisting in the indifference with which the Law had formerly regarded similar infractions of the law, he was neither very anxious to conceal nor to expose the transaction. The consequence was, that Mr. Frank Kennedy, armed with a warrant from Ellangowan, and supported by some of the Laird's men, who knew the country, and by a party of military men, down upon the 'boat, from Inverness, and after a desperate affray, in which several wounds were given and received, succeeded in capturing the brandy and incendiary articles, and bringing them off in triumph to the next custom-house. Dirk Hatterrack, in Dutch, German, and English, a deep and full revenge, both against the gauger and his abettors; and all who knew him thought it likely he would keep his word.

A few days after the departure of the gipsy tribe, Mr. Bertram asked his lady one morning at breakfast, whether this was not little Harry's birthday?

"Yes, exactly; the 11th day," answered the lady; "so we may look into the English gentleman's paper."

Mr. Bertram liked to see his authority in effect, and not to dispute it. The last time I was at quarter sessions, the sheriff told us, that dies—what the law in short, that it is not understood partly, but that a term-day is not begun till it's ended."

That sounds like nonsense, my dear," said the lady.

"May be so, my dear; but it may be very good law for that. I am sure, speaking of term-days, I wish, as Frank Kennedy says, that Whitaunday would kill Martinmas, and be hanged for the murder—for there I have got a letter about that interest of Jenny Cairne's, and it is a tenant's been at the Place yet wi' a boddie of paper for me, and I will not till Candelans—" said Frank Kennedy, I dare say he'll be here the day, for he was away round to Wigton to warn a king's slip that's lying in the bay about Dirk Hatterracker's being on the coast again, and he'll be back the day; so we'll have a bottle of claret, and drink little Harry's health.

"I wish," said the lady, "Frank Kennedy would come back in time. What needs he make him so busy than other folk? Cannot he sing his songs, and take his drink, and draw his salary, like a proper social man, honest man, that never fetches any trouble? A man of his age, honest, to be sure, but the thing belongs not to himself."

"Young folk will do it," said Frank Kennedy, "when they want to get the gallon punchbowl, and plenty of lemons. I'll stand for the French article by the time I come back, and we'll drink the young Laird's health. I think it will suit that is the time the Collector's yawn. So saying, he mounted his horse, and galloped off.

About a mile from the house, and upon the verge of the wood, he appeared, as we have said, to be on horseback, and in the monitory terminating in the cape called the Poa —
GUY MANNERING.

Warroch, Kennedy me: young Harry Bertram, attended by his tutor, Dominic Sampson. He had often procured the child a ride upon his galloway; and, from singing, dancing, and playing Punch for him, had, in time, made him quite a particular favourite. He no sooner came scampering up the path, than the boy loudly claimed his promise; and Kennedy, who saw no risk in indulging him, and wished to tease the dominie, in whose case he read a remonstrance, caught up Harry from the ground, placed him before him, and continued his route; Sampson's "Par- vannture; Master Kennedy;"—being lost in the chatter of his horse's feet. The pedagogue hesitated a moment whether he should go after them; but Kennedy being a person in full confidence of the family, and with whom he himself had no delight in associating, being about to address unto profane and scurrilous jests," he continued his own walk at his own pace, till he reached the Place of Ellangowan.

The spectators from the ruined walls of the castle were still watching the sloop of war, which, at length, but not without the loss of considerable time, recovered sea-room enough to weather the Point of War- rooch, and to bring her into a station of alarm, especially in so dark a night. Some time afterwards the discharges of several cannon were heard at a distance, and, after an interval, a still louder explosion, as of a vessel blazing with fire and brimstone, appeared through the mists and mingled with the blue sky. All then separated on their different occasions, auguring variously upon the fate of the smuggler, but the majority insisting that it was not possible but that something of Kennedy got to the bottom.

"It is near our dinner-time, my dear," said Mrs. Bertram to her husband, "will it be long before Mr. Kennedy comes back?"

"I expect him ever my moment, my dear," said the Laird; "perhaps he is bringing some of the officers of the ship with him."

"Mr. Mr. Bertram! why did not ye teli me this before, that we might not have the large round table—and then, they're a t'ired o' saut meat, and, to tell you the plain truth, a rump o'beef is the best part of your dinner—and then I had put on another gown, and ye wadnae been the want o' a clean neck-cloth yourself. But ye delight in surpris- ing and hurried one;—I am sure I am no to haul out for ever against this sort of goings-on. But when folk's missed, then they are mortified."

"Pshaw, pshaw! deuce take the beef, and the gown, and the table, and the neck-cloth!—we shall do all right. That's the Dervent John—(of the Dervent who was busy about the table)—where's the Dominic and little Harry?"

"Mr. Sampson's been at hame these two hours and a half, but I dinna think Mr. Harry came hame with him."

"Not come hame wi' him?" said the lady; "desire Mr. Sampson to step this way directly." "Mr. Sampson," said she, upon her entrance, "is it not the most extraordinary thing in this world wide, that you, who are free upon bed, board, and washing—and twelve pounds stirling a year, just to look after that boy, should let him out of your sight for two or three hours?"

Sampson made a bow of humble acknowledgment at each pause which the angry lady made in her enumeration of the advantages of his situation, in order to give more weight to her remonstrance, and then, in words which we will not do him the injustice to impute, told how Mr. Francis Kennedy had assumed spontaneously the charge of Master Har- don, in despite of his remonstrances in the contrary.

I am very little obliged to Mr. Francis Kennedy for his care of the lady, perversely; "suppose he lets the boy drop from his charge this day?" or suppose one of the cannons comes ashore and kills him?—or suppose—" said she, "But then my dear," said Ellangowan, "what is much more likely than any thing else, that they have gone aboard the sloop or the prize, and are come round the Point with the tide?"

"And then they may be drowned," said the lady. "Verily," said Sampson, "I thought Mr. Kennet had returned an hour since—Of a surely I dared hear his horse's feet."

"That's the way, with a broad grin," "as Grizzle chasing the humble-cow* out of the close."

Sampson coloured up to the eyes—not at the reply taunt, which he would never have discovered or resented if he had but seen ideas which over- rode his own mind. "I have been in an error", he said; "of a surely I should have tarried for the bale."

So saying, he snatched his bone-headed can and hat, and hurried away towards Warrooch, yet faster than he was ever known to walk before after.

The Laird sat some time, debating the rest with the lady. At length he saw the sloop of war again make her appearance; but without approaching the shore, she stood away to the westward all her sails set, and was soon out of sight. The* state of timorous and fretful apprehension was so habitual, that her fears went for nothing with his lord and master; but an appearance of disturbance and anxiety among the servants now excited him. It was not surprising to tell to him, and told in private that Mr. Kennedy's horse was come to the stable door alone, with the saddle thrown round below its belly, and the reins of the bridle to the black and the halter to the tree, and mingled with the blue sky. All then separated on their different occasions, auguring variously upon the fate of the smuggler, but the majority insisting that it was not possible but that something of Kennedy got to the bottom. The evening had begun to close when the prize entered the wood, and dispersed different ways a quest of the boy and his companion. The darkness of the atmosphere, and the house signs of the Veterinary wind through the naked trees, and the rustle and the withered leaves which strewed the glades, the repeated halloos of the different parties, which drew them together, in expectation of meeting by objects of their search, gave a cast of dismal subordina- tion to the scene. At length, after a minute and fruitless investigation through the wood, the searchers began to draw together into one body, and to exchange notes. The agony of the father grew beyond concealment, yet scarcely equalled the anguish of the tutor. "Was to God I had died for him!" the affectionate creature repeated, in notes of the deepest distress. They who were less interested, rushed into a tumultuous discussion of chances and possibilities. Each gave his opinion, and each was alternately awayed by the other. Some thought the object of the search had gone aboard the sloop; some that she had gone to a village at three miles' distance; some that they might have been on board the large few planks and beams of which the tide now drove ashore.

At this instant a shout was heard from the back so loud, so shrill, so piercing, so different from every sound which the woods that day had rung; and everybody hesitated a moment to believe that it was not a false- tided tidings, and tidings of dreadful import. All turned to the place, and venturing without example foot paths, which, at another time, they would have de- dicated to look at, descended towards a declivity of rock, where one boat's crew was already landed. Here, and here!—this way, for God's sake, this way the way was the road! En- gowan broke through the throng which had pressed * A cow without horns assembled at the fatal spot, and beheld the object of their terror. It was the dead body of Kennedy. At first spark had been left. It fell from the rocks, which rose above the spot on which he lay, in a perpendicular precipice of a hundred feet above the beach. The corpse was lying half in, half out of the water, the arms and stirring the clothes, had given it at some distance the appearance of motion, so that those who first discovered the body thought that life remained. But every spark had been long extinguished.

"My bairn! my bairn!" cried the distracted father, "where can he be?"—A dozen mouths were opened to communicate hopes which no one felt. Some one at that moment heard the horse's hoofs! In a moment Ellangowan had resounded the cliffs, flung himself upon the first horse he met, and rode furiously to the huts at Dernieghill. All was there dark and desolate; and as he dismounted to make more minute search, he stumbled over fragments of furniture which had been thrown out of the cottages, and the broken wood and thatch which had been pulled down by his orders. At that moment the prophecy, or anathema, of Meg Merrilies fell heavy on his mind. "You have stripped the thatch from seven cottages—see that the roof-tree of your own house stand there vacant!"

"Restorse," he cried, "restorse my bairn! bring me back my son, and all shall be forgotten and forgiven!" As he uttered these words in a sort of frenzy, his eye caught a glimmer of light from among the ruins of the cottages— it was that in which Meg Merrilies formerly resided. The light, which seemed to proceed from fire, glimmered not only through the window, but the doors and rafters of the hut where the roof had been torn off. He flew to the place; the entrance was bolted: despair gave the miserable father the strength of ten men. He forced the doors with such violence, that it gave way before the momentum of his weight and force. The cottage was empty, but bore marks of recent habitation—there was fire on the hearth, a kettle, and some preparation for food. As he eagerly gazed around for something that might confirm his hope that his child yet lived, although in the power of those strange people, a man entered the hut.

It was his old gardener. "O sir!" said the old man, "such a night as this I trusted never to live to—ye maun come to the Place directly!"

"Is my boy found? is he alive? have ye found Harry Bertram? Andrew, have ye found Harry Bertram?"

"No, sir; but—"

"Then he is kidnapped! I am sure of it, Andrew! as sure as that I tread upon earth! She has stolen him—and I will stand here from this place till I have tidings of my bairn!"

"O, but ye maun come hame, sir! ye maun come hame!—We have sent for the Sheriff, and we'll set a watch here a night, in case he returns; but you—ye maun come hame, sir,—for my lady's in the dead thrall."

Bertram turned a stupid and unmeaning eye on the man who uttered this calamitous news; and, repeating the words, "in the dead-thrall!" as if he could not comprehend their meaning, suffered the old man to drag him towards his horse. During the ride to the Place, mother, mother, sair, sair to abide! It is needless to dwell upon the new scene of agony which awaited him. The news of Kennedy's fate had been soon spread by the inhabitants of Ellangowan, with the gratifying addition, that, doubtless, "he had drawn the young Laird over the cliff with him, though the tide had swept away the chair on which he sat, light, pure, and thing, and they fell further into the surf."

Mrs. Bertram heard the tidings; she was far advanced in her pregnancy; she fell into the pains of parturition. She was hurried to the Place, amid the agitation of the moment, so as to comprehend the full distress of his situation, he was the father of a female infant, and a widower.

* Death-agony.
cliff from which it had descended. This was easily detected, by the raw appearance of the stone where it had not been exposed to the atmosphere. They then ascended the cliff, and surveyed the place from which they had leaped. The only article that could be seen was the trunk of the cliff, with himself, from the cliff. At the same time, it appeared to have lain so loose, that the use of a lever, or the combined strength of three or four men, might easily have raised it, if it was in its position. The sight about the brink of the precipice was much trans- planted, as it stamped by the heads of men in a mortal struggle, or in the act of some violent exertion. France could not have been the cause of it, or of the occasional observer, who hastened to the verge of the cove, which, in that place, crept high up the bank towards the top of the precipice.

With patience and perseverance, they traced these marks into the thickest part of the nose, a route which no person would have voluntarily adopted, unless for the purpose of concealment. Here they found the body of water, which, at that time, was the space to space. Small bouquets were torn down, as if grasped by some resisting wrch, who was dragged forcibly along; the ground, where the least degree of violence had occurred, was unaltered; the fact that there were vestiges also, which might be those of human blood. At any rate, it was certain that several persons must have forced their passage among the rocks, by the rocky beach, and that the man who was disabled, and who had been tossed, was close to the thickets. In the bottom of the precipice, the tracks conducted them to a small open space of ground, very much transplanted, and plainly stained with blood, although withered leaves had been strewn upon the spot, and other means hastily taken to efface the marks, which so ob- viously to have been derived from a desperate effort. On one side of this patch of open ground, was found the sufferer's naked body, which seemed to have been thrown into the thicket; on the other, the belt and sheath, which appeared to have been hidden with more care and precaution. After the body was discovered, the footsteps which marked this spot to be carefully measured and examined. Some corresponded to the foot of the unhappy victim; some were larger, some less, indicating that at least from two, if not three, feet had been used. Also, and here, and here only, were observed the vestiges of a child's foot; and as it could be seen nowhere else, and the hard horse-trace which traversed the wood of Warrooch, was contiguous to the spot, it was natural to think that the boy might have escaped in that direction during the confusion. But as he was never heard of, the Sheriff, who made a careful entry of all these circumstances, did not suppress his opinion, that the deceased had met with foul play, and that the murderers, whoever they were, had possessed themselves of the person of the child Harry Bertram.

Every precaution was now made to check the animals. Suspicions existing between the smugglers and the gipsies, the fate of Dirk Hatterrack's vessel was examined. Two men from the opposite side of Warrach Bay (so the inlet on the southern side of the Point of Warrooch as called) had seen, though at a great distance, the lugger drive eastward, after doubling the headland, and, as they judging from her master and crew, or, at least, from the stern, they observed that she grounded, smoked, and, finally, took fire. She was, as one of them expressed himself, in a tight frame (bright frame) when they observed a large gale was breaking up behind the carriag. The guns of the burning vessel discharged themselves as the fire reached them; and she burned herself to the water, and the boat was running as fast they thought that the boats of the lugger had stopped to}

The slop of war kept aloof for her own safety; and, after hovering till the other exploded, stood away southward under a press of sail. The Sheriff anxiously interrogated these men, if they had left the lugger. They could not say—They had seen none—but they might have put off in such a direction as placed the burning vessel, and the thick smoke that floated landward from it, between their course and the railway. That the ship destroyed was Dirk Hatterrack's no one doubted. His lugger was well known on the coast, and had been expected just at this time. A letter from the commander of the king's slop, sent from the Sheriff made application, put the matter beyond doubt; he sent also an extract from his log-book of the transactions of the day, which intimated that party being on the verge of the cove, and that Hatterrack master, upon the information and requisition of Francis Kennedy, of his majesty's excuse service; and that Kennedy was to be on the lookout on the shore, in case Hatterrack, who was known to be a desperate fellow, and had been repeatedly outlawed, should attempt to run his slop aground. About nine o'clock a.m. they discovered a slop, which they thought that the lugger, chased her, and after repeated signals to her to show colours and bring to, fired upon her. The chase then showed Hambourgh colours, and returned to the firth; but the lugger had disappeared. At three hours, when, just as the lugger was doubling the Point of Warrooch, they observed that the mainyard was shot in the strings, and that the vessel was making for the coast—war was men for some time to profit by this circumstance, owing to their having kept too much in shore for doubling the headland. After two tacks, they came up with her; and observed the chase on fire, and apparently deserted. The fire having reached some rakes of spars, which were placed on the deck, with other combustibles, probably on purpose, burnt the vessel, with some ammunition. Such a charge, especially when shot out guns were discharging, one after another, by the heat. The captain had no doubt whatever that the crew had set the vessel on fire, and escaped in their boats. After watching the conflagration till the ship blew up, his majesty's slop, the Shark, stood towards the Isle of Man, with the purpose of intercepting the retreat of the smugglers, who, though they might conceal themselves in the woods for a day or two, would probably take the first opportunity of endeavouring to make for this island. But they never saw more of the than is above narrated. Such was the experience of the master and commander of his majesty's slop of war, Hatterrack, who concluded by regretting deeply that he had not had the happiness to fall in with the smug- gleers who escaped with John Bury. After the se- nior's flag, and with an assurance, that, should be next Mr. Dirk Hatterrack in any future cruise, he would not fail to bring him into port under his stern, to answer whatever might be alleged against him.

As, therefore, it seemed tolerably certain that the men on board the lugger had escaped, the death of Kennedy, if he fell in with them in the woods, when irritated by the loss of their vessel, and by the share he had in it, was easily to be accounted for. And it was not improbable, that to such brutal tempers, rendered desperate by their own circumstances, even the memory of the child, against whose father, Dirk Hatterrack, having become suddenly active in the proceedings of the smugglers, Hatterrack was known to have uttered deep threats, would not appear a very heinous crime.

Against this hypothesis it was urged, that a crew of fifteen or twenty men could not have lain hidden upon the coast, when so close a search took place immediately after the destruction of their vessel; or, at least, the men hid themselves in the woods, their boats must have been seen at some time in such precarious circumstances, and when all retreat must have seemed difficult, if not impossible, it was not thought that they would have all unil- tely to commit a murder, for the purpose of revenge. Those who held this opinion, supposed, either that the boats of the lugger had stood out to men without being observed by those who were intent upon the capture of the boats. The lighthouse was a distance before the sloop got round the headland; or else, that the boats being staved or destroyed by the fire of the Shark during the chase, the crew had obtained the news of the death of Kennedy, or 'the gauger,' as she called him, with indifference; but expressed great and emphatic scorn and indignation at being supposed capable of inflicting so great a wrong on any one; and Mag had been at length liberated, but under sentence of banishment from the country, as a vessel of commerce, and disorderly person. No traces of the boy could ever be discovered; and, at length, the story, after making much noise, was gradually given up as altogether without foundation and unexplained. It is the name of 'The Gauger's Loup,' which was generally believed to stowed on the cliff from which the unfortunate man had fallen, or been precipitated.

CHAPTER XI.

Enter Time, as Chorus.

[isochor]-thecount, joy and terror
Of good and bad, that make our seat
Now take upon me, in the name of Time.
To use my wings. Impale it, not a crime
Ere you erred, ere you erred, ere you erred,
O'er sixty years, and leave the growth unsnared
Of that which grows, the life and the exile.

Oen narration is now about to make a last stride, and omit a number of nearly seventeen years; during which nothing occurred of any particular consequence with respect to the story we have undertaken to tell. The gap is a wide one; yet if the reader's experience in life enables him to look back on so many years, the space will scarce appear longer in his recollection, than the time consumed in turning these pages.

It was, then, in the month of November, about seventeen years after the catastrophe related in the last chapter, that, during a cold and stormy night, a social group had closed around the kitchen-fire of the Grand Arm at Kintailtunam, a small but comfortable inn, kept by Mrs. Mac-Candlish in that village. The conversation which passed among them will save me the trouble of telling the few events occurring during this chasm in our history, with which it is necessary that the reader should be acquainted.

Mrs. Mac-Candlish, thrown in a comfortable easy chair lined with black leather, was regaling herself, and her guests, with rambling stories about a man of genuine tea, and at the same time keeping a sharp eye upon her domestics, as they went and came in prosecution of their various duties and commissions. The clerk and the cook, stewing away as little distance his Saturday night's pipe, and added its bland influxion by an occasional sip of brand and water. Deacon Bearell, a man of great importance in the village, combined the indulgence of both charities—he had his pipe and his tea-cup, the latter being laced with a little spirits. One or two clovens sat at some distance, drinking their twopenny ale.

"Are ye sure the parlour's ready for them, and the fire burning clear, and the chimney no smoking?" said the hostess to a chambermaid.

"She was answered in the affirmative. "Aye wadna be unkindly in their distress," said she, turning to the Deacon.

"Assuredly not, Mrs. Mac-Candlish; assuredly not. I am sure any amiable thing they might want free from my shop, under seven, or eight, or two pounds, I would book them as readily for it as the first in the country. Do they come in the old chase?"

"I dare say no," said the precursor; "for Miss Bertram comes on the white powny little day to the kirk—and a constant kirk-keeper she is—and it's a pleasure to hear her singing the psalms, winsome young thing.

"And the young Laird of Hazlewood rides hame half the road wi' her after sermon," said one of the guests in company; "I wonder how auld Hazlewood likes that."

"I ken he's a gentleman, but I don't think it's likely he'll be here now," answered another of the tea-drinkers; "but the day has been wasted.
GUY MANNEERING.

Ellangowan had been liked as little to see his daughter taking up with their son."

"Oh, has been," answered the first, with somewhat of emphasis.

"I am sure, neighbour Ovens," said the hostess, "the Huckleields of Hucklewood, though they are not a very wealthy family in the county, never thought, till within these two score or, of evening till the Ellangowans—er, woman, the Bertrams of Ellangowan are the auld Dingwall's long

I dare say Mr. Skreigh can sing us the ballad.

"Gudwife," said Skreigh, gathering up his mouth, and puffing off his tuff of brandy pipe with great solemnity, "our talents were gien us to use other than to sing daft and songs near the Sabbath day."

"Hunt for, Mr. Skreigh!" I warrant I have heard you sing 'Oby Saturday this e'en, but now—But as for the chase, Deacon, it has been out of the conch-house since Mrs. Bertram died, that's sixteen or seventeen years sin' sin'—Jock Jabs is as a son, but the brave Jock! "Nae man can say for that," answered the clerk, mysteriously.

oh, it's a saul amazin effect in his favour. He was a handsome, tall, thin figure, dressed in black, as appear'd when he last met the riding-cast; he'd a strong head; his complexion was very cold.

His appearance, voice, and manner, produced an instant

"Your honour's servant—Miller Smith, good night."

On the present occasion, she was low in her curtsey, and profuse in her apologies. The stranger placed his horse might be attended—to she went out herself to school the hostler.

There was never a prettier bit o' horse-flesh in the stable o' the Glencoe Arms," said the hostler; which information increased the landlady's respect for the rider. Finding, on her return, that the stranger declined to go into another apartment, (which indeed, she allow'd, wou'd be hot and stuffy till the fire blew up,) she installed her guest hospitably by the fire-side, and offered what refreshment her house afforded.

"A cup o' your tea, ma'am, if you will favour me."

Mrs. Mac-Candlish bustled about, reinforced her teapot with hyson, and proceeded in her duties with her best grace. "We have a very nice parlour, sir, and very agreeable to gentle-folks; but it's beshook the night for a gentleman and his daughter, that are going to leave this part of the country—ome of my chaisers is gone for them, and will be back forthwith—their horses, too, are weel in the world as they have been; but we're a' subject to ups and downs in this life, as your honour must needs ken—but is not the tobacco-reck disagreeable to your honour?"

"Not a bit of it, said the gentleman, and perfectly used to it. Will you permit me to make some inquiries about a family in this neighbourhood?"

The sound of wheels was now heard, and the landlady hurried to the door to receive her expected guests; but returned in an instant followed by the postillion.

"No, then," said the lady, "the Lord knew what the Lord knew—"

"But God help them," said the landlady, "the morn's the term—the very last day they can bide in the house—a thing's to be raip't."

"Well, they can come at no rate, I tell ye—Mr. Bertram cauna be moved."

"What Mr. Bertram?" said the stranger; "no Mr. Bertram of Ellangowan, I hope."

"Just as same, sir; and if ye be a friend o' his, ye have come at a time when he's nae boun't.

formed around him, delivered the following legend, having cleared his voice with one or two hesps, and making a gesticulation which weekly thundered over his head from the pulpit.

"What we are now to deliver, my brethren,—hem—hem,—I mean, my good friends,—was not done in a corner, but in the midst of a throng of worshippers, wits, artists, and misbelievers of all kinds,—Ye must know that the worshipful Laird of Ellangowan was not so precise as he might have been in clearing his land of witches, (concerning whom it is said, Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live,) nor of those who had familiar spirits, and consulted with divination, and sorcery, and lotas, which is the fashion with the Episcopalians. They ca' themselfs, and other un- happy bodies, in this our country. And the Laird was three years married without having a family—and he was sae left to himself, that it was thought he held under much trembling and commencing wit a Miss Merrilies, who was the most notorious witch in a Galloway and Dumfriesshire baith."

"Aweel, I wert there's something in that," said Mrs. Mac-Canlisth, on the Letter Glen, who ordered her two gawsies or brandy in this very house."

"Aweel, guilde-wife, then the less I lie,—See the lady was wi' bairn at last, and in the night when she was delivin' the bairn she hissed to the door of the ha'—house—the Place of Ellangowan as they ca'd—an ancient man, strangely habited, and asked for quarters. His head, and his legs, and his arms, and his feet, were all of a sudden so full as the time, but John Wilson was a blustering kind of chield, without the heart of a spraut."

"And what was the end of all this?" said the preacher, whose name was Jock, and who had been a schoolmaster in the country for a year, and he had a grey beard three quarters long. Weel, he was admitted; and when the lady was delivered, he craved to know the very moment of the birth, when the mother and her relatives could have the bairn. And when he came back, he told the Laird, that the Evil One had power over the knave-bairn, that was that night born; and he charged him that the bairn should be bred up in the ways of pitty, and that he should be gave a good seat at his elbow, to pray for the bairn and for him. And the aged man vanished away, and no man of this country ever saw mair of him."

"Now, that was not pass," said the posstion, who, at a respectable distance, was listening to the conversation, "begging Mr. Skreigh's and the company's pardon, there was no see poor huns on the warld as rude a hat, and boots and gloves as the gentleman need to wear at this moment; and he had as gade a pair o' boots a man need streak on his legs, and glooves too;—and I should understand boots by this time, I think."

"Ay? and what do ye ken o' the matter, friend Jabeo?" said the preacher, contemptuously.

"No muckle, to be sure, Mr. Skreigh,—only that I lived as rude a hat, and boots and gloves, as any gentleman need to have. To be sure he did gie an aweful glance up at the auld castle—and there was some space-wark enow on—I aye heard that; but as for your hat, you must in your dress and your hat give me a good away, and he gied me a round half-crown—he was riding on a buck they ca'd Souple Sam—it belonged to the George at Dumfries—it was a bloody fast, very droll o' the spavin—I had seen the beast before and since."

"Aweel, aweel, Jock," answered Mr. Skreigh, with a tone of mild solemnity, "our accounts differ in some particulars, but I hope you have a knowledge that ye had seen the man.—So ye see, my friends, this soothsayen having prognosticated evil to the boy, his father engaged a godly minister to be with him more or less."

"Ay, that was him they ca'd Dominic Sampson," said the posstion.

* The preacher is called by Allan Ramsey — The Letter-Gene of holy rhyme.

"He's but a dumb dog that," observed the Deacon; "I have heard that he never could preach five words of a sermon ending, for as long as he has been licensed."

"Well, but," said the preacher, waving his hand, as if eager to retrieve the command of the discourse," he waited on the young Laird by night and day. Now, it chanced, when the bairn was near five years auld, that the Laird had a sight of his ministers, and determined to put these Egyptians all his ground; and he caused them to remove; and that Frank Kennedy, that was a rough swearing fellow, he was sent to turn them off. And he cursed and damned at them, and they swore at him; and that Miss Merrilies, that was the meanest creature with the Treasury of Manhood, she as gade as she said she would have him, body and soul, before three days were over his head. And I have it from a sure hand, and that's one who saw it—and I have it from a sure hand, and that's one who saw it—and I have it from a sure hand, and that's one who saw it—and I have it from a sure hand, and that's one who saw it."

"On the event and upshot of it was, sir," said the preacher, "that while they were all looking on, before a king's ship: the smugger, this Kenned, suddenly lit upon the good bairn's head: and he was bound, and he was carried, and he was seined as a noxious tar-seed, not to be esteemed — tops nor twas not had held him—and made for the wood of Warroch as fast as his beast could carry him; and by the way he met the young Laird in the street and snatched up the bairn, and sworn, and if he was bewitched, the bairn should have the same luck as him; and the minister followed as fast as he could, and as fast as they, for he was wonderfully swift of foot—and he seized the bairn, or his Laird's bairn, and put a letter into his likeness, for it seemed bigger than any mortal creature, John could not say.

""No," said the posstion, "it might be seen—I cannae say why, but I saw it as the time; but John Wilson was a blustering kind of chield, without the heart of a spraut."

"And what was the end of all this?" said the preacher, who had been a schoolmaster in the country for a year, and he had a grey beard three quarters long. Weel, he was admitted; and when the lady was delivered, he craved to know the very moment of the birth, when the mother and her relatives could have the bairn. And when he came back, he told the Laird, that the Evil One had power over the knave-bairn, that was that night born; and he charged him that the bairn should be bred up in the ways of pitty, and that he should be gave a good seat at his elbow, to pray for the bairn and for him. And the aged man vanished away, and no man of this country ever saw mair of him."

"Now, that was not pass," said the posstion, who, at a respectable distance, was listening to the conversation, "begging Mr. Skreigh's and the company's pardon, there was no see poor huns on the warld as rude a hat, and boots and gloves, as any gentleman need to wear at this moment; and he had as gade a pair o' boots a man need streak on his legs, and glooves too;—and I should understand boots by this time, I think."

"I believe that's very true," said the posstion.

"So, sir, she grippt him, and eldowed him like a stane from the slay over the crags of Warroch-head, where he was on the land that evening; and that's more than the tale of the babe, frankly I cannot say. But he that was minister here then, that's now in a better place, had an opinion, that the bairn was only conveyed to the bairn he had slain in another place."

The stranger had smiled slightly at some parts of this recital, but ere he could answer, the clatter of a horse's hoofs was heard, and a smart servant, hand-somely dressed, with a coaclie in his hat, bustled into the kitchen, with "Make a little room, good people;" when, observing the stranger, he descended at once into the modest and civil domestic, his hat sunk down by his side, and he put a letter into his master's hands. "The family at Ellangowan, sir, are in great distress, and unable to receive any visits."

"I know it," replied his master: "And now, madam, if you will have the goodness to allow me to occupy the parlour you mentioned, as you are disappointed of your guests——"

"Certainly, sir," said Mrs. Mac-Canlisth, and hastened to light the way with all the imperative bustle which an active landlady loves to display on such occasions.

"Young man," said the Deacon to the servant, filling a glass, "ye'll no be the wa'ter o' this, after your ride."

"Not a feather, sir,—thank ye—your very good health, sir."

"And what may your master be, friend?"

"What, the gentleman that was here?—that's the famous Colonel Manning, sir, from the East Indies."

"What, what we read of in the newspapers?"
CHAPTER XII

Reputation,—that's man's idol. Who commanded us we should not kill,
And yet we say we must, for Reputation?
What honest man can either fear his own,
Or else will hurt another's reputation?

If they be done to us, to suffer them
In valour too.

Ben Jonson.

The Colonel was walking pensively up and down the parlour, when the officious landlady entered to take his orders. Having given her her directions in the most diffident manner he thought would be most acceptable "for the good of the house," he begged to detain her a moment.

"I think," he said, "madam, if I understood the good people right, Mr. Bertram lost his son in his fifth year?"

"Ay, sir, there's nae doubt o' that; though there are many idle claps about the way and manner, for it's an auld story now, and every body tells it, as we were doing, their own way by the ingleside. But last housetide was his fifth year, as your honour says, Colonel; and the news be rarest o' all. He go the laddie, then great with child, cost her life that sauny night—and the Laird never threw after that day, but was just careless of every thing—though, when the laddie grew up, she tried to keep order within the house—but what could she do, poor thing?—so now they're out of house and hould."

Can you recollect, madam, about what time of the year the child was lost?"

The landlady, after a pause, and some recollection, answered, "she was positive it was about this season," and added some local recollections that fixed the date in her memory, and the beginning of the following November.

The stranger took two or three turns round the room in silence, but signed to Mrs. Mac-Candlish not to leave it.

I cannot very apprehend," he said, "that the estate of Ellangowan is in the market?"

"In the market?—it will be sell'd the morn to the highest bidder—that's no the morn, Lord help me! which is the Sale-brook, but on Monday, the first free day; and the furniture and stockin is to be roupit at the same time on the ground—it's the opinion of the hault country, that the sale has been shamefully forced on at this time, when there's nae little money stirring in Scotland wi' this weary American war, that somebody may get the land a bargain—Doil be in them, that I should say sae!—the good lady's wish is realized.

And where will the sale take place?

"On the premises, as the advertisement says—that's at the house of Ellangowan, your honour, as I understand it.

And who exhibits the title-deeds, rent-roll, and plan?"

A very decent man, sir; the sheriff-substitute of the county, who has authority from the Court of Session. He has got such a figure, as your honour, as I would like to see him; and he can tell you more about the loss of the bairn than any body, for the sheriff-depute—that's his principal, like—took much pains to examine the case carefully, as your honour had heard."

"And this gentleman's name is?"

Mac-Morlan, sir—he's a man o' character, and well spoken of;—"Send my compliments—Colonel Manning's compliments to him, and I would be glad he would do me the pleasure of supposing with me and bring these papers with him—and I beg, good madam, you will say nothing of this to any one else."

"Me sir? never a word shall I say—assure your honour, none (as I think), or I know not what that's fought for his country, (another curiosity,) had the land, since the auld family man quit, (a stech,) rather than that witty Countess, Glossin, that's raen on the nest that day, and I'll tell you what I think, I'll slip on my hood and pattens, and gang to Mr. Mac-Morlan uyeall—he's at home e'en now—it's hardly a step."

"Do as my good landlady, and many thanks—and bid my servant step here with my portfolio in the meantime."

In a minute or two, Colonel Manning was quietly seated with his writing materials before him. We have the privilege of looking over his shoulder as he writes, and we willingly communicate its substance to our readers. The letter was addressed to Arthur Mervyn, Esq., of Mervyn Hall, Llanbradwieg, Westmorland. It contained some account of the writer's previous journey since parting with him; and then proceeded as follows:

"And now, you will still upload with me my melancholy. Inconsiderably, I allude, after the lapse of twenty-five years, battles, wounds, insurmountable misfortunes of every description, I can be still—and unbroken Guy Manning, who climbed Skiddaw, a month ago, or shot great Crag in Galloway. That you, who have remained in the bosom of domestic happiness, experience a little change, that your step is as light, and your fancy as full of sunshine, is a blessed relief to the woe-drearied, I hope! Operating with content and a smooth current down the course of life. But my career has been one of difficulties, and doubts, and errors. From my infancy I have been sickly, and have been a subject of anxiety and care. My stepmother, who has oft borne me into harbour, it has seldom been into that which the pilot desired. Let me re-call to you—but the task must be brief—the evil and wayward fate of my youth, and the misfortunes of my manhood.

"The former, you will say, had nothing very appalling. All was not for the best; but all was tolerable. My father, the eldest son of an ancient but reduced family, left me with little, save the name of the head of the house, to the protection of his more fortunate brothers. They were so fond of me that, when they already had sufficient to ensure a comfortable life, they would have had me in orders, and offered me a living—my uncle the merchant, would have put me into a counting-house, and proposed to give me a share in the engaging concern of trade. But I, to whom they shall, in Lombard Street—So, between these two stools, or rather these two soft, easy, well-stuffed chairs of dignity and commerce, my unfortunate person slipped down, and pitched upon a dragon-sand. Again, the bishop wished me to marry the niece and heirress of the Dean of Lincoln; and my uncle, the alderman, proposed to me the only daughter of old Sleuthorn, the great wine-merchant, rich enough to play at non-counter with magnates; and make the headlines of bank notes—and somehow I slipped my neck out of both nooses, and married—poor poor Sophia W—— as I supposed indeed.

"You still say, my military career in India, when I followed my regiment there, should have given me some satisfaction; and so it assuredly has. You will remind me also, that if I disappointed the hopes of my guardians, I did not mourne their displeasure—that the bishop, at his death, bequeathed me his blessing, his manuscript sermons, and a curious portfolio, containing the heads of eminent divines of the church of England. My uncle left me sole heir and executor to his large fortune. Yet this availed me nothing—I told you I had that upon my mind which I should carry to my grave with me. I told you I was all alone in the world. I will tell you the curse more in detail than I had the heart to do while under your hospitable roof. You will, often, hear it mentioned, and perhaps with different and unfounded circumstances. I will therefore..."
A very slight spark will kindle a flame where every thing lies open to catch it. I have absolutely forgot the presence of my mite at the table, which occasioned high words and a challenge. We met in the morning beyond the walls and espanade of the fortress which I then commanded, on the frontiers of the settlement. This was arranged for Brown's safety, had he escaped. I almost wish he had, though at my own expense. I flattered myself I could have strove to assist him; but some of those Localia, a species of native banditti who were always on the watch for prey, poured in upon us. Archer and I mounted our horses, unladen, and endeavored to drive them after a hard contest, in the course of which he received some desperate wounds. To complete the misfortunes of this miserable day, my wife, who was behind the fortress, which had been detached, andology him military duty more to his fancy than commerce, in which he had been engaged, remained with us as a cadet. Let me do my unhappy victim justice—he bore it well. I was absent for some weeks upon a distant expedition; when I returned, I found this young girl still with us, friends of the house, and habitual attendant of my daughter. It was an arrangement which displeased me in many particulars, though no objection could be made to his manners or character—Yet I might have been persuaded with real pertinacity for the suggestions of another. If I read over—what I never dare open—the play of Othello, you will have some idea of what followed—I mean of my mood during the period; and I have no doubt the kindness, the understanding, the interest and the respect of the young man, who has so often mentioned had prepared to recite my years of retirement.

Now that you know my story, you will no longer ask me the reason of my melancholy, but permit me to brood upon it as I may. There is, sir, in the above narrative, enough to embitter, though not to poison, the fortune; which the fortune not, I say, and you so often mentioned had prepared to recite my years of retirement. I could add circumstances which our old tutor would have considered as instances of day-futility—you would laugh were I to mention such particulars, especially as you know I put no faith in them. Yet, since I have come to the home from which I now write, I have learned, a singular coincidence, which, if I find it truly established by tolerable evidence, will serve us further for subject of discussion. But I will spare you at present, as I expect a person or persons of importance is now open in this part of the country. It is a place to which I have a foolish partiality, and I hope my purchasing may be conducive to those who are passing with it, as the wood for lumber, for local use, and the like. My respectful compliments to Mrs. Mervyn, and I will trust you, though you be so lively a young gentleman, to kiss Julia for me.—Arius, dear Mervyn.—The next time, I trust, Mr. Mac-Morlan now entered the room. The well-known character of Colonel Manning was disposed of by the young man, who was a man of intelligence and probity, to be again and confided. He explained the advantages and dis-advantages of the property.

It was settled, he said, "the greater part of it at least, upon hire-mine, and the purchaser would have the privilege of retaining in his hands a certain portion of the price, in case of the reappearance, within a certain limited term, of the child who had dispelled fear,"

"To what purpose, then, force forward a sale?" said Manning.

"Mac-Morlan smiled. "Oustensively," he answered, "to substitute the interest of money, instead of the ill-paid and precarious tents of an improved estate, but chiefly, it was believed, to suit the wishes of a certain intended purchaser, who had become a principal creditor, and forced himself into the management of the estate by means best known to himself, and who, it was thought, would find it very convenient to purchase the estate without paying down the price."

Manning consulted with Mr. Mac-Morlan upon the steps for thwarting this unprincipled attempt. They then conversed long on the singular disappearance of Harry Bertram upon his fifth birth-day, CHAPTER XIII.

Early next morning, Manning mounted his

And, accompanied by his servant, took the road to Ellangowan. He had no need to inquire the way. A sale in the country is a place of public resort and amusement, and people of various descriptions attend it from the vulgar; to hear their opinions.

After a pleasant ride of about an hour, the old towers of the ruin presented themselves in the landscape. The thoughts, with what different feelings he had last seen the building, the wonder and admiration it had excited in the mind of the traveller. The landscape was the same; but only changed the feelings, hopes, and views, of the spectator! Then, life and love were new; and all the prospect was gilded by their rays. And now, disappointed in affection, sated with fame, and what the world calls success, his mind gloated by bitter and repentant recollection, his best hope was to find a retirement in which he might nurse the melancholy that was to accompany him to his grave.

Yet why should an individual mourn over the instability of his hopes, and the vanity of his prospects? The ancient chiefs, who erected their pompous and magnificent edifices, were the forefathers of their race and the seat of their power, could they have dreamed the day was to come, when the last of their descendants should be expelled, a ruined wanderer, from his possession of all? The sun will shine as fair on these ruins, whether the property of a stranger, or of a sortid and obscure trickster, of the abused law, as when the banners of the founder first waved upon their battlements.

These reflections brought Manning to the door of the house, which was that day open to all. He entered among others, who traversed the apartments some to select articles for purchase; others to gratify their curiosity. There is something melancholy in such a scene, even under the most favourable circumstances. The confused state of the furniture, the disjointed mass of broken vases and other fragments, and carried off by the purchasers, is disagreeable to the eye. Those articles which, properly and decently arranged, look creditable and handsome, have then a pultry and wretched aspect; and the apartments, stripped of all that render them commodious and comfortable, have an aspect of ruin and dilapidation. It is disgusting also, to see the scenes of domestic society and seclusion thrown open to the gaze of the curious and vulgar; and the speculations and brutal jests upon the fashions and furniture to which they are unaccustomed,—a frolicsome humour much cherished by the whisky which in Scotland but in private hours on such occasions. All these are ordinary effects of such a scene as Ellangowan now presented; but the moral feeling that, in this case, they indicated the total ruin of an ancient and honourable family, gave them a weight and poignancy.

It was some time before Colonel Manning observed any one disposed to answer his rhetorical questions concerning Ellangowan himself. At last, with some reluctance to her story, she spoke, told him, "the Laird was something; and they hoped he would be able to leave the house that day. Miss Lucy expected the change very soon, and that the day was fine and bright; but when they had carried him in his easy chair up to the old castle, to be out of the way of a unco spectable." Either Colonel Manning did not at all appreciate the question of the group, which consisted of four persons. The air was steep, so that he had time to recharge the advanced, and to consider in what mode he might make his address.

Mr. Bertram, paralytic, and almost insensible, moving, occupied his easy chair, attired in his cap, and a loose camlet coat, his feet wrapped in blankets. Behind him, with his hands on the cane upon which he rested, stood Dominic son, whom Manning recognized at once. This made no change upon him, unless that his look seemed more sullen and his gesture less jaunty than when Manning last saw him. On one side the old man was a slyph-like figure—a young man of about seventeen, whom the Colonel supposed to be his daughter. She was looking, from anxiety, anxiously towards the avenue of poplar-post-chaise; and while between bushes, adjusting the blankets, so as to protect her from the cold, and in answering inquiries, seemed so much more like a carer than an observant daughter. She did not trust herself to look towards Place, although the hum of the assembled guests must have drawn her attention that direction. The fourth person of the group was a handsome, rather young man, who seemed to share Miss Bertram's anxiety, and her solicitude to soothe and entertain her parent.

This young man was the first who observed Colonel Manning, and immediately stepped forward to meet him, as if politely to prevent his drawing nearer to the distressed group. Manning instantly introduced himself to the young man, whom Mr. Bertram had formerly shown him and hospitality; he would not have intruded upon him at a period of distress, did it not occur to him that he might be in some manner of service to him; he wished merely to offer such services as might his power to Mr. Bertram and the young lady.

He then paused at a little distance from the house and laid his hat down, to get all his bearing and composure. Dominic seemed too deeply sunk in distress to observe his presence. The young man spoke with Miss Bertram, who advanced timorously thanked Colonel Manning for his goodness;

she said, the tears gushing fast into her eyes; father, she feared, was not so much able to remember him.

She then retreated towards the chair, accused by the Colonel,—"Father," she said, "this is Manning, an old friend, come to inquire about him." He's very heartily welcome," said the old lady, raising his hand, and making a sign of courtesy, while a gleam of hospitable eyes seemed to pass over his faded features; "but, my dear, let us go down to the house, you should keep the gentleman here in the cold." At last, she gained the key of the wine-cellar. Mr. a— a— a—<t>lerman will surely take something after this.

Manning was unspeakably affected at the thought which his recollection brought to the mind of his friend; and how his heart had shrank with the same individual when they last met. He could only restrain his tears, and his evident emotion attested the confidence of the friendly lady.

"Alas!" she said, "this is distressing more than stranger; but it may be better for my poor mind to be in this way, than if he knew and could..."
A servant in livery now came up the path, and spoke in an undertone to the young gentleman—

"Mr. Charles, my lady’s wanting you. You must be on your way down the steps hastily, as if not trusting his resolution at a slower pace.

Where’s Charles Hazlewood running?" said the invalid, who apparently was accustomed to his presence and attentions; "where’s Charles Hazlewood running—what takes him away now?"

"He’ll return in a little while," said Lucy, gently.

The sound of voices was now heard from the rooms.

The reader may remember there was a communication between the castle and the beach, up which the speakers had ascended.

"Yes, there’s of shells and sea-ware for marble, as you observe—and if one inclined to build a new house, which might indeed be necessary, there’s a great deal of good hewn stone about this old dungeon for the decoration.

"Good!” said Miss Bertram, hastily to Sampson, "tis that wretch Glossin’s voice—if my father see him, it will kill him outright!"

Sampson wheeled perpendicularly round, and martial with long strides to confront the attorney, as he issued from beneath the portal each of the ruin.

"Avoid ye!" he said—"Avoid ye! I wouldst thou kill and take possession."

"Yes, Master Dominic Sampson," answered Glossin insolently, "if ye cannot preach in the pulpit, we shall have no preaching here. We go by the law, my good friend; we leave the gospel to you."

The very mention of this man’s name had produced a subject of the most violent irritation to the unfortunate patient. The sound of his voice now produced an instantaneous effect. Mr. Bertram sat up without assistance, and turned round towards him; the ghastliness of his features forming a strange contrast with the violence of his exclamation.—"Out of my sight, ye viper!—ye frozen viper, the abhorred of all our race! Art thou not afraid that the walls of my father’s dwelling will fall and crush thee limb and bone?—Are ye not afraid of the very lintels of the door of Ellangowan castle should break open and swallow you up?—Were ye not frightened,—were ye not of a suddenly, as if I took ye by the hand—and are ye not expelling me,—and that innocent girl—friendless, hopeless, and pennyless, from the house that has sheltered us and ours for a thousand years.

Glossin had been alone, he would probably have slunk off; but the consciousness that a stranger was present, besides the person who came with him, (a woman of English energies)—rendered the两种 threatened goal. "Fear—Sir—Sir—Mr. Bertram—Sir, you should not blame me, but your own imprudence.

The indignation of Manning was mounting very high. "Sir," he said to Glossin, "without entering into the merits of this controversy, I must inform you, that you have been in improper place, at improper time, and presence for it. And you will oblige me by withdrawing without more words.

Glossin, being a tall, strong, muscular man, was not unwilling rather to turn upon a stranger whom he and his man maintained to have been caused against his injured patron—"I do not know who you are, sir," he said, "and I shall permit no man to use such—such freedom with me."

Manning was naturally hot-tempered—he flashed a dark light—he compressed his nether lip so closely that the blood sprung, and approaching Glossin—"Look, you, sir," he said, "that you do not know me is of little consequence. I know you, and if you do not instantly descend that bank, without uttering a single syllable, by the Heaven that is above us, you shall make but one step from the top to the bottom!"

The commanding tone of rightful anger silenced at once the frowns of the bully. He returned, turned on his heel, and, muttering something between his teeth about unwillfulness to alarm the lady, relieved himself of his horse, and was no longer seen.

Mrs. Mac-Candlish’s postilion, who had come in time to hear what passed, said aloud, "If he had stuck by the way, I would have lent him a horse, the dirty scoundrel, as willingly as ever I pitched a bottle."

He then stepped forward to announce that his horses were in readiness for the invalid and his daughter. But they were no longer necessary. The delirious frame of Mr. Bertram was exhausted by that last effort of indignant anger, and when he sunk again upon his chair, he expounded almost without a struggle of sensation. So little alteration did the extinction of the vital spark make upon his external appearance, that the screams of his daughter, when she saw his eye fixed, and felt his pulse stop, first announced his death to the spectators.

CHAPTER XIV.

Our hopes and fears
Start up alarmed, and our life’s narrow verge
Look down—Oh what a fatherless will, a
A dark eternity, how surely one—

The moral, which the poet has rather quaintly deduced from the preceding mode of measuring time, may be well applied to our feelings respecting that portion of it which constitutes human life. We observe the aged, the infirm, and those engaged in precarious occupations, whose days are limited, living upon the very brink of non-existence, but we derive no lesson from the precariousness of their tenure until it has altogether failed. Then, for a moment at least, we are wise in man. As an angel spoke,

"Ye wise in man."

Our hopes and fears
Start up alarmed, and our life’s narrow verge
Look down—Oh what a fatherless will, a
A dark eternity, how surely one—

The crowd of assembled guests and idlers at Ellangowan had followed the views of amusement, of what they called business, which brought them there. With little regard to the feelings of those who were suffering upon that occasion. Few, indeed, knew any thing of the family. The father, by what is called business, had been during many years, out of the notice of his contemporaries; it is true he had never been known to them. But when the general murmur announced that the unfortunate Mr. Bertram had broken his heart in the effort to leave the mansion of his forefathers, there poured forth a torrent of sympathy, like the waters from the rock when stricken by the hand of the prophet. The ancient descent and unblemished integrity of the family were respectfully remembered; and above all, the truth in which Scotland seldom demands its tribute in vain, then claimed and received it.

Mr. Mac-Morlan hastily announced, that he would suspend all further proceedings in the sale of the estate and other property, and relinquish the possession of the premises to the young lady, until she could consult with her friends, and provide for the burial of her father.

Glossin had conferred for a few minutes under the general expression of sympathy, till, hardened by observing that no appearance of popular indignation was directed against him, he had the audacity to require that the sale should proceed.

"I will take it upon my own authority to adjourn it," said the Sheriff-substitute, "and will be responsible for the consequences. I will give due notice when it is again to go forward. As for the benefit of all concerned that the lands should be the highest price the state of the market will admit, and this is surely no time to expect it—I will take this opportunity of disposing of it for contributing to Miss Bertram's convenience, being no doubt the purpose to which it was destined by the bestower.

Many of the town gentry were since sincerely eager in pressing offers of hospitality and kindness upon Miss Bertram. But she felt a natural reluctance to enter any family, for the first time, as an object of sale, and further insisted on disposing of it, to the opinion and advice of her father's nearest female relation, Mrs. Margaret Bertram of Singleside, an old unmarried lady, to whom she was so long and so tenderly indebted for her education.

The funeral of the late Mr. Bertram was performed with decent piety, and the unfortunate young lady was now to consider herself as but the temporary tenant of the house in which she had been born, and where her patience and soothing attentions had so long "rocked the cradle of declining age." Her communication with Mr. Mac-Morlan encouraged her to hope, that she would not be suddenly or unkindly disposed of this asylum; but fortune had ordered otherwise.

For two days before the appointed day for the sale of the lands and estate of Ellangowan, Mac-Morlan daily expected to see the appearance of Miss Lucy, or at least a letter containing powers to act for her. But none such arrived. Mr. Mac-Morlan waited early in the morning,—walked over to the Post-office,—there was no mail. He persuaded himself that he should see Colonel Manner- ing at breakfast, and ordered his wife to place her best china, and prepare herself accordingly. But the preparations were in vain. "He will have breakfasted this," he said, "I would have travelled Scotland over, but I would have found some one to bid against Glossin."—Alas! such reflections were all too late.

The appointment of the auctioneer was prepared, and the Mason's Lodge at Kippleton, being the place fixed for the adjourned sale. Mac-Morlan spent as much time in preliminaries as decency would permit, and read over the records of the town. He had been reading his own death-warrant. He turned his eye every time the door of the room opened, with hopes which grew fainter and fainter. He listened to every noise in the street of the village, and endeavored to hear something of his news. It was all in vain. A bright idea then occurred, that Colonel Mannering might have employed some other person in the transaction—he would not have wasted a moment of time upon this, if he had been himself, such a manoeuvre would have evinced. But this hope also was groundless. After a solemn pause, Mr. Glossin offered the upset price for the lands and property of Ellangowan. No one had made, and no competitor appeared; so, after a lapse of the usual interval by the running of a sand-glass, upon the intended purchaser entering the proper surmises, Mr. Mac-Morlan was obliged, in technical terms, to "find and declare the sale lawfully completed, and to prefer the said Gilbert Glossin as the purchaser of the said lands and estate." The honest writer refused to partake of a splendid entertainment with which Gilbert Glossin, Esquire, now of Ellangowan, treated the rest of the company, and returned home in huge bitterness of spirit, which he vented in complaints against the world, the weather, the Indian nabobs, who never knew what they would be at for ten days together. Fortune generously determined to take the blame upon herself, and cut off even this evil of the Mac-Morlan's recent visit.

An express was dispatched about six o'clock at night, "very particularly drunk," the maid-servant said, with a packet from Colonel Mannering, dated four days back, at a town about a hundred miles' distance from Kippleton, containing full powers to Mr. Mac-Morlan, or any one whom he might employ, to make the intended purchase, and stating, that some family business of consequence called the Colonel himself to Westmorland, where a letter would find him, addressed to the care of Arthur Mervyn, Esq., of Mervyn Hall.
Mac-Morlan, in the transports of his wrath, flung the power of attorney at the head of the innocent maid-servant, and was only forcibly withheld from horse-whipping the rascally messenger, by whose sloth and drunkenness the disappointment had taken place.

CHAPTER XV.

My gold is gone, my money is spent,
My land now take it unto thee.
Give me thy gold, good John o’ the Scales.
And those for my land she said.
Thee John he did him to record draw,
And John he caste him a rude peevish
But he went into the house and said that John.
The land, I was, was well worth three.

The Galwegian John o’ the Scales was a more clever fellow than his prototype. He contrived to make himself heir of Linpe without the disagreeable ceremony of "sitting down the good red gold." Miss Bertram no sooner heard this, than she laid bare her expected intelligence, than she proceeded in the preparations she had already made for leaving the mansion-house immediately. Mr. Mac-Morlan assisted him in these arrangements, and presented upon her so kindly the hospitality and protection of his roof, until she should receive an answer from her cousin, or be enabled to adopt some settled plan of life, that she felt there would be no kindness in refusing an invitation made with such earnestness. The house of Sir John Mac-Morlan was a ladylike person, and well qualified by birth and manners to receive the visit, and to make her house agreeable to Miss Bertram. A home, therefore, and a shelter from the tears, and neither Lucy nor Mac-Morlan was a ladylike person, and well qualified by birth and manners to receive the visit, and to make her house agreeable to Miss Bertram. A home, therefore, and a shelter from the tears, and neither Lucy nor Mac-Morlan was a ladylike person, and well qualified by birth and manners to receive the visit, and to make her house agreeable to Miss Bertram. A home, therefore, and a shelter from the tears, and neither Lucy nor Mac-Morlan was a ladylike person, and well qualified by birth and manners to receive the visit, and to make her house agreeable to Miss Bertram.

When the least estimable qualities on either side, this task is always affecting—the present circumstances rendered it doubly so. All received their due, and even a trifle more, and with thanks and good wishes, with which some added tears, took farewell of their young mistress. There remained in the parlour only Mr. Mac-Morlan, who came to attend his guest to his house, Dominie Sampson and Miss Bertram. And now, said the poet, "I must bid farewell to one of my oldest and kindest friends.—God bless you, Mr. Sampson, and roque to you all the kindness of your instructions to your poor pupil, and your Grace, and that is a b— that I often hear from you." She slid into his hand a paper containing some pieces of gold, and rose, as if to leave the room.

Dominie Sampson also rose; but it was to stand apart with utter astonishment. The idea of parting from Miss Lucy, go where she might, had never once occurred to the simplicity of his understanding.—He laid the money on the table. It is certainly inadequate, said Mac-Morlan, mistaking his meaning, but the circumstances.

Mr. Sampson waved his hand impatiently. "It is not the lucre—it is not the lucre—but that I, that have a lover's loach, and drank of cup, for twenty years and more—to think that I am going to leave her—and to leave her in distress and dole—No, Miss Lucy, you need never think it! You would not have found it, even the dog, who would you use me waur than a meseen? No, Miss Lucy Bertram, while I live I will not separate from you. I'll be no burden—I have thought how to prevent that. I'll pit my dog up upon your nomination. I'll treat me not to leave thee, nor to depart from thee; for whither thou goest I'll go, and where thou dwellst I'll dwell; thy people shall be my people, and thy God, and that I did, and there will I be buried. The Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."

During this speech, the longest ever Dominie Sampson was known to utter, the affectionate creature's eyes started forth, and from his eye only did his master could refrain from sympathising with this unexpected burst of feeling and attachment. "Mr. Sampson, Mr. Mac-Morlan, after having had recourse to his snuff-box and handkerchief alternately, "my house is large enough, and if you will accept of a bed there, while Miss Bertram honours us with her residence, I shall think myself very happy; and, my roof much favoured by receiving a man of your words and fidelity therein, with a lady, or at a time to remove any objection on Miss Bertram's part to bringing with her this unexpected satellite, he added, "My business requires my frequently having occasion for my account with my present clerks, and I should be glad to have recourse to your assistance in that way now and then."

"Of a certainty, of a certainty," said Sampson eagerly; "I understand, book-keeping by double entry and the Italian method."

Our postillion had thrust himself into the room to announce his chaise and horses; he tarried, unobserved, during this extraordinary scene, and assured Mrs. Mac-Candidh it was the most moving thing he ever saw; "the death of the grey mare, poor hizzie, was nothing till't. This trifling circumstance afterwards had consequences of greater moment to the Dominie.

The visitors were hospitably welcomed by Mrs. Mac-Morlan, to whom, as well as to others, her husband intimated that he had engaged Dominie Sampson's assistance and protection during which occupation he would, for convenience sake, reside with the family. Mr. Mac-Morlan's knowledge of the world induced him to put this colour upon the matter, and the honest and affectionate spirit of the Dominie's attachment might be, both to his own heart and to the family of Ellangowan, his exterior ill qualified him to be a "squire of dames," and rendered him, upon the whole, rather a ridiculous appendage to a beautiful young woman of seventeen.

Dominie Sampson achieved with great zeal such tasks as Mr. Mac-Morlan chose to intrust him with; but it was not till after noon, when he had a trifle of his breakfast, that he repaired to the Dominie. After breakfast he regularly disappeared, and returned again about dinner time. The evening he occupied in the labour of the office. On Saturday, he appeared before Mac-Morlan, as though in triumph, and laid on the table two pieces of gold. "What is this for, Dominie?" said Mac-Morlan.

"First, to indemnify you of your charges in my behalf, and the balance for the use of Miss Lucy Bertram."

"But, Mr. Sampson, your labour in the office much more than compensates me—I am your debtor, my good friend."

"Then be it all," said the Dominie, waving his hand, "for Miss Lucy Bertram's behoof."

"Well, but, Dominie, this money?"

"It is honestly come, by Mr. Mac-Morlan; it is the bountiful reward of a young gentleman, to whom I am teaching the tongues; reading with him three hours daily."

A few more questions extracted from the Dominie that this liberal pupil was young Hazlewood, and that he met his preceptor daily at the house of Mrs. Mac-Candidh, whose proclamation of Sampson's disinterested attachment to the young lady had procured him this indefatigable and bounteous scholar.

Mac-Morlan was much struck with what he heard. Dominie Sampson was doubtless a very good scholar, and an excellent man, and the classics were unquestionably his especial delight; but a young man of twenty should ride seven miles and back again each day in the week, to hold this sort of instruction three hours, was a zdc to literature in which he was not prepared to give entire credit. Little art was necessary to sift the Dominie, for the honest man's head never admitted any but the most direct and simple ideas. "Does Miss Bertram know how your time is employed?"

"Surely not as yet—Mr. Charles recommended it should be concealed from her, lest she should scruple to accept of the small assistance arising from it; but, he added, it would not be possible to conceal it long, since Mr. Charles promised taking his lessons occasionally in this house."

"O, he does!" said Mac-Morlan. "Yes, yes, I can understand that. And pray, Mr. Sampson,
The letter contained but a few lines, deeply regretting and murmuring against Miss Bertram's cruelty, who not only refused to see him, but permitted him to be insulted with manacles. The latter seemed to contribute to her service. But it concluded with assurances that her severity was vain, and that nothing could shake the attachment of Charles Hazlwood.

Under the name of the friendless Mr. Mac-Morlan, Sampson picked up some other scholars—very different indeed from Charles Hazlwood in rank—and whose lessons were proportionally unproductive. Still, however, they formed some sort of a circle, and, with the glory of his heart to carry it to Mr. Mac-Morlan weekly, a slight peacemaker only subtracted, to supply his snuff-box and tobacco-pouch.

And her husband must have been by Strattington to look after our hero, lest our readers should fear they are to lose sight of him for another quarter of a century.

CHAPTER XVI.

Our Polly is a sad sot, nor needs what we have taught her; I wonder any man alive will ever rear a daughter.

For when she's drest with care and cost, all tempests, fires, and-tempests, fires, and tempests, fires.

As men should serve a cucumber, she fits herself away.

In Europe's Own.

After the death of Mr. Bertram, Manners had set out upon a short tour, proposing to return to the neighbourhood of Ellangowan before the sale of that property should take place. He went, accordingly, to Edinburgh and elsewhere, and it was in his return to the scene in which our scene lies, that, at a post-town about a hundred miles from Kiplingstran, to which he had requested his friend, Mr. Mervyn, to address his letters, he received one from that gentleman, which contained rather unpleasing intelligence. We have assumed already the privilege of acting a secretis to this gentleman, and therefore shall present the reader with an account of the circumstances.

"I beg your pardon, my dearest friend, for the pain I have given you, in forcing you to open wounds so tendering as those your letter referred to. I have always heard, though erroneously perhaps, that the attentions of Mr. Brown were intended for Miss Manners. But, however that were, it could not be supposed that in your situation his boldness should escape notice and censure. I write now, supposing that I am not entitled to defend my purse and person against a highwayman, so much as if I were a wild Indian, who owns neither law nor machinery. The decision to issue a request must be determined by my means and situation. But, if, armed and equal in force, I submit to injustice and violence from any man, high or low, I presume it will hardly be attributed to religious or moral feeling in me, or in any one but a quaker. An aggression on your honour seems to me much the same. The insult, however trifling in itself, is one of much deeper consequence to all classes in life than any wrong which is suffered in a fight with a robber on the highway, and to redress the injured party is much less in the power of public jurisprudence, or rather it is entirely beyond its reach. If any man chooses to rob Arthur Mervyn of the contents of this purse, supposing the said Arthur has not means of defence, or the skill and courage to use them, the asses at Lancaster or Carlisle will do him justice by taking up the robber and making him have the wolf. We men say, for this justice, and submit to being plundered in the first instance, if I have myself the means and spirit to protect my own property? But if an affront is offered to Arthur Mervyn, he will seek to defend my character for ever with men of honour, and for which the twelve Judges of England, with the Chancellor to boot, can afford me no redress, by whatever rule of law or men's opinions. God help me out of that, what ought to be, and is, so infinitely dearer to every man of honour than his whole fortune? Of the re-rigious views of the matter I shall say nothing, until I find a reverend divine who shall condemn self-de fence in the article of life and property. If its pro tection be generally admitted, I suppose little distinc tion can be drawn between defence of person and goods, and protection of reputation. That the latter is liable to be assailed by persons of a dif ferent spirit, and how it is to be met, is a question fair in character, cannot affect my legal right of self defence. I may be sorry that circumstances have engaged me in personal strife with such an indi vidual, and have cast me for a genera tious enemy who fell under my sword in a national garret. I shall leave the question with the casual ists; however; only observing, that what I have written will not avail either the professed traitor, or the man who is the aggressor in a dispute of honour. I only presume to exculpate him who is dragged into the field

CHAPTER XVII.

"Heaven first, in its mercy, taught mortal their letters, For ladies in limbo, and lovers in letters, Celebrates, with placing his foot before ye, Unwillingly leaves to write their own story."

When Manning returned to England, his first object had been to place his daughter in a seminary for female education, of established character. Not, however, finding her progress in the accomplishments with which he was so much pleased, as has his time and patience expected, he had withdrawn Miss Manning from the school at the end of the first quarter. So she had only time to form an eternal friendship with Miss Maria Marchmont, a young girl, but a stranger to her own age. Eighteen years. To her faithful eye were addressed those formidable quires which issued forth from Mervyn-Hall, on the wings of the post, while Miss Manning was a guest there. The perusal of a few short extracts from these may be necessary to render our story intelligible.

First Extract.

"Also! my dearest Matilda, what a tale is mine to tell! Misfortune from the cradle has set her seal upon your unhappy friend. That we should be severed for so slight a cause—an ungrammatical phrase in my Italian exercises, and three faults in one of Paisello's sonatas! But it is a part of my father's character, of whom it is impossible to say, whether I love, admire, or fear him the most. His success in life is a matter of habit, in making every tackle yield before the energy of his exertions, even where they seemed insurmountable—all these have given a hasty and peremptory cast to his character, which can neither endure contradiction, nor make allowance for deficiencies. Then he is himself so very accomplished. Do you know there was a murmur, half confirmed too by some mysterious words which dropped from my poor mother, that he possessed the science, now lost to the world, which enables the possessor to summon up before him the dark and shadowy forms of future events! Does not the very idea of such a power, or even of the high talent and commanding intellect which the world may mistake for it,—does it not, dear Matilda, throw a mysterious grandeur about its possessor? You will call this romantic, but consider I was born in the land of tale-man and spell, and my childhood filled by tales which you can only enjoy through the gnawing frigidity of a French translation. O Matilda, I wish you could have heard the beautiful tales of my grandfather Bannaleg who would bend the earnest devotion round the magic narrative, that flowed, half poetry, half prose, from the lips of the tale-teller! No wonder that European fiction seems to you but a poor affair—lack of imagination in which I have seen the romances of the East produce upon their hearers."

Second Extract.

"You are possessed, my dear Matilda, of my bosom-secret, in those sentiments with which I regard Brown. I will not say his memory. I am convinced he lives, and is faithful. His addresses to me were countenanced by my deceased parent; impossibly countenanced perhaps, considering the prejudices of my father, in favour of birth and rank. But I, then almost a girl, could not be expected surely to be wiser than her, under whose charge I nature had placed me. My father, constantly engaged in military duty, I saw but at rare intervals, and was taught to look up to him with more awe than confidence. Would to Heaven it had been otherwise! It might have been better for us all at this day!"

Third Extract.

"You ask me why I do not make known to my father that Brown yet lives, at least that he survived the wound he received in that unhappy duel; and had we been separated, this secret, with all my love for him, ever since my early years, and his hope of speedily escaping from captivity. A soldier, that in the trade of war has often slain men, feels probably no uneasiness at reflecting even the supposed catastrophe, which almost turned me into stone. And should I show him that letter, does it not follow, that Brown, alive and maintaining with pertinacity the pretensions to this letter for your poor friend, for which my father formerly sought his life, would be a more formidable disturber of Colonel Manning's peace of mind than in his supposed grave, and might escape from the hands of his pursuers, the marauders, I am convinced he will soon be in England, and then it will be time to consider how his existence is to be disclosed to my father—But if, alas! any ear has heard of any carriage that escapes from Mervyn-Hall, what would it avail to tear open a mystery fraught with so many painful recollections?—My dearest mother had such dread of its being known, that I think she even suffered from the fear of being suspected of attentions directed towards herself, rather than permit him to discover their real object; and O, Matilda, whatever respect I owe to the memory of a deceased parent, let me do justice to a living one. I cannot but condemn the dubious policy which she adopted, as unjust to my father, and highly perilous to herself and me. But peace be with her ashes! her actions were guided by the best intentions. No could bear her head; and shall her daughter, who inherits all her weakness, be the first to withdraw the veil from her defects?"

Fourth Extract.

"Mervyn-Hall.

"If India be the land of magic, this, my dearest Matilda, is the country of romance. The scenery is romantic, the costumes such as the poet's dreams—sounding caracasses—hills which rear their scathed heads to the sky—lakes, that, winding up the shadowy valleys, lead at every turn to yet more romantic scenes—hills which catch the clouds of heaven. All the wildness of Salvador here, and there the fairy scenes of Claude. I am happy, too, in finding at least one object upon which my father can share my enthusiasm; for I am the first to whom he has imparted the smart of his artist and a poet. I have experienced the utmost pleasure from the observations by which he explains the character and the effect of these brilliant specimens of her power. I wish he would settle in this enchanting land. But his views lie still further north, and he is at present absent on a tour in Scotland, looking, I believe, for some purchase of land which may suit him as a residence. He is partial, from early recollections, to that country. So, my dearest Matilda, I must be yet further removed from you before I am established in a home. And O how delighted shall I be when I can return, Matilda, and be the guest of your faithful Julia!"

"I am at present the inmate of Mr. and Mrs. Mervyn, old friends of my father. The latter is precisely the appearance of a good son of his, but from the wonderful effect his sickly nature has on him, to be, for accomplishments or fancy,—good luck, my dearest Matilda, your friend might as well seek sympathy from Mrs. Teachem, you see I have not forgot school nicknames. Mervyn is a very good man—quite a different being from my father, yet he amuses and endures me, He is fat and good-nature'd, gifted with strong shrewd sense, and some powers of humour; but having been himself, I suppose, in youth, has still some pretension to be a beau garçon, as well as an enthusiastic agriculturalist. I delight to make him scramble to the tops of eminences and to the top of weald, and to look at the view, and to see him as happy as I believe to have seen him, in the smile on his face, with the grace of his figure, his turn, and his mirth. He thinks me, I fancy, a simple romantic Miss, with some,—the word will be out beauty, and some good nature; and I hold that the gentleman has good taste for the female outside, and do not expect he should comprehend my sentiments further. So he talks, hands, and hobbies, (for the dear creature has got the good of it too), and tells old stories of high life of which he has seen a great deal; and I listen, and smile, and look as pretty, as pleasant, and as simple as I can, and we do very well.

"But, to return to Matilda, how would time pass away, even in this paradise of romance, tenanted as it is by a pair assorting so ill with the scenes around them, were it not for your fidelity in replying to my uninteresting details? Pray do not fail to write.
three times a-week at least—you can be at no loss what to say.

Fifth Extract.

"How shall I communicate what I have now to tell?—My hand and heart still flutter so much, that the attempt is impossible!—Did I say that he lived? did I not say I would not despair? How could you suggest, my dear Matilda, that my feelings, considering I had parted from him so young, rather arose from the warmth of my imagination than of my heart?—O! I was sure that they were genuine, deceitful as the dictates of our bosom so frequently are—but to my tale—let it be, my friend, the mother of all the rest as it is the most sincere, pledge of our friendship.

"Our hours here are early—earlier than my heart, with its load of care, can compose itself to rest. I therefore, usually take a book for my companion, and retire to my own room, which I think I have told you opens to a small balcony, looking down upon that beautiful lake, of which I attempted to give you a sketch. Mervyn-ball, being partly an ancient building, and constructed with a view to defence, is situated on the verge of the lake. A stone dropped from the projecting balcony plunges into water deep enough to float a ship. I had left my window partly unbarred, that, before I went to bed, I might, according to my custom, look out and see the moonlight shining upon the lake. I was deeply engaged with that which had long occupied the Marchant family, and which, like many others, the Marchants were so pleased to hear. Two lovers, describing the stillness of a summer night, enhance each other's charms, and was lost in the associations of story and of feeling which it awakened, when I heard upon the lake the sound of a fragile boat, and looked out of my window to see who might be the object of my affection. Who could touch it in a night which, though still and serene, was too cold, and too late in the year, to invite forth any wanderer for mere pleasure! Driven by the wind against the windless atmosphere, the sounds paused a space, were then resumed—paused again—and again reached my ear, ever coming nearer and nearer. At length, I divined that writing was almost indistinguishable, and hearing what you called my favourite—I have told you by whom it was taught me—the instrument, the tones, were his own!—was it earthly music, or notes passing on the wind, to soothe the ear and delight the soul?

"It was some time ere I could summon courage to step on the balcony—nothing could have emboldened me to do so but the strong conviction of my mind, that if I were to see the very man of my affections—so long enduring silence, and through the shadow of the night, as perfectly as if we had parted yesterday, and met again in the broad sun-shine! He guided his boat under the balcony, and spoke to me; I hardly knew what he said, or what I replied. Indeed, I could scarcely speak for weeping, but they were joyful tears. We were disturbed by the barking of a dog at some distance, and parted, but not before he had consoled me to present a means to meet him at the same place and hour this evening.

"But where and to what is all this tending?—Can I answer this question? I cannot. Heaven, that saved him from destruction, and delivered him from captivity; that saved my father too, from shedding the blood of one who would not have blemished a hair of his head, that heaven must guide me out of this labyrinth of error, and lead me to the true path. For me, at a time of great trial, of mental anguish, that Matilda shall not blush for her friend, my father for his daughter, nor my lover for her upon whom he has fixed his affection."

CHAPTER XVIII.

Talk with a man out of a window—a proper saying.

We must proceed with our extracts from Miss Manning's letters, which throw light upon natural soul passions, principles, and feelings, blanished by an imperfect education and the folly of a misjudging mother, who called her husband of her tyrant until she feared him as much, and read romances until she became so enamoured of the complicated intrigues which they contain, as to assume the management of a little family novel of her own, and consider her, my dear Matilda, as the principal heroine. She delighted in petty mystery, and intrigue, and secrets, and yet trembled at the indignation which these paltry manoeuvres excited in her husband's mind. Thus she was, upon a scheme merely for pleasure, or perhaps for the love of contradiction, plunged deeper into it than she was aware, endeavour to extricate herself by new arts, or by seeking her error by devoting herself involved in meshes of her own weaving, and was forced to carry on, for fear of discovery, machinations which she had at first resorted to in mere wantonness.

Fortunately the young man whom she so imprudently introduced into her intimate society, and encouraged to look up to her daughter, had a fund of principle and honest pride, which rendered him a safer intimate than Mrs. Manning ought to have dared to hope or expect. The obscurity of his birth could alone be objected to him; in every other respect, with prospects bright upon the world he came, pure love of virtue, strong desire of fame; Men watched the way his lofty mind would take, and all foresaw the course which it was going to make.

But it could not be expected that he should resist the snare which Mrs. Manning's imprudence threw in his way, or avoid becoming attached to a young lady, whose beauty and manners might have justified his passion, even in scenes where these were more generally met with, than in a remote fortress in our Indian-settlements. The scenes which followed have been partly detailed in Manning's letter to Mr. Mervyn; and, to expand what there stated into a further explanation, would be to abuse the patience of our readers.

We shall, therefore, proceed with our promised extracts from Miss Manning's letters to her friend.

Sixth Extract.

"I have seen him again, Matilda—seen him twice. I have used every argument to convince him that this secret intercourse is dangerous to us both—even pressed him to pursue his views of fortune without further regard to the want of a mind as sufficiently secured by the knowledge that he had not fallen under my father's sword. He answers—how can I tell all he has to answer? but he claims the right of my heart, and he induced him to entertain, and would persuade me to the madness of a union without my father's sanction. But to this, Matilda, I will not be persuaded. I have resisted, I have subdued the rebellious feelings which arose to aid his plea; yet how to extricate myself from this unhappy labyrinth, in which fate and folly have entangled us both!

"I have thought upon it, Matilda, till my head is almost giddy—nor can I conceive a better plan than to make a full confession to my father. He deserves it, for his kindness is unceasing; and I think I have observed in his character, since I have studied it more nearly, that his harsher feelings are chiefly excited where he suspects deceit or imposition; and in that respect, perhaps, his character was formerly misunderstood by one who was dear to him. He has, too, a time of great provocation, when I have seen the narrative of a generous action, a trait of heroism, or virtuous self-denial, extract tears from him, which refused to flow at a time of much distress. But then, Broth , God be thanked that he is so unworthy of him—And the obscurity of his birth—that would be indeed a stumbling-block. Matilda, I hope none of your ancestors ever sought at Pointier or Agnacourt! After all, Matilda, my father attaches to the memory of old Sir Miles Manning, I should make out my explanation with such the tremor which must now attend it."
SEVENTH EXTRACT.

"I have this instant received your letter—your most welcome letter!—Thanks, my dearest friend, for your sympathy and your counsels—I can only repay them with unbounded confidence.

But your silence is by origin, that his descent should be so unpleasing to my father. His story is shortly told. He is of Scottish extraction, but, being left an orphan, his education was undertaken by a family of relations, settled in Holland. He was bred to commerce, and sent very early to one of our settlements in the East, where his guardian had a correspondent. But this correspondent was dead when he arrived, and the trade was not so resource than to offer himself as a clerk to a counting-house. The breaking out of the war, and the straits to which we were at first reduced, threw the army open to men who were disposed to embrace that mode of life, and Brown, whose genius had a strong military tendency, was the first to leave what might have been the road to wealth, and to choose that of fame. This I took to you, to convince the irritation of my father, who despises commerce, (though, by the way, the best part of his property was made in that honourable profession by my great-uncle,) and has a particular antipathy to the war. He would have been the first to judge whether he would be likely to receive proposals for his only child from Vanbeest Brown, educated for charity by the house of Vanbeest and Vanbruggen! O, Matilda, it will never do!—it will never do! I have no presentiment, nothing to throb with his aristocratic feelings. Mrs. Vanbeest Brown! The name has little to recommend it, to be sure.—What children we are!"

EIGHTH EXTRACT.

"It is all over now, Matilda!—I shall never have courage to tell my father—nay, most deeply do I fear he has already suspected my secret from another quarter, which will entirely remove the grace of my communication, and ruin whatever gleam of hope I had ventured to connect with it. Yet sternly, Brown came as usual, and his flagon on the table announced his approach. We had agreed, that he should continue to use this signal. These romantic lakes attract numerous visitors, who indulge their enthusiasm in visiting the scenery at all hours, and we hoped, that if Brown were noticed from the house, he might pass for one of those admirers of nature, who was giving vent to his feelings through the medium, that it sounds like any other to be my say, should I be observed on the balcony. But last night, while I was eagerly enforcing my plan of a full confession to my father, which he earnestly deprecated, I heard a toast raised to Mr. Mervyn's health, which is under my room, open softly. I signed to Brown to make his retreat, and immediately re-entered, with some faint hopes that our interview had not been observed."

"But, alas! Matilda, these hopes vanished the instant I beheld Mr. Mervyn's countenance at breakfast the next morning. He looked so provokingly intelligent and confidential, that, had I dared, I could have been more angry than ever I was in my life; but I must be on good behaviour, and my walks are now limited within his farm precincts, where the good gentleman can amble along by my side without inconvenience. I have detected him once or twice attempting to sound my thoughts, and watch the expression of my countenance. He has talked of the flagon more than once, and has, at different times, made eulogiums upon the watchfulness and ferocity of his dogs, and the regularity with which the keeper makes his rounds with a loaded fowling-piece. He would be truly happy in the company of a young gentleman who loves shooting. I should be loath to affront my father's old friend in his own house; but I do long to show him that I am my father's daughter, a fact of which Mr. Mervyn will certainly approve, if I return a reply to these incipient hints. Of one thing I am certain—I am grateful to him on that account— he has not told Mrs. Mervyn. Lord help me, I should have had such lectures about the dangers of love and the night air on the lake, the risk arising from colds and fortune-hunters, the comfort and convenience of sack—which Mr. Mervyn would propose; and finally, reasoning, Matilda, though my heart is sad enough. What Brown will do I cannot guess. I presume, however, the fear of detection prevents his resuming his nocturnal expeditions. We may now, without being on the shore of the lake, under the name, he tells me, of Dawson, he has a bad choice in names, that must be allowed. He has not left the army, I believe, but he says he left the army in order to travel in France."

"To complete my anxiety, my father is returned suddenly, and in high displeasure. Our good hostess, as I learned from a bustling conversation between two ladies at the house, and knew nothing of it, and engaged him for a week; but I rather suspect his arrival was no surprise to his friend Mr. Mervyn. His manner to me was singularly cold and constrained—sufficiently to intermediate between me and what he supposed I once resolved to throw myself on his generosity. He lays the blame of his being discomposed and out of humour to the loss of a purchase in the south-west of Scotland, on which he had set his heart so firmly. I do not suspect the sensibility of being overtaken and thrown off its balance. His first excursion was with Mr. Mervyn's horse across the lake, to the inn I have mentioned. You may imagine the agony with which I waited. I was in a frenzy to know if there was any chance of seeing him. I can guess the consequence! He returned, however, apparently without having made any discovery. I understand, that, in consequence of his late disappointment, he has returned to his own sphere. Happily, the neighbourhood of this same Ellangowan, of which I am doomed to hear so much—he seems to think it probable that the estate for which he wishes may soon be again in the market. I will not send away this letter until I hear more distinctly what are his intentions."

"I have now had an interview with my father, as confidential as I presume, he means to allow me. He requested me to-day, after breakfast, to walk with him into the library; my knees, Matilda, shook under me, and it was no exaggeration to say, I could scarce follow him into the room. I feared, I knew not what—From my childhood I had seen all around him tremble at his brow. He motioned me to seat myself, and I never obeyed a command so readily, for, in truth, I could hardly stand. He himself continued to walk up and down the room. You have seen my father, and noticed, I recollect, the remarkable expression of his eyes, the usually soft expression, now naturally rather light in colour, but agitation or anger gives them a darker and more fiery glance; he has a custom also of drawing in his lips, when much moved, with a movement of his mouth that indicates the en- durance of temper and the habitual power of self-command. This was the first time we had been alone since his return from Scotland, and, as he betrayed these tokens of agitation, I had little doubt that he was about to enter upon the subject I most dreaded."

"To my unutterable relief, I found I was mistaken, and that whatever he knew of Mr. Mervyn's suspicions or discoveries, he did not intend to converse with me on the topic. Coward as I was, I was inexpressibly relieved, though if he had really investigated the reports which may have come to his ear, the reality could have been nothing to what my apprehensions might have conceived. But, though my spirits rose high at my unexpected escape, I had not courage myself to pursue the discussion, and remained silent to receive his commands."

"Julia," he said, "my agent writes me from Scotland, that he has been able to hire a house for me, decently furnished, and with the necessary accommodation. It is only three miles of that I had designated to purchase."—Then he made a pause, and seemed to expect an answer.

"Whatever place of residence suits you, sir, must be perfectly safe and convenient, and to me the isolation of this house during the winter would suit you."

Mr. and Mrs. Mervyn, thought I to myself, —
'Whatever company is agreeable to you, sir,' I answered aloud.

'Not at all, too much of this universal spirit of submission; an excelle[r]nt disposition in action, but your constantly repeating the jargon of it, puts me in mind of the eternal salams of our black dependants in the household of Julia. I am sure I have a respect for society, and I intend to invite a young person, the daughter of a deceased friend, to spend a few months with us.'

'Not at all, it is a nonsense for the love of Heaven, papa,' exclaimed poor I, my fears at that moment totally getting the better of my prudence.

'No, not a governess, Miss Mannerings,' replied the Colonel, "but I have been acquainted with a lady from whose excellent example, bred as she has been in the school of adversity, I trust you may learn the art to govern yourself.'

'It is nonsense, sir; I will go no further on so dangerous a ground, so there was a pause.

'Is the young lady a Scotchwoman, papa?'

'Yes—dryly enough.

'Has she the same accent, sir?'

'Much of the devil!' answered my father, hastily.

'do you think I care about accent, and is it is a woman, do you think it is a matter of any moment at all, or am I to be expected to care about accent—Is there something to be taken up with accent which you call such—(was not that very harshly said, Matilda)—I shall never wish to give you an opportunity at least to make one deserving female a subject of conversation, and have resolved that this young lady shall be a member of my family for some months, and I expect you will pay her that attention which is due to misfortune and virtue.'

'Include me, sir, in my future friend red-haired?'

'He gave me one of his stern glances; you will say, perhaps, I deserved it; but I think the duce prompts me with teasing questions on such occasions.

'She is as superior to you, my love, in personal appearance, as your prudence and affection for your friend are to your acquaintance with her.

'Lord, papa, do you think that superiority a recommendation—Well, sir, but I see you are going to take all this too seriously; whatever the young lady may be, I am sure, being recommended by you, she shall have no reason to complain of my want of attention.—(After a pause)—Has she any attendant? because you know I must provide for her proper accommodation.

'No—no—properly an attendant—the chaplain who lived with her father is a very sort of man, and I believe I shall make room for him in the house.'

'Chaplain, papa? Lord bless us!'

'Yes, Miss Mannerings, chaplain; is there any thing very new in that word? Had we not a chaplain at home when I was young, papa?'

'Yes, papa, but you was a commands then.'

'So I will be now, Miss Mannerings,—in my own family at least.'

'Certainly, sir—but will be read us the Church of England service?'

'The apparent simplicity with which I asked this question got the better of his gravity. 'Come, Julia,' he said, 'you are a sad girl, but I gain nothing by scolding you—Of these two strangers, the young lady is one whom you cannot fail, I think, to love—the person whom, for want of a better term, I called chaplain, is a very worthy, and somewhat ridiculous personage, who will never find out you laugh at him, if you don't laugh very loud indeed.'

'Dear papa, I am delighted with that part of his character.—But pray, is the house we are going to as pleasantly situated as this?'

'Not perhaps as much to your taste—there is no lake under the windows, and you will be under the necessity of being on my arm whenever you wish to have your air. This last coup de main ended the keen encounter of our wits, for you may believe, Matilda, it quelled all my courage to reply.

'The meeting, I think, perhaps will appear too manifest from this dialogue, have risen insensibly, and, as it were, in spite of myself. Brown alive, and free, and in England! Embarrassment and anxiety I can and must endure. We leave this in two days for our new residence. I shall not fail to let you know what I think of these Scotch inmates, whom I have but too much reason to believe my father means to quarter in his house as a bravo of honourable spies; a sort of female Rosencreutz and reverend Guildenstern, one in tartan petticoats, the other in a cassock.

'What a condition to be in!—Well, I am safe, if I am secured to myself! I shall write instantly on my arriving at our new place of abode, and acquaint you of my nearest Matilda with the further fates of—her Julia Mannerings.'

WOODCOURT, the habituation which Mannerings, by Mr. Mac-Morlan's mediation, had hired for a season, was a large house, neatly set in a park about a mile, and on a hill covered with wood, which shaded the house upon the north and east; the front looked upon a little lawn bordered by a grove of old trees; there I have resolved that this young lady shall be a member of my family for some months, and I expect you will pay her that attention which is due to misfortune and virtue.

Certainly, sir, in my future friend red-haired?

He gave me one of his stern glances; you will say, perhaps, I deserved it; but I think the duce prompts me with teasing questions on such occasions.

She is as superior to you, my love, in personal appearance, as your prudence and affection for your friend are to your acquaintance with her.

Lord, papa, do you think that superiority a recommendation—Well, sir, but I see you are going to take all this too seriously; whatever the young lady may be, I am sure, being recommended by you, she shall have no reason to complain of my want of attention.—(After a pause)—Has she any attendant? because you know I must provide for her proper accommodation.

No—no—properly an attendant—the chaplain who lived with her father is a very sort of man, and I believe I shall make room for him in the house.

Chaplain, papa? Lord bless us!

Yes, Miss Mannerings, chaplain; is there anything very new in that word? Had we not a chaplain at home when I was young, papa?

Yes, papa, but you were a command then.

So I will be now, Miss Mannerings,—in my own family at least.

Certainly, sir—but will be read us the Church of England service?

The apparent simplicity with which I asked this question got the better of his gravity. 'Come, Julia,' he said, 'you are a sad girl, but I gain nothing by scolding you—Of these two strangers, the young lady is one whom you cannot fail, I think, to love—the person whom, for want of a better term, I called chaplain, is a very worthy, and somewhat ridiculous personage, who will never find out you laugh at him, if you don't laugh very loud indeed.

Dear papa, I am delighted with that part of his character.—But pray, is the house we are going to as pleasantly situated as this?

Not perhaps as much to your taste—there is no lake under the windows, and you will be under the necessity of being on my arm whenever you wish to have your air. This last coup de main ended the keen encounter of our wits, for you may believe, Matilda, it quelled all my courage to reply.
presse into the situation of an humble companion. Lucy Bertram, with some hesitation, accepted the invitation to reside a few weeks with Miss Manning. She had not been in the situation of a gentleman's dairy maid; but she could not suppose that her kindness might disguise the truth, her principal motive was a generous desire to afford her her situation and protection, which his high connexions, and higher interest, were likely to render influential in the neighbourhood.

About the same time the orphan girl received a letter from Mr. Bertram, the relation to whom she had written so long ago, and even her most fervent imagination could not have thought of. It enclosed, indeed, a small sum of money, but strongly recommended economy, and that Miss Bertram should board herself in some quiet family, such as her youth and circumstance would well fit. She declined the money, but would accept the offer. This had the effect of enabling her to retain her independence, and she was enabled to act as she proposed.

On the same evening, when Miss Bertram was on her way home, she met Miss Mansfield, who had just arrived from her visit to Colonel and Miss Manning. This meeting came as a surprise, as Miss Bertram had not expected to see her again so soon.

The first time in his life that he had ever thought of meeting Miss Bertram was when he went to stand trial for his license as a preacher.

When the Dominie first heard the liberal proposal of Colonel Manning, he turned a jealous and doubtful face towards Miss Bertram, as if he suspected that the project involved her separation; but when Mr. Mac-Morlan hastened to explain that she would be in the house of Woodbourne for some time, he rubbed his huge hands together, and burst into a portentous sort of chuckle, like that of the Affrite in the tale of the Affrite and the Affrite.

He was aware, from his knowledge of mankind, that Manning, though generous and benevolent, had the foible of expecting equality of respect and some veneration from all his dependents, and that he was more than once from the garret to the stables. Mrs. Mac-Morlan, in a letter of recommendation, comprehended the dining parlour, housekeeper's room, and

A gigantic genius, fits to grapple with whole libraries. Boswell's Life of Johnson.

The appointed day arrived, when the Colonel and Miss Manning were expected at Woodbourne. The hour was fast approaching, and the little circle within doors had each their separate subjects of anxiety. Mac-Morlan naturally desired to touch himself the patronage and countenance of a person of Manning's wealth and consequence. He was aware, from his knowledge of mankind, that Manning, though generous and benevolent, had the foible of expecting equality of respect and some veneration from all his dependents, and that he was more than once from the garret to the stables. Mrs. Mac-Morlan, in a letter of recommendation, comprehended the dining parlour, housekeeper's room, kitchen. She was only afraid that the dinner might be spoiled, to the discredit of her housewife accomplishments. Even the usual passiveness of the Dominic was so far disturbed, that he twice went to the window, which looked out upon the avenue, and twice exclaimed: "Is this the 'front of your chariot?'" Lucy, the most quiet of the expectants, had her own melancholy thoughts. She was now about to be consigned to the charge, almost to the banishment, of strangers, with whose character, though hitherto very amiable displayed, she was but imperfectly acquainted. The moments, therefore, of suspense passed anxiously and heavily.

As the clacking of the tramplings of horses, and the sound of wheels, were heard. The servants, who had already arrived, drew up in the hall to receive their master and mistress, with an importance and emotion which, to Lucy, who had never been accustomed to society, or witnessed what is called the manners of the great, had something alarming. Mac-Morlan went to the door to receive the master and mistress of the family, and in a few moments they were in the drawing-room.

Manning, who had travelled as usual on horseback, entered with his daughter hanging upon his arm, a tall unshaken, but over-sentimental, formed with much elegance; piercing dark eyes, and jet-black hair of great length, corresponded with the gravity and intelligence of features, in which were blended a reserve and an indifference, Staluness, a great deal of shrewdness, and some power of humorous sarcasm. "I shall not like her," was the result of Lucy Bertram's first glance; "and yet I rather think I shall welcome her, but I am not entitled to the second.

Miss Manning was furred and mantled up to the throat against the severity of the weather; the Colonel in his military great-coat. He bowed to Mrs. Mac-Morlan, his daughter and his daughter's husband, with a fashionable curtsey, not dropped so low as at all to accommodate her person. The Colonel then led his daughter up to Miss Bertram, and, taking the hand of her new guest, said: "Miss Bertram, this is my daughter, my only daughter; and, with the most paternal affection, he said, "Lucy, this is the young lady whom I hope our good friends have prevailed on to honour our house with a long visit. I shall be much gratified indeed if you can render Woodborne as pleasant to Miss Bertram, as Ellangowan was to me when I first came as a wanderer into this country."

The young lady curtsied acquiescence, and took her new friend's hand. Manning now turned his eye upon the Dominic, who had made bows since his entrance into the room, sprawling out his leg, and being conscious that the attention extended to expect the same movement until the motion is stifled by the artist. "My good friend, Mr. Sampson," said Manning, introducing him to his daughter, and leaving at this time to the young gentleman the daring, notwithstanding he had himself some disposition to join her too obvious inclination to reflection. "This gentleman, Julie, is to put my books in order when they arrive, and I expect to derive great advantage from his extensive learning."

"I am sure we are obliged to the gentleman, papa, and, to borrow a ministerial mode of giving thanks, I shall never forget the extraordinary circumstances. It is very kind of you, Miss Bertram."

She continued she hastily, for her father's bows began to darken, "we have travelled a good way,—will you permit me to retire before dinner?"

When the day was concluded, Manning took an opportunity of a minute's conversation with his daughter in private.

"How do you like your guests, Julia?"

"Miss Bertram of all things—but this is a most interesting excitement; I shall be able to look him at without laughing,"

"While he is under my roof, Julia, every one must learn to do so."

"Lord, papa, the very footmen could not keep their gravity!"

"Then let them strip off my livery," said the Colonel, "and laugh at their leisure. Mr. Sampson is a man whom I esteem for his simplicity and benevolence of character."

"Oh, I am convinced of his generosity too," said this lively lady; "he cannot lift a spoolful of sand to his mouth without bestowing a share on every thing round."

"Julia, you are incorrigible—but remember I expect your mirth to be temperate and proportioned; that it shall neither offend this worthy man's feelings, nor those of Miss Bertram, who may be more apt to feel upon his account than he on his own. And so, good night, my daughter, and recollect, that though Mr. Sampson has certainly not sacrificed to the graces, there are many things in this world more truly deserving of ridicule than either awkwardness of manners or simplicity of character."

In a day or two Mr. and Mrs. Mac-Morlan left Woodborne, after taking an affectionate farewell of their late guest. The household were now settled in the Abbey. Their new guest was in a great deal of studies and amusements together. Colonel Manning was greatly surprised to find that Miss Bertram was well skilled in French and Italian, thanks to the lessons of her father, and able to understand and readily make him acquainted with most modern as well as ancient languages. Of music she knew little or nothing, but her new friend undertook to give her her lessons; in mathematics she was to learn from Lucy the habit of walking, and the art of riding, and the courage necessary to defy the season. Manning was careful to substitute for their amusement the 'company of the countryside' in a solid instruction with entertainment, and as he read aloud with great skill and taste, the winter nights passed pleasantly away.

Julia and I discovered where there were so many inducements. Most of the families of the neighborhood visited Colonel Manning, and he was soon able to select from among them such as best suited his taste and habits. Charles H. was held a distinguished place in his favour, and was a frequent visitor, not without the consent and approbation of his parents; for there was no knowing what they thought, what assiduous attention might produce, and the beautiful Miss Manning, of high family, with an Indian fortune, was a prize worth looking after. Dazzled with such a prospect, they never considered the propriety of his treatment of Lucy Bertram, who had nothing on earth to recommend her, but a passionate, good nature, and a natural disposition. Manning was more prudent. He considered himself acting as Miss Bertram's guardian, and, while he did not think it incumbent upon him altogether to check her intercourse with a young gentleman for whom, excepting in wealth, she was a match in every respect, he laid it under such insensible restraints as might prevent any engagement or elaisement taking place upon the young mans head, as he had more of life about him, and, have attained that age when he might be considered as entitled to judge for himself in the matter in which his happiness was chiefly interested.

While this matter was engaged the attention of the other members of the Woodborne family, Dominic Sampson was occupied, body and soul, in the arrangement of the late bishop's library, which had been sent there, and of course the company again assembled in the drawing-room, and from thence adjourned to the dining-parlor.

When the day was concluded, Manning took an opportunity of a minute's conversation with his daughter in private.

"How do you like your guests, Julia?"

"Miss Bertram of all things—but this is a most interesting excitement; I shall be able to look him at without laughing," and now his vanity and delight in being superintendent of the collection, raised him, in his own opinion, to a considerable range above the common man, which he had always regarded as the greatest and happiest man on earth. Neither were his transports diminished upon a hasty examination of the contents of these various cabinets, pictures, prints, curiosities, pieces of plays, or mummies, he tossed indignant aside, with the implied censure of "psalm," or "frivolous;" but the greater and bulkier part of the collection bore a very different character. The dressed pelisse, a divine of the old and deeply-learned cast, had loaded his shelves with volumes which displayed the antique and venerable attributes so happily described by a modern poet:

That weight of wood, with bolder seat o'er said,
Those ample walls of solid marble, etc.
The close-pressed deal was unspared for any age,
And ever thus the sage of Spenser Gloated with rapture. He entered them in the catalogue in his best running hand, forming each letter with the care of a lover who would label a voluntaire, with which he placed individually on the destined shelf with all the reverence which I have seen a lady pay to a jar of old china. With all this zeal his labours advanced but slowly, often obliged to give up the volume when half-way up the library steps, full soon his interest passing, and, without shifting his inconvenient posture, continued immersed in the fascinating re-ual until the servant pulled him by the skirts to assure him that dinner waited. He then required to take a parloir, bolted his food down his capacious throat in squares of three inches, answered ay and no at ran-don to whatever question was asked at him, and again hurried back to the library, as soon as his napkin was removed, and sometimes with it hanging round his neck like a pin-fore

How happily the days
Of that time went by.

And, having thus left the principal characters of our tale in a situation, which, being sufficiently comfortable to themselves, is, of course, utterly uninter-esterly, I cannot find myself taking up the story of a person who has as yet only been named, and who has all the interest that uncertainty and misfortune can give.

CHAPTER XXI

What say' st thou, Wise-One?—that all powerful Love
Can fortune's strong impediments remove?
Nay, it appears that worth should wed to worth,
The pride of genius with the pride of birth.

V. BROWN—I will not give at full length his thrice unhappy name—had been from infancy a ball for fortune to spurn at; but nature had given him that elasticity of mind which raises higher from the rebound. His form was tall, manly, and active, and his features corresponded with his person; for, although far from handsome, they had an expression of intelligence and good humour, and when he spoke, or was particularly animated, might be decidedly pronounced interesting. His manner indicated the military proession, which had been his choice, and in which he now had attained the rank of captain, the person who succeeded Colonel Manning in his command having laboured to repair the injustice which Brown had for a long time suffered. They had an expression of gratitude and friendliness towards him. But this, as well as his liberation from capitivity, had taken place after Manning left India.
Brown followed at no distant period, his regiment being recalled home. His first inquiry was after the family of Manning, and, early learning their route northward, followed it with the purpose of resuming his addresses to Julia. With her father he declared he had no measures to keep; for, ignorant of the more venous belief which had been instilled into the Colonel's mind, he regarded him as an oppressive and despicable character, who would be a commanding officer to deprive him of the preference due to his behaviour, and who had forced upon him a personal quarrel without any better reason than his attentions to a pretty woman, intolerable to herself, and permitted and countenanced by her mother. He was determined, therefore, to take no rejection unless from the young lady herself, believing that the heavy misfortune which had befallen him and imprisonment were direct injuries received from his father, which might dispense with his using much ceremony towards him. How for his scheme had succeeded is not to be told, but it was most nearly discovered and unmasked by Mr. Mervyn, our readers are already informed.

Upon this unpleasant occurrence, Captain Brown absented himself from the inn in which he had resided for the last few days, and Captain and Manserial's attempts to discover and trace him were unavailing. He resolved, however, that no difficulties should prevent his continuing his enterprise, while Julianna, on the contrary, was well pleased to learn his mode of thinking and intentions from his own communication to his special friend and confidant, Captain Delaselle, a Swiss gentleman, who had a company in his regiment.

Extract.

"Let me hear from you soon, dear Delaselle.

"Remember, I can leave nothing about residential affairs but the actual occurrences; and I long to know what has become of Ayre's court-martial, and whether Elliot has the majority; also how recruiting comes on, and how the young officers like me and my friends, etc.

"I need ask nothing;—I saw him as I passed through Nuttington, happy in the bosom of his family.

"What a happiness it is, Philip, for us poor devils, that we have a little station of life, and can get away, and the grave, if we can manage to escape disease, and steel, and lead, and the effects of hard living. A retired soldier is always a grateful and respected char-pacter. He智能化 a ray of light; and then, if his is licensed muffing—were a lawyer, or a physician, or a clergyman, to breathe a complaint of hard luck or want of preferment, a hundred officers would say "enough."

"But the most stupid veteran that ever faltered out the thirteenth tale of a siege and a battle, and a cock and a bottle, is listened to with sympathy and re-tent assistance, which raises his thin blood even with indignation of the boys that are put over his head.
And you and I, Delaselle, foreigners both,—for what am I the better that I was originally a Scotchman, since, could I prove my descent, for the English are a wise noble; while they praise themselves, and affect to undervalue all other nations, they leave us, luckily, trap-doors and back-doors open, by which we strangers, less favoured by nature, may arrive at a share of the advantages. And thus they are, in some respects, like a boastful landlord, who exalts the value and flavour of his six-years-old mutton, while he is as lighted to dispense a share of it to all the company.

"In short, you, whose proud family, and I, whose hard fate, made us soldiers of fortune, have the pleasant recollection, that in the British service, stop where we may, we may not, we have the option of paying the turnpike, and not from our being prohibited to travel the road.
If, therefore, you can persuade little Weisecul to come into ours, for God's sake let him buy my horse, lend me his money, think of his minds, and all that is done in the service, and trust to the fate for promotion.

"And now, I hope you are exasperating with curiosity to learn the end of my romance. I told you I had

"Did you know that Colonel Manning was a draughtsman?—I believe not, for he scorned to dis-play his accomplishments to the view of a subaltern. He draws beautifully, however. Since he and Julia left Mervyn-Hall, it is said, she has been seen every month, she seems, it wanted a set of drawings made up, of which Manning had done the first four, but was interrupted, by his hasty departure, in his purpose of

He repeated to me more than once, 'I have that to say, which will alter your hard opinion of our late Coloncl. But death pressed him too hard; and if he were to write, as his actions seemed to imply, he died before it could be made.

Part of Brown's view in choosing that usual tract was doubtless the conviction that no retired corner of Scotland, no matter how desolate; but neither the busy scenes in which he had been engaged, nor the pleasures of youth, nor the precocious state of his own circumstances, had disturbed his native judgment. And this then is the Roman Wall; he said, squabbling up to a height which commanded the course of that celebrated work of antiquity: "What by people, whose labours, even at this extreme edge of their empire, comprehended such space, and were executed upon a scale of such grandeur! In future ages, when the sciences of war shall have changed, how shall these be regarded?"

Winter's Tail.

Let the reader conceive to himself a clear frosty November morning, the scene an open heath, having for the back-ground that huge chain of mountains in which Skiddaw and Saddleback are pre-eminent; let him look along that bident road, by which I mean the track so slightly marked by the passers-by's foot-stops, that it can but be traced by a slight shade of verdure from the darker heath around it, and, being only visible to the eye when at some distance, cannot be distinguished while the foot is actually treading it—along this faintly-traced path advances the object of our present narrative. His firm step, his erect and free bearing, his military air, which corresponds well with his well-proportioned limbs, and stature of six feet high. His dress is so plain and simple that it indicates nothing as to rank—it may be that of a gentleman or a soldier, or of a favorite person of whom it is the proper and usual garb. Nothing can be more reduced on a scale than his travelling equipment. A volume of Shakspeare in his pocket, a cloak with a change of linen slung across his shoulders, an oaken cudgel in his hand, complete our pedestrian's accommodations, and in this equipage we present him to our notice.

Brown had parted that morning from his friend Dudley, and began his solitary walk towards Scotland. The first two or three miles were rather melancholy, from want of the society to which he had of late been accustomed. But this unusual mood of mind soon gave way to the influence of his natural good spirits, excited by the exercise and the bracing effects of the cold wind drizzling on his face, and on the latter, as he went along, not "from want of thought," but to give vent to those buoyant feelings which had no other mode of expressing. For each peasant whom he chanced to meet, he had a kind greeting or a good-humoured smile; the hardy Cumbrians grinned as they passed, and said, "That's a kind heart, God bless un!" and the market-girl looked more than once over her shoulder at the pedestrian who was busy in this most Masonic of all conversations with the stranger.

Dr. Johnson thought life had few things better than the excitement produced by being whisked rapidly along in a post-chaise; but he who

* It is fitting to explain to the reader the locality described in this chapter. There is, or rather I should say there was, a little inn, called Mumpo's Hall, that is, being interpreted, Muppo's Hostel, or, as it is called, Muppo's Hostel, a name which had not always the same sound, but was known by the inhabitants as a sort of metonymy to the name as a sign. It was a humble alehouse, where the Border fellows of one part of the country often stooped to refresh themselves before they went on their way, to and from the fair and trials in Cumberland, and especially those who came from or went to Scotland, through the narrow road and lonely district known as the farm or pathway, emphatically called the Waite of Newcastile. At the door of the place was a notice, which, to the best of my recollection, is to the effect:

"To all persons: Persons are hereby notified that we are now in possession of the Waite of Newcastile, and that we have been put in here with leave to make, sell, and drink wines, spirits, and other liquors, to the comfort of all persons,"

Mumpo's Hall had a bad reputation for harbourship, and dipti who committed such degradations. An old and sturdy yeoman belonging to the Scottish side, by surname an Armstrong or Elliot, but well known by his sobriquet of Fighting Charlie of Liddesdale, and still remembered for the courage he displayed in the frequent frays which took place on the Border fifty or sixty years since, had the following lines set over the gate of the new inn, which suggest the image of the old inn, in the text:

"Each day that Charlie had at Stauphank bank fair, held his sheep or cattle, or whatever he brought to market, and was on his return to Liddesdale. There were then no country banks where cash could be deposited, and bills were received instead, which greatly encouraged robbery in that wild country, as the objects of plunder were usually found with gold. The robbers had spies in the fair, by means of whom they generally knew whose purse was best stocked, and who took a low and despicable kind of homeward—those, in short, who were best worth robbing and likely to be most easily robbed. All this was the case now well; but he had a pair of excellent pistols, and a double barrel. He stopped at Mumpo's Hall, and was accommodated where he might have the necessary read and food of eorn; and Charlie himself, a dashing fellow, grew graces with the chear, and the humble queen, who did not think much of him in her power to induce him to stop all night. The landlord was not so much known for his hospitality as for the light meals which are described in the wood, and the right must needs occur on him before he gained the Scottish side, which was reckoned the saibert. But Fighting Charlie, though he never thought of himself to be determined, did not account Mumpo's Hall's safe place to quarter during the night. He tore himself away, therefore, from Muppo's

The first object which caught his eye in the kitchen, was a tall, stout, country-looking man, in a large jockey great-coat, the owner of the horse which stood in the shed, who was busy discussing huge slices of cold boiled beef, and casting from time to time an eye through the window, to see how his horses were, with his provender. A large tanker of ale flanked his place, or, rather, the ample length of himself by intervals. The good woman of the house was employed in baking. The fire, as usual in that country, was on a stone hearth, in the midst of an inn—a pleasant companion. Two horses had two seats extended beneath the vcnt. One of these sat a remarkably tall woman, in a red cloak and slouched bonnet, having the appearance of a tinker or beggar. She was busily engaged with a short black tobacco-pipe.

At the request of Brown for some food, the landlady wiped with her mealy apron one corner of the door, but came up no time doing so, the inn crowded to both. For a while, his opposite neighbour and he were too busy to take much notice of each other, except by a good-humoured nod as each in turn raised the blunted head of the pipe. Our persevering landsman began to supply the wants of little Wasp, the Scotch store-farmer, for such was Mr. Dinmont, fond himself at leisure to enter into conversation.

"Ay, sir? that's a pity, begging your pardon—it's a great pity that; beast or body, education should n't be minded. I have six terriers at home, forbide two or three: I should not like to have the dogs alone, given out to the toads and brooks—and then we'll eat them all.

"I suppose game is very plenty with you?"

"Plenty, man!—I believe there's hair hares than sheep on my farm; and for the moor-fowl, or the gray-fowl, they lie thick as doons in a dooket.—Did ye ever smoke a black-cock, man?"

"Really I had never even the pleasure to see one, except in the museum at Keswick."

"There now! could you—I blame your South-weister!—It's no fault of these English folk that good fare and kind words, and mounted his nag, having first examined his pistols, and tried by the ramrod whether the charges were right in the boxes. He proceeded a mile or two, at a round trot, when, as the Waste stretched black before him, apprehensions began to awaken in his mind, partly arisen out of Meg's unnatural kindness, which he could not help thinking had rather a suspicious appearance. He, therefore, resolved to load his pistols, but was what was his surprise, when he drew the charge, to find neither powder nor ball, while each barrel in turn was emptied, and its contents found empty. On coming to the loading he had occupied; and, the priming of the weapons being attended to, the three charges of powder and lead, including the charge could have discovered the inefficiency of his aim till the fatal moment arrived when their services were required. He then resolved to load his pistols, but his mind was in a turmoil, and he tried another course on the head of the headland, and loaded his pistols with care and accuracy, having the balls of lead fitted. He was not far engaged in the Waste, which was then, and is now, traversed only by such routes as are described in the text, when two or three fellows, disguised and variously armed, started from a moss-bag, while, by a glance behind him, (for, come here, how few of them has seen a black-cock!"

"I'll tell you what—ye seem to be an honest lad, and if you'll call on me—Dandy Dinmont—at Charles- hope—ye shall see a black-cock, and about a black-cock, and eat a black-cock too, man?"

"Why, the proof of the matter is the eating, to be sure, sir; and I shall be happy if I can find time to accept your dinner, and at the Waste in the morning wi' the callant?"

The galloway was turned out upon the fell, and was swear to catch—"Aweel, aweel, there's nae help for't, the best of luck to you, and to my father—And now, good wife, I mean ride, to get to the Liddel or it be dark, for your Waste has but a little character, ye ken yourself."

"Hout be, Mr. Dinmont, that's no like you, to give the country an ill name—I wot, there has been nane stirred in the Waste since Sawney Culloch, the travelling-merchant, that Rowley Overlies and Jock Penny suffered from Carlisle two years since. There's no one in Bennets were could do the like o' that now—we be a' true folk now."

"Ay, Tib, that will be when the devil's blind—and his own nane is there. But I wot, ye, gudewife, I have been through jock O'Galloway and Dumfries—""

"Hae ye been in Dumfries and Galloway?" said the old daim, who sate smoking by the fire-side, and who had not yet spoken a word."

"True—I have, gudewife, and a weary round I've had o't."

"Then ye'll maybe ken a place they ca' Elin- gowtan?"

"Elin-gowtan, that was Mr. Bertram's—I ken; the place weel enough. The Laird died about a fortnight since, as I heard;"

"Diesl?"—said the old woman, dropping her pipe, and raising her face. The Laird died upon the floor—"Diesl? are you sure of that?"

"Troth, ain I," said Dinmont, "for it made nae snia' noise in the country-side. He died just at the roup of the day, and there was mind and money raised for the group, and mony folk were disappointed. They said he was the last o' an auld family too, and mony were sorry—for gude blude's scarcity in Scotland than it has been."

"Diesl!" replied the old woman, whom our readers have already recognised as their acquaintance Meg Merrilles—"dead! that quite a scores. And did ye say he died up the mor o' the morn?"

"Ayd did he, gudewife, and the estate's sel'd by the marching, as the Spaniard says, with his head on his shoulder, be reconnoitered in every direction. Charlie instantly saw retreat was impossible, as other two men moved toward him at some distance. The Borderers lost no moment in taking his resolution, and boldly trotted against his enemies in front, who called loudly on him to stand and deliver! Charlie spurred on, and presented his pistol. "D—your p'tool," said the foremost robber; whose Charlie to his dying day protested he believed to have been the landlord of Mump's Ha'. "D—your pistol! I care not for it a curse for it."—"Ay, lad," said the deep and rapid voice of Figure, "will ye try the next?" He had no occasion to utter another word; the negro, surmounting his man of renown, and exulting in his prowess, gave no signal for the people of the house suffered. But these are all tales of at least half a century old, and the Waste has been for many years as safe as any place in the kingdom."

same token; for they said, they couldna have sell’d it, if there had been an heir-male.

"Sell’d!" echoed the gipsy, with something like a scream; "and who durst buy Ellangowan that was not of Bertram’s blade!—and who could tell whether the body of Ellangowan, Gude be wis—’tis a very awful warld!—I wished him ill—but no sic a downfa’s as a that neither—waes me! waes me to think o’! —She remained a moment silent, but still opposing with her hand the humdrum retreat, who, between every question, was about to turn his back, but good-humouredly stopped on observing the deep interest in the honest farmer’s answers appeared to excite.

"It will be seen and heard of—earth and sea will not hold their peace longer!—Can ye say if the same man now be the Sheriff of the county, that has been seen for some years past?"

"The sheriff was born in Edinburgh, they say—but gude day, gudewife, I maun ride."

—She followed him to his horse, and, while he drew the girths of his saddle, adjusted the values, and put on the bridle, still talking with oblique concerning Mr. Bertram’s death, and the fate of his daughter; on which, however, she could obtain little information from the honest farmer.

"Did ye ever see them ca’ Derneclough, about a mile frae the Place of Ellangowan?"

"I wot weel have I, gudewife,—a wild-looking den it is, w’l a whin auld wa’s o’ shealings yonder—I saw it when I went o’ the ground w’i’ ane that wanted to take the farm.

"It was a blythe bit anece!" said Meg, speaking to herself—"Did ye notice if there was an auld saugh trout in that den?—the boots are in the earth, and it hangs ower the bit burn—mony a day hae I wrought my stocking, and sat on my sulkie under that saugh.

"Hout, devil’s the wife, w’l her saughs, and her sunkies, and Ellangowans—Godeawe, woman, let me away—there’s saencepence tye to buy half a mutchkin, instead o’ clarving of those auld-sward stories.

"Thans to ye, gudeman—and now ye have answer’d a’ my questions and never spared wherefo’ I asked them, I’ll give you a bit canny advice, and ye maunna speir what for neither. Tib Mumps will be out, and the stirrup-cup, which is a griffing—’ll ask ye whether ye know what Willie thinks through Concerner causthert marn—tell her o’ne ane ye like, but be sure (speaking low and emphatically) to tak the ane ye dinna wish to tell her. The farmer laughed and promised, and the gipsy retreated.

"Will you take her advice?" said Brown, who had been an attentive listener to this conversation.

"That will I no—the randy quae—Na, I had far rathet Tib Mumps kent’d which way I was gaun than her—though Tib’s no muckle to lippen to neither, and I would advise ye o’ no account to stay in the house o’ night."

At this moment, Tib, the landlady, appeared with her stirrup-cup, which was taken off. She then, as Meg had predicted, inquired whether he went the hill or the moor road. He answered, the latter; and, having gone a good way, and more than half way, he again told him, "he depended on seeing him at Charles-hope, the morn at latest," he rode off at a round pace.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Callowis and Knock are too powerful on the highway, Winter’s Tale.

The hint of the hospitable farmer was not lost on Brown. But, while he paid his reckoning, he could not avoid repeatedly fixing his eyes on Meg Merriles. She, in her part, the same witch-like figure when we first introduced her at Ellangowan-Place.

Time had grizzled her raven locks, and added wrinkles to her wild features, but her height remained erect, and her activity was unimpaired. It was remarked of this woman, as of others of the same description, that a life of action, though it destaun’d of humour, had given her the command over limbs and figure, so that the attitudes into which she most naturally threw herself, were free, unconstrained, and picturesque. At present, she stood by the window of the cottage, her person drawn up as to show to full advantage her masculine stature, and her head somewhat thrown back, that the large bonnet, with which her face was shrouded, might not interrupt her steady gaze at Mr. Brown. At every words, or tone which he uttered, she seemed to give an almost imperceptible start. On his part, he was surprised to find that he could not look upon this singular figure without some repugnance, for, however he tried to conceal such a figure?" he said to himself, "or does this wild and singular-looking woman recall to my recollection some of the strange figures I have seen in our Indian pagaes?"

While he embellished himself with these discussions, and the hostess was engaged in rummaging out silver in change of half-a-guineas, the gipsy suddenly made a dash for the drawer, and scrambled back with a bundle. He expected, of course, a display of her skill in palmaristry, but she seemed agitated by other feelings.

"Tell me," she said, "tell me, in the name of God, young man, what is your name, and whence you came?"

"My name is Brown, mother, and I come from the East Indies.

"From the East Indies!" dropping his hand with a sigh; "it cannot be then—I am such an auld fool, that every thing I look on seems the thing I want most to see. But the East Indies! that cannot be—Weel, be what ye will, there’s a face and a torque that puts me in mind of auld times. Good day—make haste on your road, and if ye see any of our folk, bide not make and not make, and they’ll do you harm.

"Brown, ye canna see the livings, put a shilling into her hand, bide her hostess fare-well, and, taking the route which the farmer had gone before, walked briskly on, with the advantage of being guided by the fresh hoof-pints of his horse. Meg Merriles looked after him for some time, and then muttered to herself, "I maun see that lad again—and I maun gang back to Ellangowan too—The Laird’s dead—well, death’s aither a kind man never. The Sheriff’s fitt’d, and I can keep canny in the bush—so there’s no muckle hazard o’ securin the cramp-ring."—I would like to see booty Ellangowan again or I die.

Brown, who had been proceeding northward at a round pace along the moorish tract called the Waste of Cumberland. He passed a solitary house, towards which the horseman who preceded him had apparently turned, and Brown, seeing that direction. A little further, he seemed to have returned again into the road. Mr. Dimmont had probably made a visit there either of business or pleasure—I wish, thought Brown, the good farmer had said till I came up; I should not have been sorry to ask him a few questions about the road, which seems to grow wilder and wilder.

In truth, however, if she had designed this tract of country to be the barrier between two hostile nations, it has stamped upon it a character of wildness and desolation. The hills are neither high nor rocky, but the land is so intersected with deep gullies and valleys that save the trouble of enclosures, intimate the farmer’s chief resource to be the breeding of horses. The people, too, are of a ruder and more inhospitable class than are elsewhere to be found in Cumber-land, partly from their own habits, partly from their intercourse with vagrants and criminals, who make this wild country a refuge from justice. So much were the men of these districts in early times the objects of suspicion and dislike to their more polished neighbours, who had the manners and speech of the corporation of Newcastle, prohibiting any freeman of that city to take for apprentice a native of certain of these dales. It is pathetically said, "Give a dog an ill name and he will act as if he was a man; or, as the saying goes, let a man or race of men, an ill name, they are very likely to do something that deserves hanging. Of this Brown had heard something and suspected more, from the district through which Dimont and the gipsies; but he was naturally of a fearless disposition, had nothing about him that could tempt the spoiler, and trusted to get through the Waste with day-light, with the help of a few pence, little damage likely to be done. The weather proved longer than he had anticipated, and the horizon began to grow gloomy, just as he entered upon an extensive morass.

Choosing his steps with care and deliberation, the young officer proceeded along a path that sometimes sunk between two broken black banks of moss earth, sometimes crossed narrow but deep ravines filled with a confluence between mud and water, and sometimes surmounted heaps of gravel and stones, which had been swept together when some torrent or waterfall on the neighbouring hills overflowed the marshy ground below. He began to ponder how a horse could jump this most monstrous obstacle: the traces of hoofs, however, were still visible; he even thought he heard their sound at some distance, and, convinced that Mr. Dimont's progress through this most monstrous obstacle was not his own, he resolved to push on, in hopes to surprise him, and have the benefit of his knowledge of the country. At this moment his little terraced ground was lost, and he was lost completely.

Brown quickened his pace, and, attaining the summit of a rising ground, saw the subject of the dog's alarm. In a hollow about a furlong or two, the bed of a small stagnant stream, mantled over with bright green masses, Dimont directed his steed towards a pass where the water appeared to flow with more freedom over a barer bottom; but Dimont, instead of the proposed crossing place, put his head down as if to reconnoitre the swamp more nearly, stretching forward his face-feet, and stood as fast as he could.

"Had we not better," said Brown, "dismount, and leave him to his fate—or can you not urge him through the swamp?"

"Na, na," said his pilot, "we mean cross Dumble at no rate—he has mare sense than many a Christian." So saying, he relaxed the reins, and shook them loosely. "Come now, lad, take your air way o'let's see where we'll take it through.

Dumble, left to the freedom of his own will, trotted briskly to another part of the lath less promising, as Brown thought, in appearance, but which the horseman's sagacity and the GHOST of his knowledge made the safer of the two, and, plunging in, he attained the other side with little difficulty.

"I am glad we're o' that mossa," said Dimont, "where there is no water, that this new opponent was equally stout and resolute; and after exchanging two or three blows, one of them told him to "follow his nose over the heath, in the dear's name, for they had nothing to say to him."

Brown rejected this composition, as having to their mercy the unfortunate man whom they were about to pillage, if not to murder outright; and the skirmish had just recommenced, when Dimont unexpectedly recovered his senses, his feet, and his weapon, and hastened to the scene of action. As he had been no easy antagonist, even when surprised and overhauled, the vaunted dimont was now joining forces with a man who had singly proved a match for them both, but fled across the bog as fast as their feet could carry them, pursued by Wasp, who had acted gloriously during the skirmish, annoying the rear of the enemy, and effectually effecting a moment's diversion in his master's favour.

"Deil, but your dog's weel entered w' the vermin now, sir!" were the first words uttered by the jolly face-feet, who was as blundering as ever, and full of blood, and recognized his deliverer and his little attendant.

"I hope, sir, you are not hurt dangerously?"

"No, no, sir—my head can stand a gay cloures thanks to them, though, and mony to you. But now, hinnie, ye maun help me to catch the beast, and we maun get on behind me, for we maun off like whire trets before the whole chajmfray be down upon us—the rest o' them will no be far off." The galloway was, by good chance, cut into a piece, and brown made some apology for overloading the animal.

"Deal a fear, man," answered the proprietor, "Dumble could carry six folk, if his back was lang enough—but we'll pack you just as far as ye need go, for I see some folk coming, through the black yonder, that it may be just as weel to wait for."

Brown was of opinion that this apparition of five or six men, who had the dimont in their train, join company, coming across the moss towards them, should avenge ceremony; he therefore mounted Dumble en croupe, and the little spirited nag carried away with his master the gipsy and his youth, as if they had been children of six years old. These men, whom the paths of these wilds seemed intimately known, pushed on at a rapid pace, manning, with much dexterity, to choose the safest route, in which he was aided by the sagacity of the galloway, who never failed to take the difficult passes exactly at the particular spot, and in the special manner by which they could be most safely crossed. Yet, even with these advantages, the road was so broken, that they were so often thrown out of the direct course by various impediments, that they did not gain much on their pursuers. "Never mind," said the unadorned Brown, "there is an easy outlet to the Witherwen's lath, the road's no near the soft, and we'll show them fair play for't."

They soon came to the place he named, a narrow pass where the water appeared to flow with more freedom over a barer bottom; but Dimont, instead of the proposed crossing place, put his head down as if to reconnoitre the swamp more nearly, stretching forward his face-feet, and stood as fast as he could.

Art of Preserving Health.

The present store-farmers of the south of Scotland are a much more refined race than their fathers, and in the manners I am not to say have either altogether disappeared, or are greatly modified. Without losing the rural simplicity of manners, they now cultivate arts unknown to the former generation, not only in the improvement of their productions, but in all the comforts of life. Their houses are more commodious, their habits of life regulated so as to keep pace with those of the civilised world, and the number of luxuries, of which their knowledge, has gained much ground among their hills during the last thirty years. Deep drinking, formerly their greatest failing, is now fast losing ground; and, while the frankness of their extensive hospitality continues the same, it is, generally speaking, refined in its character, and restrained in its excesses.

"Deil's in the wife," said Dandie Dinmont, shaking off his cloak in embraces, with a look of great affection—"deil's in ye, Allie—deil's in ye see the stranger gentleman?"

Allie turned to make her apology—"Truth, I was seen, or I would see the good, I am gude gracious! what's the matter wi' ye baith?—for they were now in her little parlour, and the candle showed the streaks of blood which Dandie Dinmont's wounded head had plentifully imparted to the clothes of his companion as well as to his own. "Ye've been fighting again, Dandy, wi' some o' the Buccleuch horse-couplers! Wow, man, a married man, wi' a bonny family like yours, should ken better what a father's life's worth in the world." The tears stood in the good woman's eyes as she spoke.

"Whist! whist! guidewife," said her husband, with a scold that had much more mock reproach than ceremony in it; "Never mind—never mind—there's a gentleman that will tell you, that just when I had gan to up to Lourie Lowther's, and had bidden the drink to come, the deil and the devil doth go just in again on the moss, and was woggelieing to the gate. I wame, twa land-loupers jump out of a pheasant on me or I was thinking, and got me down, and the devil doth tell me aye and another, I could wish ye man to be thankful to him for it, under God." With that he drew a pocket a large grey leather pocket-book, and bade the guidewife lock it up in her kist.

"God bless the gentleman, and o' God bless him wi' my heart—but what can we do for him, but to gave him the most and quarters we wadna refuse to the poorest body on earth—unless (her eye directed to the vapid, yellow, and pitiful object of her pity which made the inference the most delicate plausible) unless there was any other way"—Brown saw, and estimated at its due rate, the mixture of surprise and mortification in the child's face; he spoke the downright way of expressing itself, yet qualified with so much delicacy; he was aware his own appearance, plain at best, and now and then splattered with blood made him an object of pity at least, and perhaps of charity. He hastened to say his name was Brown, a captain in the regiment of cavalry, travelling for pleasure, and on foot, both from motives of economy and the gentlemanly way he took his kind landlady would look at his husband's wounds, the state of which he had refused to permit him to examine. Mrs. Dinmont was used to her husband's trifling injuries and had trained a hand of a captain of dragoons. She therefore glanced at the table-cloth not quite clean, and listened over her proposed supper a minute or two, before putting her plate to the table and made him sit down for a "hard-headed loan, that was bringing her other folk into collder-slanges.

When Dandie Dinmont, after executing two or three capers, and putting the Highland-fling, by way of ridiculous demonstration and to sit down, and commit his round, black, shaggy bullet of a head to her inspection, Brown thought he had seen the regimental surgeon look grave upon a near neighbour. The general way how he took some knowledge of chirurgery—she cut away with her scissors the gory locks, whose stiffened and coagulated clusters interfered with her operations, and clapped on the wound some lint bennearmed with a vulnerary salve, esteemed sovereign by the whole dale, (which afforded upon Fair nights considerable experience of such cases)—she then fixed her plaster with a bobby pin and her patient's resistance was pulsed over all a night-cap, to keep every thing in its right place. Some contusions on the brow and shoulders she fomented with brandy, which the patient did not object to this mine and laid a heavy load to his mouth. Mrs. Dinmont then simply, but kindly, offered her assistance to Brown.

He assured her he had no occasion for anything but the accommodation of a basin and towel. "And that's what I should have thought of sooner," she said; "and I did think o't, but I durst na open the door, for there's a' the barns, poor things, sale kept there out there."

This explained a great drumming and whining at the door of the little parlour, which had somewhat surprised Brown, though his kind landlady had only noticed that she could be heard. She heard it begin. But on her opening the door to seek the basin and towel, (for she never thought of showing the guest to a separate room,) a whole tide of whitehead vermin ran hame in; some from the stable, where they had been seeing Dumble, and giving him a welcome home with part of their four-hours crones; others from the kitchen, where they had been listening to old Elizabeth's tales and ballads; and the youngest half-naked, out of bed, all roaring to see daddie, and to inquire what he had brought home for them from the various fairs he had visited in his regiment. The knight of the broken head first kissed and hugged them all round, then distributed whistles, penny-trumpets, and gingerbread, and, lastly, when the tumult of their joy and welcome went beyond bearing, exclaimed to his guest:—"This is the generous fault, captain—he will give the barns a' their sin way."

"Mist Lord help me," said Ali; "and who at that in the stable, and, between coaxing and scolding, they can't keep them?—I have nothing else to give them, poor things?"

Dinmont then exerted himself, and, between coaxing and scolding, they can't keep them?—I have nothing else to give them, poor things?

CHAPTER XXXV.

—Give ye, Britons, then,
Your sporting fury, pusilliwous to pour.
Loose then their robber of the fold.
Him from his crazy wounding bane's asunder.
Let all the thunder of the clamour sound.

THORNSON'S DISTRIBUTION.

Brown rose early in the morning, and walked out to look at the establishment of his new friend. All was rough and neglected in the neighbourhood of the house; and hardly can I make the vicinage dry or comfortable, and a total absence of all those little neatnesses which give the eye so much pleasure in looking at an English farm-house. There were, notwithstanding, evident signs that this arose only from want of taste, or ignorance, not from poverty, or the negligence which attends it. On the contrary, a noble cow-house, well filled with good milk-cows, a feeding-house, with ten bullocks of the...
patching his breakfast, as, "the frost having given way, the scene would be like this morning primarily."

But they saluted accordingly for Otter's-eyes-and-ears, the farmer leading the way. They soon quitted the little valley, and involved themselves among hills as steep as those they had descended from, on which the sides often presented gullies, down which, in the winter season, or after heavy rain, the torrents descended with great fury. Some dappled mist still floated along, and the sky was covered with the morning clouds, for the frost had broken up with a smart shower. Through these fleecy screens were seen a hundred little temporary streamlets, or rills, descending from the top of the hill, and forming up that country a slough—it had once been the defence of a fortress, of which no vestige now remained, but which was said to have been inhabited by the same demoniacal family that had been the protectors of the land for ages. Brown endeavoured to make some acquaintance with the children, but, "the rogues fled from him like quicksilver"—though the two oldest stood peeping when they had turned back, no for a dozen of you scallies!"

Brown had recognised his worthy host, though a mawn, as it is called, or a grey shepherd's-plain, supplied his travelling jockey-cost, and a cap, faced with white, and lined with scarlet, and his bagged head than a hat would have done. As he appeared through the morning mist, Brown, accustomed to judge of men by their throes and sinews, could not help admiring the size of his shoulders, and the steady firmness of his step. Dimmont internally paid the same compliment to Brown, whose athletic form he now perceived somewhat more at leisure than he had done formerly. After the usual greetings of the morning, the guest inquired whether his host found any inconvenience consequent from the last night's arfray.

"I never was better, sir," said the Borderer; "but I think this morning, now that I am fresh and sober, if you and I were at the Withershins' Latch, you'd like a gude oon stable in your hand, we wadna turn back, no for a dozen o' you scallies!"

"But are you prudent, my good sir," said Brown; "not to take an hour or two's repose after receiving such severe contusions?"

"I can't tell you, the farmer, laughing in dejection; "Lord, Captain, naething confuses my head—I ane jumped up and laid the dogs on the fox after I had tumbled from the rap o' Christenbury Craig, and the water is everywhere confusen. No, naething confuses me, unless it be a scree o' drink at an orra time. Besides, I behooved to be round the hirsle this morning, and see how the herds were coming on; they have to be vigilant wi' their footballs, and fares, and tyants, when a' anes away. And there we met! Tam o' Todshale, and a wheen o' the rest o' the billys on the water side; they're a' for a fox-hunt this morning. I'll give ye Dumple, and take the brood mare myself."

"But I fear I must leave you this morning, Mr. Dimmont," replied Brown.

"I fear not it at all," exclaimed the Borderer. "I'll—nae, nae wi' ye at any rate for a fortightmair—Na, na; we dinna meet sic friends as you on a Bow-castle moose every night."

Brown had not designed his journey should be a sporting one; but he was more readily compounded with this hearty invitation, by agreeing to pass a week at Charries-hope.

On their return to the house, where the good-wife provided them with a hearty breakfast, she heard news of the proposed fox-hunt, not indeed with approbation, but without alarm or surprise. "Dand! ye're the suld man yet—naething will make ye take warning till ye bruage hame some day wi' your feet for' moe."

"Tut, lass!" answered Dandie. "ye ken yourself I am never in the prain o' my rambles."

So saying, Brown was to hastie in dis-of the hounds, ascending as it were out of the bowels of the earth. When the fox, thus persecuted from noon to night, had thus incessantly pursued till he was obliged to abandon his valley, and to break away for a more distant retreat, those who watched his motions from the top slipped their greyhounds, which, excelling the fox in lightness and fleetness of foot, and in swiftness of pursuit, quickly overtook and speedily overtook and speeded past his own. The man himself, with the fox equally in sight and in view, would soon bring the plunderer to his life's end.

In this way, without any attention to the ordinary rules and decorums of sport, but apparently as much to the hunt itself, and more to the regulation of sportsmen if all due ritual had been followed, four foxes were killed on this active morning; and even Brown himself, though he had seen the princely sports of India, and ridden in both hunting and horse-riding, was astonished with the Nabob of Arcot, professing to have received an excellent morning's amusement. When the sport was given up for the day, most of the sportsmen, according to the established hospitality of the country, went to dine at Charleys-hope.

During their return homeward, Brown rode for a short time beside the huntsman, and asked him some questions concerning the mode in which he had conducted the sport. The man showed an ulterior pleasure in meeting his eye, and a disposition to be rid of his company and conversation, for which Brown could not easily account. He was a thin, dark, active fellow, and he had evidently a large share of what is called skill exercised. But his face had not the frankness of the jolly hunter; he was down-looked, embarrassed, and avoided the eyes of those who looked hard at him. After some answer had been given, which was relating to the success of the day, Brown gave him a trifling gratuity, and rode on with his landlord. They found the goodwife prepared for their reception—the fold and the poultry-yard, the jewellery, the entertainment, and the kind and hearty welcome made amends for all deficiencies in elegance and fashion.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The Elliot and Armstrongs dined convivially.

They were a gallant company.

Roused of Johnstone Armstrongs.

Without noticing the occupations of an intervening day or two, which, as they consisted of the ordinary sylvan amusements of shooting and courting, have nothing sufficiently interesting to detain the reader, we pass to one in some degree peculiar to Scotland, which may be called a sort of salmon-hunting. This chase, in which the fish is pursued and struck with hooks, is not laughed at in the south, called a waster,* is much practised at the mouth of the Esk, and in the other salmon rivers of Scotland. The sport is followed by day and night, but most commonly in the night. It has its own torches, or fire-gates, filled with blazing fragments of tar-barrels, which shed a strong though partial light upon the water. On the present occasion, the principal party were embarked in a crazy boat upon a part of the river which was enlarged and deepened by the restrained of a mill- weir, while others, like the ancient Bacchani in their gambols, ran along the banks, brandishing their torches and spears, and pursuing the salmon, some of which endeavoured to escape up the stream, while others, shrouding themselves under roots of trees, fragments of stones, and large roots of trees, concealed themselves from the researches of the fishermen. These the party in the boat detected by the slightest indications; the twinkling of a fin, the rising of an air-bell, was sufficient to point out to these adroit sportsmen in what direction to use their weapons.

The scene was inexpressibly animating to those accustomed to it; but as Brown was not practised to use the spear, he was soon tired of making efforts, which would have been useful. He did, however, on one occasion, seeing a salmon crossing the river, much to the delight of the party, dash his arms against the rocks at the bottom of the river, upon which, instead of the devoted salmon, he fortunately bestowed his bow. Nor did he relish, though he was informed to do so, the custom of the sportsman of falling into the river, and then taking the fish with his hands. He was convinced, after observing the salmon, that it is by no means so easy as it is sometimes supposed. The salmon thus preserved is eaten as a delicacy, either fried in the roasting passage, or under the roasting passage, a luxury to which Brown had given his sanction as an ingredient of the Scottish breakfast.

* Or daster. The long spear is used for striking; but there is a shorter, which is cast from the hand, and with which an experienced sportsman hits his fish with singular dexterity.
terion. He resolved to speak to his host Dinmont on the subject, but for obvious reasons concluded it would be better for the explanation until a cool hour in the morning.

The sportsmen loaded with fish, upwards of one hundred salmon having been killed within the range of the house, and having a particular liking for the use of the principal farmers, the others divided among their shepherds, cotters, dependants, and others of inferior rank who attended. These fish, dried in the turpentine of their tails, or sheablings, formed a savoury addition to the mess of potatoes, mixed with onions, which was the principal part of their winter food. In the meanwhile a liberal distribution of ale, whisky was made among them, besides which was called a kettle of fish—two or three salmon, namely, plunged into a cauldron, and boiled for their supper. Brown accompanied his jolly landlord and the rest of his bands into the large and smoky kitchen, where this savoury mess reeked on an oaken table, massive enough to have dined Johnnie Armstrong and his merry-men. All was hearty cheer and buzzas, and jest and clamorous laughter, and bragging alternately, and raillery between whiles. Our traveler looked earnestly around for the dark countenance of the fox-hunter; but it was nowhere to be seen.

He put the question confronting him:

"That was an awkward accident, my lads, of one of you, who dropped his torch in the water when his companion was struggling with the large fish."

"A awk restation," said the shepherd picking up, (the same stout young fellow who had scared the salmon,) "he deserved his pails for—to put out the light when the fish was on ane's witters!"—"I'm sure I am sorry for dropped the roughest thing in the water on purpose—he doesna like to see any body do a thing better than himself."

"Ay," said another, "he's sair ashamed o' himsell, else he wad have come up here the night—Gabriel likes a little o' the gude thing as well as any o' us."

"Is he of this country?" said Brown.

"Na, na, he's been but shortly in office, but he's a full hunter—he's free down the country, some gate on the Dumfries side.

"And what's his name pray?"

"Gabriel," said one.

"But Gabriel what?"

"Oh, Lord kens that; we dinna mind folk's after names—muck here, they run sea muck into clams.

"Ye see, sir," said an old shepherd, rising, and speaking very slow, "the folks here about are a's Armstrongs, and the like, and the farmers have the names of their places that they live at—as, for example, Tom o'Todhaw, Will o' the French, whisky.

"He's not quite right in his head, this man, for, by his employment; as for example, TodGabriel, or Hunter Gabbie. He's nae been lang here, sir, and I dinna think any body kens him by any other name. But it's no the忧 him sair abint his ha' back, for he's a full fox-hunter, though he's maybe nae seae clever as some o' the folk hereaw wa' the waster."

The barbs of the spear.

When dry subjects, or branches, are used as fuel for the lime kiln, or burning, as is the case in Ireland, they are termed, as in the text, toastings. When logs, dipped in tar, are employed, they are called Ha's, probably from the French.

The distinction of individuals by nicknames when they possess no proper name is common in the Border, and indeed necessary in the case of certain classes, as in the same name, for instance, Jacobin. In the small village of Lowstruther, in Roxburghshire, there dwelt, in the middle of the town, a clergyman and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Low. They were distinguished as Dandie Easie-sate, Dandie Bungalo, Dandie Thimbles, and Dandie Dumbie. The two first names were the same, and were written in the street of the village; the third from some peculiarity in the cut of his nose; and the fourth from his tameness.

It was well known that, as a beaver woman, repudiated from door to door as she was for her uncleanliness, and when the daughter of Annandale, noted, in her despair, if there were no Christians in the house, and asked of her what she ground for making herself so unwashed, answered, "Na, na, there are our Christianes here: we are a Johnstones and Jamies."

After some further deactory conversation, the superior sportsmen retired to conclude the evening after their own manner, less familiarly, and the younger, unknown to themselves, unwaved by their presence. That evening, like all those which Brown had passed at Charlieshope, was spent in much innocent and conviviality. The occasion of right, an extraordinary confluence of riot but for the good women; for several of the neighboring mistreses (a phrase of a significa tion how different from what it bears in more familiar life) had assembled at Charlieshope to witness the event of this memorable evening. Finding the punch-bowl was so often replenished, that there was some danger of their gracious presence being forgotten, they retired in valuable time to witness the recreant revelers, headed by our good mistrees Ailie, so that Venus speedily routed Bacchus. The fiddler and piper next made their appearance, and the best of the bands was gallantly consumed in dancing to their music.

An otter-hunt the next day, and a badger-baiting the day after, consumed the time merily. I hope our traveler is so expressively describing the badger-hunt as a thing that will win the sennoral favour of Mr. Dinmont, that the poor badger, who had made so gallant a defence, should be permitted to retire to his earth without further mole-

The farmer, who would probably have treated this request with supreme contempt had it come from any other person, was contented, in Brown's case, to express his satisfaction. "Well," he said, "that's queer aneuch!—but since ye take his part, deil a syke shall meddle wi' him mair in my day—we'll e'en mark him, and ca' him the Captain's buck—and I'm sure I'm glad I can do anything to help you—but, Lord save us, to care about a buck?"

After a week spent in rural sport, and distinguished by the most keen attentions on the part of his honest landlord, Brown bade adieu to the banks of the Liddel, and the hospitality of Charlieshope. The children, with all of whom he had now become an intimate, and a favourite, roared manfully in full chorus at his departure, and he was obliged to promise twenty times, that he would soon return and play over all their favourite tunes upon the fife, till they had got them by heart. —Come back again, said they; be back three good times, and when you come back we'll say you will be your wife." Jenny was about eleven years old; she ran and hid herself behind her mammy.

"Captain, come back," said a little fat roll-about girl of six; with good manners to be kissed, and "I'll be your wife my ainself."

They must be of harder mould than I thought Brown, who could part from so many kind hearts with indifference—"The good dame too, with modesty, and an affectionate simplicity that marked the olden time, offered her cheek to the departing guest—"It's little the likeous we can do," she said. "I'll indeed—" said he, "but—yes, we can be so happy as ye like to see a body else that would be a sair wish to some folk."

I must not omit to mention, that our traveler left his trusty attendant, Wapsy to be a guest at Charlieshope, and the boy was so popular that he was invited to every frolic and amusement, and set up as an authority on the history of his native country. He had learnt the language and feelings of the country even during the short time of his residence, and was aware of the pleasure the request would confer.

"A tart o' woe! would be scarce among us," said the goodwife brightening, "if ye shouldna have that, and as gude a tweed as ever cam aff a p'rt. I'll speak to Johnnie Goodside, the weaver at the Castle-town, they be very good weavers there ye wad be just as happy as ye like to see a body else that would be a sair wish to some folk."

I must not omit to mention, that our traveler left his trusty attendant, Wapsy to be a guest at Charlieshope. He left the boy to give me a knowledge of a troublesome attendant in the event of his being in any situation where secrecy and concealment might be necessary. He was therefore consigned to the case.
of the eldest boy, who promised, in the words of the old song, that he should have "A bit of his supper, a bit of his bed,"

and that he should be engaged in none of those perversities in which the race of Mustard and Pepper had suffered frequent mutilation. Brown now deposited in the post-office many letters and notes, and fixed the postmark with a temporary farewell of his trusty little companion.

There is an odd prejudice in these hills in favour of riding. Every farmer rides well, and rides the whole day. Probably the extent of their large pasture farms, and the necessity of surveying them rapidly, first introduced this custom; or a very zealous antiquary might derive it from the times of the Lay of the Last Minstrel, when gentlemen and ladies assembled at the light of the beacon-fires. But the truth is undeniable; they like to be on horseback, and can be with difficulty convinced that any one chooses walking from other motives than those of convenience or necessity. Accordingly, Dinnont insisted upon mounting his guest, and accompanying him on horseback as far as the nearest town in Dumfriesshire. But Brown had directed his baggage to be sent on, and from which he proposed to pursue his intended journey towards Woodbourne, the residence of Miss Manning.

Upon the way he questioned his companion concerning the character of the fox-hunter; but gained little information, as he had been called to that office while Dinnont was making the round of the highland farms in the Highlands.

"and, he dared to say, had gipsy blood in his veins—but at any rate he was none of the smashers that had been on their quarters in the moor—he would ken them well—Ken them and the stag. Surrounding his horse he bade folk among the gipsies too, to be sic a gang," added Dandie; "‘if ever I see that mad randle-tree of a wife again, I'll give her something to buy tobacco— I hope a great notion she meant me very fair after all.'"

While the farmer spoke, the good farmer held Brown long by the hand, and at length said, "Captain, the woo's a' weel up the year, that it's paid 'a' the rent, and we have nothing to wi' the rest of the siller when Ailie has her new gown, and the barns their bits o' duds—now I was thinking of some safe hand to put it into, for it's ower muckle to ware on brandy and sugar—now I have heard that you have such a one at Miss Man."

"Oh, this is from your kindness, and aye might just take your name to the siller, and aye offer some verra unexpected acquaintance to me," Brown, who felt the full delicacy that wished to disguise the conferring an obligation under the show of asking a favour, thanked his grateful host, and said he would have recourse to his purse, without scruple, should circumstances ever render it convenient for him. And thus they parted with many expressions of mutual regard.

CHAPTER XXVII.

If thou hast any love of mercy in thee,

Turn me upon my face that I may die. —JOANNA BaILLIE.

Our traveller hired a post-chaise at the station where he separated from Dinmont, with the purpose of proceeding to Kippenarina, there to inquire into the state of the family at Woodbourne, before he should venture to make his presence in the country known to Miss Manning. The stage was a long one of eighteen or twenty miles, and the road lay across the country. To add to the inconveniences of the journey, the snow began to fall pretty quickly. The postilion, however, proceeded on his journey for a good many miles, without expressing doubt or hesitation. It was not until the ninth or commodity was set in, that he intimated his apprehensions whether he was in the right road. The increasing snow rendered this intimation rather alarming, for as it drove full in the lad's face, and lay whitening all around him, it hurried in by the present ways out of the notice of the country, and to diminish the chance of his recovering the right track. Brown then himself got out and looked round, not, it may be well imagined, from an affectionate regard for the Woodbourne house at which he might make inquiry. But none appeared—he could therefore only tell the lad to drive steadily on. The road on which they were, ran through plantations of considerable extent and depth, and the traveller therefore conjectured that there must be a gentleman's house at no great distance. At length, after struggling wearily on for about a mile, the post-boy met a person that had neither horses nor sleds, did not budge a foot further; "but he saw," he said, "a light among the trees, which must proceed from a house; the only way was to inquire the road there."

Our traveller grooped along the side of the enclosure from which the light glimmered, in order to find some mode of approaching in that direction, and to simulate at every step in the slush, and to avoid a stile in the hedge, and a pathway leading into the plantation, which in that place was of great extent. This promised to lead to the light which was the object of his search. But the distance was next in that direction, but soon totally lost sight of it among the trees. The path, which at first seemed broad and well marked by the opening of the wood through which it had been widened was distinctly distinguishable, although the whiteness of the snow afforded some reflected light to assist his search. Directing himself as much as possible through the more open parts of the wood, he proceeded almost a mile without either encountering a view of the light, or seeing any thing resembling a habitation. Still, however, he thought it best to persevere in that direction. It must surely have been a light in the hut of a forester, for it showed itself so rapidly, and Brown's impatience was obvious there was a deep dell, or ravine of some kind, between him and the object of his search. Taking every precaution to preserve his footing, he continued to descend until he reached the bottom of a very steep and narrow glen, through which winded a small rivulet, whose course was then almost choked with snow. He now found himself embarrassed among the ruins of cottages, whose black gables, rendered more distinguishable by the contrast with the whitened surface from which they rose, were still standing; the side-walls had long since given way to time. He was perforce stopped, piled snow to heaps, and snow-flakes, and snowstorms, and snow-winds; he offered frequent and embarrassing obstacles to our traveller's progress. Still, however, he persevered, crossed the rivulet, not without some trouble, and at length, by a broad and open space, which was now covered with snow, ascended its opposite and very steep bank, until he came on a level with the building from which the gleam proceeded.
GUY MANNERING.

It was difficult, especially by so imperfect a light, to discover the nature of this edifice; but it seemed a square building of small size, the upper part of which was totally rumous. It had, perhaps, been the abode, in former times, of some lesser proprietor, or a place of sacrifice, but the buildings were much altered, and in a case of need, for one of greater importance. But only the lower vault remained, the arch of which formed the roof in the present state of the building. Brown first approached the place from whence the light proceeded, which was a long narrow slit or loop-hole, such as usually are to be found in old castles. Impelled by curiosity to reconnoitre the interior of this strange place before he entered, Brown glanced at this aperture. A scene of greater desolation could not well be imagined.

There was a fire upon the roof, the smoke of which, after circling through the apartment, escaped by a hole broken in the roof above. Seen by this smoky light, had the rude and waste appearance of a ruin of three centuries old at least. A cask or two, with some broken boxes and packages, lay about the place, and sometimes one or two of them would be found, but the inmates chiefly occupied Brown's attention. Upon a lair composed of straw, with a blanket stretched over it, lay a figure, so still, that, except that it was not dressed in the ordinary style of the glens, Brown would have concluded it to be a corpse. On a steadier view he perceived it was only on the point of becoming so, for he heard one or two of those low, deep, and hard-drawn, breaths characteristic of the frames in tenacious of life.

A female figure, dressed in a long cloak, sat on a stone by this miserable couch; her elbows rested upon her knees, and her face, averted, on her iron lamp; she was alone, and spoke, or rather was heard upon that of the dying person. She moistened his mouth from time to time with some liquid, and between wheals sung, in a low monotone cadence, once or twice spoke or listened, which, in the parts of Scotland, and the north of England, are used by the vulgar and ignorant to spread the passage of a parting spirit, like the tolling of the bell in a churchyard. This direful sob was heard with a slow rocking motion of her body to and fro, as if to keep time with her song. The words ran nearly thus:

"Wasted, weary, wherefore stay

With time and earth and clay?

From the body pass away—

Hark! the man is singing.

From thee doth thy mortal wound,

Mary Mother be thy speed,

Saints help to thee to ascend.

Hark! the knell is ringing.

Fear not snow-drift driving fast,

Sooth, or hail, or tempests.

Hark! the tempest is passing fast,

And the deep be on thee cast

Day shall never wake knowing.

Haste thee, haste thee, to be gone,

Earth fits thy last, and time draws on—

Gasp thy gasps, and meet thy last—

Day is near the breaking.

The song was passed, and was answered by one or two deep and hollow groans, that seemed to proceed from the very agony of the mortal strain. ‘It will not be,’ she muttered to herself—‘He cannot pass away with that on his mind—it tethers him here—

Heaven cannot abide it.

Earth refuses to hide it.’

The mysterious rites in which Meg Merrilies is described as engaged, belong to her character as a queen of her race. All know that giants in every country claim acquaintance with the gift of fortune-telling; but, as is often the case, they are liable to the superstitions of which they avail themselves in others. The correspondent of Blackwood, quoted in the Introduction to this Tale, gives some information on the subject of their credulity.

‘I do not understand,’ he says, speaking of the Yetholm giants, ‘that they are extremely superstitious—carefully avoiding the formation of the clouds, the flight of particular birds, and the like. I am told that they believe, before attempting any enterprise, they have been known for several successive days to earn to those things that concern them, to which they have been accustomed, and which they feared to escape. As for the giants, we have been assured, was offered to the entrance of any frightful form which they might meet with in the forest; but it seems that the habitations were in most such a sacred limit, and the subject of such superstition. A bride, even to this day, is always lifted over it, a rule it appears to be a very strange belief of their race.’

‘The redding strain,’ says the Yetholm giant, ‘is a blow received by a person who has been long in the forest, and who, on his return to his friends, is told by all the people to whom he comes, that he will be the most dangerous blow a man can receive.'
proach of those whose voices had been heard without.

Brown was a soldier, and a brave one; but he was also ma ture, and long to Mr. M—- he mastered his courage so completely, that the cold drops burst out from every pore. The idea of being dragged out of his miserable concealment by wretches, whose tra ture he had sought with murder, without the or the slightest means of defence, except entreaties, which would be only their sport, and cries for help, which could never reach other ear than their own—this was the press of the apparent conclusion of being associated with these felons, and whose trade of rapine and imposture must have hardened her against every human feeling,—the bitterness of his emotions must have clung to him. He endeavored to read in her to the withered and dark countenance, as the lamp threw its light upon her features, something that promised those feelings of compassion, which females, even in their most degraded state, can ac sume altogether smother. There was no such touch of humanity about this woman. The interest, whatever it was, that determined her in his favour, arose not from the impulse of compassion, but from some interminable activity with which she undertook the feet, to which he had no clew. It rested, perhaps, end the like, such as Lady Macbeth found to her father in the sleeping monarch. Such were the nostrils of the good, the good the good, and Brown's mind, as he gazed from his hiding place up on this extraordinary personage. Meantime the gang did not yet approach, and he was almost promised that the whole party would have been to the hut, and cursed internally his own irre solution, which had consented to his being caught up where he had neither room for resistance nor flight.

She was as dead enough. She seemed equally con victed of herself, and equally comforted at that sound that whistled round the old walls. Then she turned again to the dead body, and found something new to arrange or alter in its posture, with which she undertook the task. Brown noticed, and felt the fag end of Satan's dar you leave the door open?" was the first salutation of the party.

And when ever heard of a door barred when a man was in the dead throw?—how do you think the spirit was to get away through bolts and bars like these?"

Is he dead, then?" said one who went to the side of the coffin to look at the body.

"Ah, yes,—dead enough." said another, "but here's what shall give him a rousing lykewick." So saying, he fetched a keg of spirits from a corner, while Meg hastened to display pipes and tobacco. From the activity with which she undertook the task, Brown conceived good hope of her fidelity towards her guest. It was obvious that she wished to engage the ruffians in their debauch, to prevent the discovery where they had been and what they had been doing.
Brown should approach too nearly the place of Brown's concealment.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Norse: nor a farmer own we now,
Nor nose nor latchet door.
Nor kind mate, bound, by holy vow,
To bless a good store.

Nor lull us in a gloomy den,
And light our own our own our day;
Upward ye, then, my merry men! JOANNA BAILLIE.

And use it as ye may.

Brown could now reckon his foes—they were five in number; two of them were very powerful men, who appeared to be either real seamen, or strollers who assumed that character; the other three, an old man and two lads, were slighter made, and, from their black hair and dark complexion, seemed to be Bohemian fugitives from justice. The lads were the other cup out of which they drank their spirits.

"Here's to his good voyage!" said one of the se men, drinking; "a equally night he's got, however, to the drift through it in their own way!"

We omit here various excursions with which these honorable gentlemen garnished their discourse, retaining only such of their expletives as are least offensive.

"A to the brown wind—" A had many a north-easter in his day."

"He had his last yesterday," said another gruffly;
"and now old Meg may pray for his last fair wind, as she's often done before."

"I'll pray for name's sake," said Meg, "nor for you neither, you randy dog. The times are ass altered since I was a kinchen-mort. Men were men then, and fought other in the open field, and there was none milling in the darkmans. And the gentry had kind, hearts, and would have given batth lap and ponnelt to any purs pipey; and there was none, from John nie Faa the upright man, to little Chirnios that was in the pansie-quot, and not some of them, but yes, ye are a altered—from the gude auld rules, and no wonder that you scour the cramp-ring, and trine

The party burst out a hoarse laugh at Meg's prophecy.

"What made you come back here, ye auld belam?" said one of the pigs; "could ye no have staid where you were, and spaced fortunes to the Cumber nand land-flats and the"—but Brown had a perfect see that nobody has scented; that's a you're good for now."

"Is that a I am good for now?" said the indig mution. "I was good for mair than that in the great fight between our folk and Patricus Gules';
if I had not helped you with these very families, (holding up her hands,) Jean Baillie would have frummaged ye, ye feckless doo-little!"

There was here another laugh at the expense of the hero who had received this amason's assistance.

"Here, mother," said one of the sailoors, "here's a cup of the right for you, and never mind that bully huff."

Meg drank the spirits, and, withdrawing herself from further conversation, sat down before the spot where Brown lay; but in such a place it may have been difficult for any one to have approached it without her rising. The men, however, showed no disposition to disturb her.

They closed around the fire, and held deep consultation low tone in which they spoke, and the cant language which they used, prevented Brown from understanding much of their conversation.
He gathered in general, that they expressed
"He shall have his gruel," said one, and then whispered something very low into the ear of his comrade.

"I'll have nothing to do with that," said the other.

"No, by G—d, no more than yourself, but I won't —-it was something like that stopped all the trade

"I have heard him (indicating the corpse by a jerk of his head) tell about that job. G—d, how he used to laugh when he showed us how he fetched him off the lochside!"

"Well, but it did up the trade for one while," said Jack.

"How should that be?" asked the sly villan.

"Why," replied Jack, "the people got lusty aro

CHAP. XXVIII.

And would not deal, and they had bought so many boughs that—'

"Well, for all that," said the other, "I think we should be down upon the fellow one of these dark nights, and him get it with us!

But old Meg asleep now," said another; "she grows a drivelier, and is afraid of her shadow. She'll sing out, some of these odd-come-shorties, if you don't look after her that."

"Never mind that," said the old gipsy man; "Meg's true-bred; she's the last in the gang that will start—but she has some queer ways, and often cuts queer corners.

With more of this gibberish, they continued the conversation, rendering it thus, even to each other, a dark obscure dialect, eked out by significant nods and signs, but never expressing distinctly, or in plain language, the subject on which it turned. At length one of them, observing Meg was still fast asleep, or appeared to be so, desired one of the lads "to hand in the black Peter, that they might flick it open. The boy stepped to the door, and brought in a portmanteau, which Brown instantly recognized for his own. His thoughts immediately turned to the unfortunate lad he had left with the carriage. Had the ruffians managed to get possession of him?—his mind. The agony of his attention grew yet keener, while the villagers pulled out and admired the different articles of his clothes and linen, he examined, and sought for, but it might intangibly state the fate of the posse. But the ruffians were too much delighted with their prize, and too much busied in examining its contents, to enter into any detail concerning the manner in which they had acquired it. The portmanteau contained various articles of apparel, a pair of pistols, a leather case with a few paper, and some money, &c. &c. At any other time Brown would have looked with an excess of awe to see the uncovenantor in whom the thieves shared his property, and made themselves merry at the expense of the owner. But the moment was too peculiarly charged with the presence of what had immediate reference to self-preservation.

After a sufficient scrutiny into the portmanteau, and an equitable division of its contents, the ruffians applied themselves more closely to the serious occupation of drinking, in which they spent the greater part of the night. Brown was for some time in great hope that they would drink so deep as to render themselves incapable of robbing him, and so have been an easy matter. But their dangerous trade required precautions inconsistent with such unlimited indulgence, and they stopped short on this side of absolute inebriety, and then that. They might have rested themselves to rest, while the fourth watched. He was relieved in this duty by one of the others, after a vigil of two hours. When the second watch had elapse, and he awoke, and found himself composed, the moon being up, and Brown's inexpressible relief, began to make some preparations as to for departure, bundles up the various articles which each had appropriated. Still, however, there remained something to be done. Two of them, after some rummagings, which not a little alarmed Brown, produced a mattock and shovel, another took a pickaxe from behind the straw on which the dead body was extended. With these implements two of them left the hut, and the remaining three, two of whom were the seamen, very strong men, still remained in garnison.

After the space of about half an hour, one of those who had departed again returned, and whispered the others. They wrapped up the dead body in the seacoal which had served as a pall, and went out, bearing it along with them. The agonized retired from his real or feigned slumber. She first went to the door, as if for the purpose of watching the departure of her late inmates, then returned, and commenced to laugh and stifled sobs, to follow her instantly. He obeyed; but, on leaving the hut, he would willingly have reprehended himself of his money, or papers at least, but this he prohibited in the most peremptory manner. It immediately occurred to him that the suspicion of having removed any thing, of which he might possess himself, would fall upon this woman, by whom, in all probability, his money had been saved. He immediately desisted from his attempt, contenting himself with seizing a cutlass, which one of the ruffians had hung aside among the straw. On his feet, and possessed of a knife, he appeared to be delivered from the dangers which beset him. Still, however, he felt stiffened and cramped, both with the cold, and by the constrained and unaltered position which he had maintained all night. At last, the gipsy from the door of the hut, the fresh air of the morning, and the action of walking, restored circulation and activity to his benumbed limbs. The pale light of a winter's morning was rendered more clear by the snow, which was lying all around, crissped by the influence of a severe frost. Brown cast a hasty glance at the landscape around him, that he might be able again to know the spot. The little tower, of which only a single vault remained, forming the dismal apartment in which he had spent this remarkable night, was perched on the very point of a projecting rock overhanging the wharfe. It was accessible only by a ladder, and that from the ravine or glen below. On the other three sides the bank was precipitous, so that Brown had on the preceding evening escaped more dangers than one; for, had he had in the tower, he might have once his purpose, he must have been dashed to pieces. The dell was so narrow that the trees met in some places from the opposite sides. They were now covered with snow ranged in a line which drained the snow by the rocks which had formed a sort of frozen canopy over the rivulet beneath, which was marked by its darker colour, as it soaked its way obscurely through wreaths of smoke in one place where the glen was a little wider, leaving a small piece of flat ground between the rivulet and the bank, were situated the ruins of the hamlet in which Brown had been involved on the preceding evening. The ruined buildings, the ruins which were covered with turf-smoke, looked yet blacker, contrasted with the patches of snow which had been driven against them by the wind, and with the drifts which lay around them.

Upon this wintry and dismal scene, Brown could only at present cast a very hasty glance; for his guide, after pausing an instant, as if to permit him to indulge his feelings, had then and there composed himself for the path which led into the glen. He observed, with some feelings of suspicion, that she chose a track already marked by several feet, which he could only suppose to be the track which had been taken during the night in the vault. A moment's recollection, however, put his suspicions to rest. It was not to be supposed that the woman, who might have delivered him up at once, had the least need; he, without more or less, would have suspended her supposed treachery until he was armed, and in the open air, and had so many better chances of defence or escape. He therefore followed his guide in confidence and silence. They crossed the small brook at the same place where it previously had been passed by those who had gone before. The foot-marks then proceeded through the ruined village, and thence down the gully, the path was again narrowed to a ravine, after the small opening in which they were situated. But the gipsy no longer followed the same track; she turned aside, and led the way by a very rugged and uneven path up the bank which overhung the village. Although the snow in many places hid the path-way, and rendered the footing uncertain and unsafe, Meg proceeded with a firm and determined step, which indicated an intimate knowledge of the ground she traversed. At length they gained the top of the bank, through a passage so steep and intricate, that Brown, though convinced of their not being pursued, and convinced that he had fallen asleep on the night before, was not a little surprised how he had accomplished the task without breaking his neck. Above, the country opened wide and untenanted, till it was a mile or two before the eye met with anything but grass and scattered heather, accompanied by some thick plantations of considerable extent.

* Got so many warrants out.
* All out of article in the case, is when a rogue, being apprehended, peaches against his commander.
Megg, however, still led the way along the bank of the brook; and they had ascended until she heard beneath the marshy ground for the trees, planted to a deep plantation of trees at some distance.

— The road to Rappeltrian, she said, 'is on the other side of the brook.' And now she said, 'Can there be a path or path there?'

— And you have lost all—say. She fumbled in an immense pocket, from which she produced a greasy purse. I have been thinking to pay her back in money; and she had given her promise on Meg and herself—and she had lived to pay it back in a small degree—'and she placed the purse in her hand.

The woman is insane, thought Brown; but it was not the same woman for the point, because the sound was heard in the ravine below, as he proceeded from the banditti. How shall I repay this money, she said, or how shall I repay the kindness you have done me.

— I have both to repay, answered the sibyl, speaking slowly and hazily; 'one, that you will never speak of what you have seen this night; the other, that you have left the country all you see again, and that you leave word at the Gordon-army where you are to be heard of; and when I next call for you, be it in church or market, at wounding or at burial, Sunday or Saturday, mea time or fasting, I will have it copied with the sibyl's copy of you.'

— Why, that will do you little good, mother.

— But 'twill do you more, that's what I'm thinking of—I am not mad, although I have had enough of it. I am not mad, except when I am drunk—know what I am asking, and I know it is to be the will of God to preserve you in strange dangers, and that I shall be the instrument to set you in your father's seat again. Sae give me your promise, and mind that you owe your life to me this blessed night.

There's wiliness in her manner, certainly, thought Brown; but yet it is more the wildness of energy than of madness.

— Well, mother, since you do ask so uselessly and trifling a favour, you have my promise. It will at least give you opportunity to repay your money with additions. You are an uncommon kind of creature, no doubt, but—'

— Away, away, then!' said she, waving her hand.

— Think not about the good—it's your sin; but remember your promise, and do not dare to follow me or see me again. So saying, she plunged again into the dell, and descended it with great agility, the water of the brook, the snow and snowheaths covering down after her as she disappeared.

Withstanding her prohibition, Brown endeavoured to gain some point of the bank, from which he could discover and with some difficulty, (for it must be conceived that the utmost caution was necessary,) he succeeded. The spot which he attained for this purpose was the point of a projecting rock, which rose precipitously from among the trees. By kneeling down among the snow, and stretching his head cautiously forward, he could observe what was going on in the bottom of the dell. He saw, as he expected, his companions of the last night, now joined by two or three others. They had cleared away the snow from the foot of the rock, and dug a deep pit, which was designed to serve the purpose of grave. Around this they stood, and lowered it into something wrapped in a naval cloak, which Brown instantly concluded to be the dead body of the man he had seen expire. They then stood silent for half an hour, as if under some touch of feeling for the loss of their companion. But if they experienced such, they did not long remain under its influence, for all hands went presently to work to fill up the grave. Brown discerning that the task would be soon ended, thought it best to take the gypsy-woman's hint, and walk as fast as possible until he should gain the shelter of the plantation.

But the first thought of was the gypsy's purse. He had accepted it without hesitation, though with something like a feeling of degradation, arising from the character of the man, and the mode in which it was obtained. But it relieved him from a serious though temporary embarrassment. His money, excepting a very few shillings, was in his portmanteau, and that was in possession of Miss Woodhouse, who had been sent to write to her agent, or even to apply to her host at Charlestown, who would gladly have supplied him. In the meantime, he resolved to avail himself of Meg's words, confident that it would give him a speedy opportunity of replacing it with a handsome gratuity. It can be but a trifling sum, — and I dare say the good lady may have a share of my bank-notes to make the small sum."

With these reflections he opened the leathern-purse, expecting to find at most three or four guineas. But when he saw how much he was surprised to discover that it contained, besides the comparatively small quantity of those of different coinages and various countries, the joint amount of which could not be short of a hundred pounds, several valuable rings and ornaments set with jewels, and, as appeared from the slight inspection he had time to give them, of very considerable value.

Brown was equally astonished and embarrassed by the circum-stances in which he found himself, possessed, as he now appeared to be, of property to a much greater amount than his own, but which had been obtained in all probability by the same nefarious means that had fetched his companion. He could not, therefore, himself to admire his own remarkable story. But a moment's consideration brought several objections to this mode of procedure. In the first place, by observing this course, he should break, his promise of silence, and might probably by that means involve the safety, perhaps the life, of this woman, who had risked her own to preserve his, and who had voluntarily endowed him with this treasure—a generosity which might have become the means of his ruin. This was not to be thought of. Besides, he was a stranger, and, for a time at least, unprovided with means of establishing his own character and credit. He should have it condemned officer's assistance in managing matters so as to screen this unhappy madwoman, whose mistake or prejudice had been so fortunate for me. A civil magistrate might consider the interest of the sufferer for her at once, and the consequence in case of her being taken is quite evident—No, she has been upon honour with me if she were the devil, and I will be equally upon honour with her. She shall have the privilege of a court-martial, where the point of honour can qualify strict law. Besides I may see her at this place, Kippie—Couple—what did she call it—and then I can make restitution to her, and even let the law claim its own when it can secure her. In the meanwhile, however, I cut rather an awkward figure for one who has the honour to bear his Majesty's commission, being little better than the receiver of stolen goods.

With these reflections, Brown took from the gipsy's treasure three or four guineas, for the purpose of his immediate expenses, and tying up the rest in the purse which contained them, resolved not again to open it, until he could either restore it to her or whom it was given, or put it into the hands of some public functionary. He thought of the cunning, and his first impulse was to leave it in the plantation. But when he considered the risk of meeting with these ruffians, he could not resolve on parting with his arm. In this dilemma, he had lost so much of a military character as suited not amiss with his having such a weapon. Besides, to the custom of wearing swords by persons best of uniform, he had been macroscopically, and not yet so totally forgotten as to occasion... any particular remark towards those who chose to adhere to thee. Retaining, therefore, his weapon of defence in his bosom, and concealing the purse in a private pocket, our traveller strode gallantly on through the wood in search of the promised high-road.

CHAPTER XXIX.

All school-day's friendship, childhood innocence.
We, Berta, like two artful genii,
To see our wishes crowned both one flower,
Combining, on one cushion, on one cushion,
Both warbling of one song, both in glee key,
And both with our sides, voices, and mimic
Had been incorporated.

Julia Manning to Matilda Marchmont.

"How can you upbraid me, my dearest Matilda, with abatement in friendship, or fluctuation in affection? Is it possible for me, forget that you are the chosen of my heart, in whose faithful bosom I have deposited every feeling which your poor Julia dares to acknowledge to herself? And you do me equal injustice by insinuating a difference on the friendship for that of Lucy Bertram. I assure you she has not the materials I seek for in a bosom confidante. She is a charming girl, to be sure, and I like her. She has beauty, wit, and we know whose engagements have left me less time for the exercise of my pen than our proposed regularity of correspondence demands. But she is totally devoid of that secret, acrobatic, and, as I often say, every contact with her, teaches me something of French and Italian, which she acquired from the most grotesque monster you ever beheld, whom my father has engaged as a kind of librarian, and whom he pays to correct his, to show his defences of the world's opinion. Colonel Manning seems to have formed a determination, that nothing shall be considered as ridiculous, so long as it appertains to or is connected with him. I remember he picked up somewhere a little mongrel cur, with hardly legs, a long back, and huge flapping ears. Of this uncouth creature he chose to make a favourite, in despite of all taste and opinion! I remember one instance which he alleged, of what he called Brown's pedantry, was, that he had criticised severely the crooked legs and drooping ears of Bongo. On my word, Matilda, I believe he nurses his high opinion of himself, above all other exalted of all pedants; I believe him to adhere to a principle. He seats the creature at table, where he pronounces a grace that sounds like the scream of the man in the square that used to cry mackerel, from the top of his chair. As he begins, he is, like a dustman loading his cart, and apparently without the most distant perception of what he is swallowing—then bursts forth another unnatural set of tones, by way of returning thanks, stalks out of the room and immerses himself among a parcel of huge worm-eaten folios that are as uncouth as himself! I could endure the creature well enough, had I any body to laugh at him along with me; but Lucy Bertram, if I but verge on the border of a jest affecting this same Mr. Sampson, (such is the horrid man's horrid name,) looks so piteous, that it deprives me of all spirit to proceed. And my father knits his brow, flashes fire from his eye, bites his lip, and says something that is extremely rude, and uncomfortable to my feelings.

It was not of this creature, however, that I meant to detestively offend, but of that, both in the modern as well as the ancient languages, he has contrived to make Lucy Bertram mistress of the former, and she has only, I believe, to thank her own goodness, that she is Hebrew, for aught I know, were not added to her acquisitions. And thus she really has a great fund of information, and I assure you I am daily surprised at the ease with which she seems to make herself by recollecting and arranging the subjects of her former reading. We begin to read together every morning, and I begin to like Italian much better than when we first took that concerted animal Cicero; this is the way to spell well, Cicero, and not Cicurichi—you see I grow a connoisseur.

But perhaps I like Miss Bertram more for the society she wants, than for the knowledge she possesses. She knows nothing of music whatsoever, and yet she must be ready to the meatiest peasants, who, by the way, dance with great zeal and spirit. So that I am instructor in my turn, and she takes with great gratitude, lessons from me on the harpsichord, and I have taught her some of La Pique's steps, and you know he thought me a promising scholar.

In the evening paper often reads, and I assure you he has the most poetical of poetry upon him. I am not like that actor who made a kind of jumble between reading and acting, staring and bellowing his brow and twisting his face, and gesticulating as if he were on the stage; and then he dressed out again. My father's manner is quite different—it is the reading of a gentleman, who produce-effect by feeling, taste, and inflection of voice, but not by action or mummerly. Lucy Bertram rides remarkably well, and I can now accompany her on horseback, having become accustomed by example. We walk also a good deal in spite of the cold—So, upon the whole, I have not quite so much time for writing as I used to have.

Besides, I have my share of all the stupid correspondents, that I have nothing to say. My hopes, my fears, my anxieties about Brown, are of a less interesting cast, since I know that he is at liberty. I cannot think that the time the gentleman might have given me some intimation what he was doing. Our intercourse may be an imprudent one, but it is not improper to feel very comfortable towards a person towards whom you should be the first to discover that such is the case, and to break off in consequence. I can promise him that we might not differ much in opinion should that happen to be his, for he seems to me to have behaved extremely foolish in that matter. Yet I have not an opinion of poor Brown, that I cannot but think there is something extraordinary in his silence.

To return to Lucy Bertram—No, my dearest Matilda, she can never, never rival you in my regard, so that all your affectionate jealousy on that account is without foundation. She is, to be sure, a very pretty, a very sensible, a very affectionate girl, and I think there are few persons to whose consolatory friendship I could have recourse more freely in what are called the evil effects of life. But then these are solid common misfortunes, which I think, our friends, will sympathise with distresses of sentiment, as well as with actual misfortune. Heaven knows, and you know, my dearest Matilda, that these diseases have not been a little the portion of the house; and I am convinced that the sight of evil as much as the evils of a more obvious and determinate character. Now Lucy Bertram has nothing of this kindly sympathy—nothing at all, my dearest Matilda. When I think of a few days which I have spent night after night to nurse me with the most unrequited patience; but with the fever of the heart, which my Matilda has soothe so often, she has no more sympathy than her old tutor. And yet what provokes me is that the demure monkey actually has a lover of her own, and that their mutual affection (for mutual I take it to be) has a great deal of complicated and romantic interest. She was always a great admirer of him, and I know, a great heiress, but was ruined by the prodigality of her father, and the villainy of a horrid man in whom he confided. And one of the handsomest young gentlemen in the world, but as he is heir to a great estate, she discourage his addresses on account of the disproportion of their fortune.

But with all this moderation, and self-denial, and modesty, and so forth, Lucy is a sly girl—I am sure she loves young Hazlwood, and I am sure he has some guess of that, and would probably bring her to know—No I am sure he has some guess of that, and would probably bring her to know, and I am sure he would give me an opportunity. But you must know the Colonel is always himself in the way to pay Miss Bertram those attentions which afford the best indirect opportunities for a young gentleman in Hazlwood's situation. But I have my good reasons, and I do not himself pay the usual penalty of meddling folks. I assure you, if I were Hazlwood, I should
GUY MANNERING.

Oh, my dear sir, I sent you a note construction upon— I would not be thought a fool for all the world.

'Then why do you talk like one?' said my father.

'Lord, sir, I am sure there is nothing so foolish in the world as what I said just now. Indeed, I am afraid I am not the very handsomest man,' (a smile was just visible) 'that is, for your time of life.' (The dawn was overcast), 'which is far from being advanced, and I am sure I don't know why you should not please yourself, if you have a mind. I am sensible I am but a thoughtless girl, and if a graver companion could render you more happy—'

'There was a mixture of displeasure and grave affectation in the manner in which my father took, that was a severe reprover to use trifling with his feelings. 'Julia,' he said, 'I bear with much of your petulance, because I think I have in some degree deserved it; but, finally, at least to the sacred claims of misfortune; and observe, that the slightest hint of such a jest reaching Miss Bertram's ears, would at once induce her to regard me as a most dangerous protector, into a world she has already felt so unfriendly.'

What could I say to this, Matilda?—I only cried heartily, begged pardon, and promised to be a good girl in future. And so here am I neutralized again, for I cannot, in honour, or on common good-nature, cease poor Lucy by interfering with Hazelwood, although I fear our memory still lingers on his turber; but, if he has so much as thought of me, he must not be led away by the peculiar notion of a kind of a manner of a certain tribe of Indians, who are a great deal of it, unless the expression of an unhappy object as your Julia, with a very homely expression of consequence, near Lucy's work-table. He made some observation, and her reply was one in which he did not see the merit of my sarcasm, for he is as sharp-sighted as a hawk, and two-footed, in short, all to see Miss Hazelwood heard this sound, and instantly repented his temporary breeze in some inland lake or tranquil bay, where there was every chance of sufficient cover to give interest and to require skill, without any sensible degree of danger. So that, upon the whole, Matilda, I think you should have had my father, with his pride of country, the height of his point of honour, his high talents, and his abstemious and mystical studies—You should have had Lucy Bertram too for your friend, whose fathers, with names which alike denote manhood and orthodoxy, ruled over this romantic country, and whose birth took place, as I have been inductively informed, under circumstances of deep and peculiar interest—You should have had, too, our good old mother, who was always at our disposition, and would not have been averse to our lonely walks to haunted ruins—and I should have had, in exchange, the lawns and shrubs, and greenhouses, and conservatories, of Pine-park, with your good, quiet, intelligent aunt, her chaperone in the morning, her nap after dinner, her hand at whist in the evening, not forgetting her fat coach-horses and fat coachman.

Take notice, however, that Brown is not included in the programme—good-humour, lively conversation, and open gallantry, suit my plan of life, as well as his athletic form, handsome features, and high spirit, would accord with a character of chivalry. So as we cannot change all in and out, I think we must e'en abide as we are."

Julia Mannerling to Matilda Marchmont.

"I rise from a sick-bed, my dearest Matilda, to communicate the strange and frightful scenes which have just passed. Alas! how little we ought to judge of the future in futurity! I closed my letter to you in high spirits, with some flippant remarks on your taste for the romantic and extraordinary in fictitious narrative. Had I been more experienced I should have had such events to record in the course of a few days! And to witness scenes of terror, or to contemplate them in description, is as different, my dearest Matilda, as to bend over the brink of a precipice holding by the frail tenure of a half-ruined shrub, or to admire the same precipice as represented in the landscape of Salvator. But I will not anticipate my narrative.

"I have no scruple to say that the story is frightful enough, though it had nothing to interest my feelings. You must know that this country is particularly favourable to the commerce of a set of desperate men from the Isle of Misery, a seaport in this country. Those smugglers are numerous, resolute, and formidable, and have at different times become the dread of the neighbourhood when any one has interfered with their contraband trade. The local magistrates, from timidity or worse motives, have become shy of acting against them, and impunity has rendered them equally daring and desperate. With all this, my father, a stranger in the land, and invested with no official authority, had, one would think, nothing to do. But it must be owned, that, as he himself expresses it, he was born when Mars was lord of his ascendant, and that step and stroke and blow found him in circumstances and situations the most retired and pacific.

"About eleven o'clock on last Tuesday morning, while Hazlwood and my father were preparing to walk to a little lake about three miles' distance, for the purpose of shooting wild ducks, and while Lucy and I were busy arranging our plan of work and study for the day, we were alarmed by the sound of a volley of gun-shot from the avenue. The ground was hardened by a severe frost, which made the clatter of the hoofs sound yet louder and sharper. In a moment, two or three men, armed, mounted, and each leading a horse loaded with packages, appeared on the lawn, and, without keeping upon the road, which makes a small sweep, pushed right across for the door of the house. Their appearance in a little space stirred up and drew down the stairs, and they frequently looked back like men with apprehended a charge and a deadly pursuit. My father and Hazlwood hurried from the door to see who they were, and what was their business. They were revenue officers, they stated, who had seized these horses, loaded with contraband articles, at a village near by. Their instructions had been reinforced, and they were now pursuing them with the avowed purpose of recovering the goods, and putting to death the officers who had presumed to do the king injury. The horses were loaded, and the pursuers gaining ground upon them, they had fled to Woodbourne, conceiving, that as my father had served the king, he would not refuse to protect the. servants on the farm, who were determined to be murdered in the discharge of their duty.

"My father, to whom, in his enthusiastic feelings of military loyalty, even a dog would be of importance if he came in the king's name, gave prompt orders for securing the goods in the hall, arming the servants, and defending the house in case it should be necessary. Hazlwood seconded him with great spirit, and we set off immediately, and stalked out of his den, and seized upon a bowling-piece, which my father had laid aside, to take what they call a rifle-gun, with which they shoot tigers, &c. in the East. The piece went off at the pond, and very nearly shot one of the excisemen. At this unexpected and involuntary explosion of his weapon, the Dominie (such is his nickname) exclaimed, 'Prodigious! such is his true calculation!' All stopped. But I observed could force the man to part with his discharged piece, so they were content to let him retain it, with the precaution of trusting him with no ammunition. This (excepting the alarm occasioned by the report) I apprised my notice at the time, you may easily believe; but in talking over the scene afterwards, Hazlwood made us very merry with the Dominie's ignorant but zealous valour.

"When my father had got every thing into proper order for defence, and his people stationed at the windows with their fire-arms, he wanted to order us out of danger—from the window. I was determined not to be prevailed upon to stir. Though terrified to death, I have so much of his own spirit, that I would look upon the peril which threatens us rather than hear it rage around me without knowing its nature or its progress. Lucy, looking as pale as a marble statue, and keeping her eyes fixed on Hazlwood, seemed not even to hear the prayers with which he conjured her to leave the house. The Dominie, who had come down from the hall-door should be forced, we were in little danger; the windows being almost blocked up with cushions and pillows, and, what the Dominie most lamented, the library, leaving only spaces through which the defenders might fire upon the assailants.

"My father had now made his dispositions, and we sat in breathless expectation in the darkened apartment, the men remaining all silent upon their posts, in anxious contemplation probably of the approaching danger. My father, who was quite at home in such a scene, walked from one to another, and repeatedly his orders, that no one should presume to fire until he gave the word. Hazlwood, who seemed to catch courage from his eye, acted as his aid-de-camp, and displayed the utmost coolness and direction of one place to another, and seeing them properly carried into execution. Our force, with the strangers included, might amount to about twelve men.

"At length the silence of this awful period of expectation was broken by a sound, which, at a distance, was like the rushing of a stream of water, but as it approached, we distinguished the heavy clang of a number of horses advancing very fast. I had arranged a loop-hole for myself, from which I could see the approach of the enemy. The noise increased, and came nearer, and at length thirty horses and men and more rushed at once upon the lawn. You never saw such horrid wretches! Notwithstanding the severity of the season, they were most of them stripped to the skin, and their hair was cut short, the ruffians knotted about their heads, and all
CHAPTER XXXI.

Julia Manning to Matilda Marchmont.

"I must take up the thread of my story, my dearest Matilda, where I left you yesterday. "

"For two or three days we talked of nothing but our sieve and its probable consequences, and dined into my father's unwilling ears a proposal to go to Edinburgh, or at least to Dublin, a remarkably good society, until the remission of those outlaws should blow over. He answered with great composure, that he had no mind to have his landowner's house and his own property at Woodbourne destroyed; that, with our good leave, he had usually been esteemed competent to take measures for the safety or protection of his family; that if he remained quiet at home, he conceived the welcome the villagers had received was not of a nature to invite a second visit, but should he show any signs of alarm, it would be the sure way to incur the very risk which we were afraid of. Heartened by his arguments, and by the extreme indifference with which he treated the supposed danger, we began to grow a little bolder, and to walk about as usual. Only the gentlemen were sometimes invited to take part when they attended us, and I observed that my father for several nights paid particular attention to having the house properly secured, and required his domestics to keep their arms in readiness in case of necessity."

"But three days ago, changed an occurrence, of a nature which alarmed me more by far than the attack of the smugglers."

"I told you there was a small lake at some distance from Woodbourne, where the gentlemen sometimes go to shoot wild-fowl. I happened at breakfast to say I should like to see this place, in its present frozen state, occupied by its ass and curlews, as they call those who play the particular sort of game that Rouget de Lisle. There is snow on the ground, but frozen so hard that I thought Lucy and I might venture to that distance, as the footpath leading there was well beaten by the repair of those who frequented it for pastime. Hazledew instantly offered to attend us, and we stipulated that he should take his fowling piece. He laughed a good deal at the idea of going a-shooting in the snow, but rejoined that he desired that a groomsman, who acts as gamekeeper occasionally, should follow us with his gun. As for Colonel Manning, he does not like crowds or sights of any kind where human presence is made manifest, unless indeed it was a military review—so he declined the party."

"We set out unusually early, on a fine frosty exhilarating morning, and we felt our minds, as usual, as our nerves, braced by the elasticity of the pure air. One talk to the lake was delightful, or at least, the difficulties were only such as diverted us, a slippery descent for instance, or a frozen ditch to cross, which made Hazlewood's assistance absolutely necessary. I do not think they walk the less for these occasional embarrassments.

"The scene upon the lake was beautiful. One side of it is bordered by a steep crag, from which hang a series of bog-oaks, and a few tall trees, but in the sun, on the other side, was a little wood, now exhibiting that fantastic appearance which the pine-trees present when their branches are loaded with snow. On the frozen surface of the lake itself there were a multitude of floating figures, some floating along with the velocity of swallows, some sweeping in the most graceful circles, and others deeply interested in a less active pastime, crowding round the spot where the inhabitants of two rival parties contended for the prize at curling,—an honour of no small importance, if we were to judge from the anxiety expressed both by the players and bystanders. We walked round the little lake, supported by Hazlewood, who lent us each an arm. He spoke, poor fellow, with great kindness, to old and young, and seemed deservedly popular among the assembled crowd. At length we thought of retiring.

"We took our leave, by a footpath, which led through a plantation of firs. Lucy had quitted Hazlewood's arm—it is only the plea of absolute necessity which reconciles her to accept his assistance. I walked with her, and she followed wistfully close, and the servant was two or three paces behind us. Such was our position, when at once, and as if he had started out of the earth, Brown stood before us at a short turn of the road! He was very plainly dressed, and I might say coarsely, dressed, and his whole appearance had in it something wild and agitated. I screamed between surprise and terror—Hazlewood must have taken the nature of my alarm, and, when Brown advanced towards me as if to speak, commanded him haughtily to stand back, and not to alarm the lady. Brown replied with equal asperity. He had no occasion to take lessons from him how to behave to that or any other lady. I am afraid that Hazlewood was not yet impressed with the idea that he belonged to the band of smugglers, and had some bad purpose in view. He heard and understood him imperfectly. He snatched the hanger from his servant, who was not much upon a line with us, and pointing the muzzle at Brown, commanded him to stand off at his peril. My screams, for my terror prevented my finding articulate language, only hastened the catastrophe. But, then, nothing happened. Brown sprang upon Hazlewood, grappling with him, and had nearly succeeded in wrenching the fowling-piece from his grasp, when the gun went off in the struggle, and the contents were lodged in Hazlewood's shoulder, who instantly fell. I saw no more, for the whole scene reeled before my eyes, and I fainted away; but, by Lucy's report, the unhappy purveyor was then as mad as a bear on the stage of the scene before him, until her screams began to alarm the people upon the lake, several of whom now came in sight. He then bounded over a hedge, which divided the footpath from the plantation, and has not since been heard of. The servant made no attempt to stop or secure him, and the report he made of the matter to those who came up to us, induced them readily to believe in their lugubrious view of life, than show their courage by pursuing a desperado, described by the groom as a man of tremendous personal strength, and completely armed.

"We heard from Lucy's servants that he is, at Woodbourne, in safety—I trust his wound will prove no respect dangerous, though he suffers much. But to Brown the consequences must be most disastrous. He is already the object of my father's resentment, and he has now incurred danger from the law of the land. I fearless from the vengeance of the father of Hazlewood, who threatens to move heaven and earth against the author of his son's wound. How will he be able to shroud himself from the eyes of this man? He will not be able to defend himself if taken, against the severity of laws which I am told, may even affect his life? and how can I find means to warn him of his danger? Then, poor Lucy!—no, I cannot suffer him to deceive his lover's wound, is another source of distress to me, and every thing round me appears to bear witness against that indiscretion which has occasioned this calamity.

"For two days I was very ill indeed. The news that Hazlewood was recovering, and that the persons who had shot him was nowhere to be traced, only that for certain he was one of the leaders of the gang of smugglers, gave me some comfort. The suspicion and pursuit being directed towards those people, must naturally facilitate Brown's escape, and I trust, by this, ensured it. But patrols of horse and foot traverse the country in all directions, and I am tortured by a thousand confused and unauthenticated rumours of arrests and discoveries.

"Meanwhile, my greatest source of comfort is the generous support and great amusement these circumstances afford me. I shall declare, that with whatever intentions the person by whom he was wounded approached our party, he is convinced the gun went off in the struggle by accident, and that he is not in any sort of mischief. The grooms, on the other hand, maintains that the piece was wrenched out of Hazlewood's hands, and deliberately pointed at his body, and Lucy inclines to the same opinion—I do not suspect them of wild exaggeration, yet such is the fulness of human testimony, for the unhappy shot was most unquestionably discharged unintentionally. Perhaps it would be the best for the boy to remain for a while in Hazlewood—but he is very young, and I feel the utmost repugnance to communicate to him my folly. I once thought of disclosing the mystery to Lucy, and began by asking what she recollected of the degraded features of the man whom we had so unfortunately met—but she ran out into such a horrid description of a hedge-ruffian, that I was deprived of all courage and disposition to own my attachment to one of such appearance as she attributed to him. I must say Miss Bertram is strangely biased by her prepossessions, for there are few handsomer men than poor Brown. I had not seen him for a long time, and even in his strange dress and sooty appearance, I could not but admire his figure, and under every disadvantage, his form seems to me, on reflection, improved in grace, and his features in expressive dignity. Shall we ever meet again?—I cannot help thinking of that, now I write to you. The dearest Matilda—but when did you otherwise?—yet again, write to me soon, and write to me kindly. I am not in a situation to profit by advice or reproof, nor have I my usual spirits to pacify them by raillery. I feel the terrors of a child, who has, in heedless sport, put in motion some powerful piece of machinery; and, while he beholds wheels revolving, chains clashing, cylinders rolling about him, is equally astonished at the tremendous powers which his weak agency has called into action, and terrified for the consequences which he is compelled to recognize, and with, perhaps, a sentiment of regret on his own account.

"I must not omit to say that my father is very kind and affectionate. The alarm which I have received forms a sufficient apology for my nervous complaints.

"My hopes are, that Brown has made his escape into the sister kingdom of England, or perhaps to Ireland, or the Isle of Man. In either case he may wait the issue of the present negotiations, which proceed with patience, for the communication of these countries with Scotland, for the purpose of justice, is not (thank Heaven) of an intimate nature. The consequences of his flight are very floors and fear, real as well as severe, followed the uniform and tranquil state of peared to Glossin a proper opportunity to impress upon the country at large the knowledge that rendered by an active magistrate, (for he had been in the commission for some time,) well acquainted the law, and no less so with the habits and habits of the illicit traders. He had some experience by a former close alliance with one of the most desperate smugglers, in consequence which he had occasionally acted, sometimes as paror, considering how short the rare of eminent cha-tacters of this description, and the frequent circumstances which occur to make them retire from particular scenes of action, had he the leisure to think that his present researches could possibly compromise any old friend who might possess means of retaliation. The having been concerned in these practices abstrusely, was a circumstance which, according to his opinion, ought in no respect to in terfere with his now using his experience in behalf of the public, or rather to further his own private views. To acquire the good opinion and connivance of Colonel Manning, would be no small object to .a gentleman who was much disposed to escape

Coventry; and to gain the favour of old Haizlewood, a gentleman who was living in the country, and importance still. Lastly, if he should succeed in discovering, apprehending, and convicting the culprit would have the satisfaction of marrying, and in some degree disparaging, Mr. MacCandish, Esquire, Sheriff-substitute of the county, this sort of investicitings of Glossin be successful in accomplishing

Actuated by motives so stimulants, and well acquainted with the lower retainers of the law, Glossin set every spring in motion to detect and apprehend, and if possible, some of the most notorious and bourne, and more particularly the individual who had wounded Charles Haizlewood. He promised high rewards, he suggested various schemes, and urged his personal interest among the old acquaintances who failed to the trade, urging that they had better make sacrifice of an understrapper or two than incur the odium of having favoured such atrocious proceedings.

But for some time all these exertions were in vain.

The common people of the county either favoured or feared the smugglers too much to afford any evidence against them. At length, this busy magistrate obtained information that a man, having the down and appearance of the person who had wounded Ha-zlewood, had lodged on the evening before the ren-court at the Gordon-arms in Kipplington. Thir-

Mr. Glossin immediately went, for the purpo of interrogating our old acquaintance, Mrs. Mc-Candish.

The reader may remember that Mr. Glossin did not, according to this good woman's phrase, stand high in her books. She therefore attended his summons to the parlour slowly and reluctantly, and, on entering the room, paid her respects in the coldest manner. The dialogue then proceeded as follows:

"A fine frosty morning, Mrs. Mac-Candish.

"At sir; the morning's well enough," answered the landlady, dilly.

"Mrs. Mac-Candish, I wish to know if the justices are to dine here as usual after the business of the court on Tuesday.

"I believe— I fancy not, sir—as usual"—(about to leave the room.)

"Stay a moment, Mrs. Mac-Candish—why, you are in a provoking hurry, my good friend?—I have been thinking a club dining here once a month would be a very pleasant thing.

"Certainly, sir; a club of respectable gentlemen.

"True, true," said Glossin, "I mean landed proprietors and gentlemen of weight in the county; and I should like to set up such a thing among us.

The short dry cough with which Mrs. Mac-Cand-leish received this proposal, by no means indicated any dislike to the overt, abstruse consideration, but inferred much doubt how far it would success.

under the suspicions of the gentleman by whom it was proposed. It was not a cough negative, but a cough ominous, and as such Glossin felt it, but it was not his way to take it lightly.”

“Have there been brisk doings on the road, Mrs. Mac-Candlish? plenty of company, I suppose?”

“Pretty weel, sir,—but I believe I am wanted at the inn.”

“No, no,—stop one moment, cannot you, to oblige an old customer?—Pray, do you remember a remarkably tall young man, who lodged one night in your house? I saw him.”

“Troth, sir, I canna weel say—I never take heed whether my company be long or short, if they make a lang bill.”

“But if they do not, you can do that for them, eh, Mrs. Mac-Candlish?—ha, ha, ha!—But this young man that I inquire after was upwards of six feet high, had a dark frock, with metal buttons, light-brown hair unpowdered, and a straight nose, travelled on foot, had no servant or baggage—you surely can remember having seen such a traveller?”

“Indeed, sir,” answered Mrs. Mac-Candlish, bent on baffling his inquiries, “I canna charge my memory with such things. I have a house in town, like this, I thrw, than to look after passengers’ hair, or their e'en, or noses either.”

“Then, Mrs. Mac-Candlish, I must tell you in plain language, there is suspicion of having been guilty of a crime; and it is in consequence of these suspicions that I, as a magistrate, require this information from you,—and if you refuse to answer my questions, I must put you upon your oath.”

“Troth, sir, I am no free to swear—we ay gae to the Antiburgh meeting—it’s very true, in Baillie Mac-Candlish’s time, (honest man,) we kept the kirk, while he was seemingly in his own, as having office—but after his being called to a better place than Kippit trangin, I ha’en gane back to worthy Master Mac-Grainer. And ye see, sir, I am no clear to passing judgment on the one—especially against any suckless purr young thing that’s gane through the country, stranger and friendless like.”

“I shall relieve your scruples, perhaps, without troubling Mr. Mac-Grainer, when I tell you that this young fellow with whom I inquire after is the man who shot your young friend Charles Hazelwood.”

“Gudness! who could ha’e thought the like o’ that o’ him?—na, if it had been for debt, or e’en for a bit tuitie wi’ the gauger, the devil o’ Nelly Mac-Candlish’s tongue should ever ha’ wrung him. But if he really shot young Hazelwood—But I canna think ye’ll say this will be for your skin’s sake—now—I canna think it o’ sae douce a lad;—na, na, this is just some o’ your auld skite.—Ye’ll be for havin’ a horning or a caption after him.”

“I am in confidence, Mrs. Mac-Candlish; but look at these declarations, signed by the persons who saw the crime committed, and judge yourself if the description of the ruffian be not that of your guest.”

He put the papers into her hand, which she perused very carefully, often taking off her spectacles to cast her eyes up to Heaven, or perhaps to wipe a tear from them, for young Hazelwood was an especial favourite of hers. “Awee, awee,” she said, when she had concluded her examination, “since it’s e’en sae, I gie him up, the villain—But O, we are oor mortalities!I never saw a face like that, and I’m no in a mind to see a face like that any more, I thought he had been some gentleman under trouble.”—“But I gie him up, the villain!—to shoot Charles Hazelwood—and before the young ladies,—poor innocents!—I gie him up.”

“So you admit, then, that such a person lodged here the night before this vile business?”

“Troth did he, sir, and at the house were twa witnesses to hae seen him, pleasant looking man. It wanting for his spending, I’m sure, for he had a mutton-chop, and a mug of ale, and maybe a glass or two o’ wine—and I asked him to drink tea wi’—” said, "but an ordinary bit cutlass or hanger by his side."

"Now," said the Deacon, taking Gloсин by the button, (for, in considering this intricate subject, he had forgot Gloсин's character), "this is but doubtful after a',

Maister Gilbert—for it was not seen doomey likely that he would go down into battle wi' sic arms means."

Gloсин extricated himself from the Deacon's grasp, and from the discussion, thought not with rudeness; for it was his present interest to buy golden opinions from all sorts of people. He inquired the price of tea and sugar, and spoke of providing himself with the necessary provisions to have a handsome entertainment in resid-necs for a party of five friends, whom he intended to invite to dine with him at the Gordon Arms next Saturday week; and, lastly, he gave a half-crown to Jock Jabos, whom the hostler had deputed to hold his stead.

"Well," said the Deacon to Mrs. Mac-Candlish, as he accepted her offer of a glass of bitters at the bar, "the dell's noo ill as he's ca'd. It's pleasant to see a gentleman pay the regard to the business o' the county that Mr. Gloсин does."

"Aye, 'died is't, Deacon," answered the landlady;

"and yet I wonder our gentry leave their ain work to the like o' him. But as lang as ailler's current,

Deacon, folk massuna look ower nicely at what king's head's on't."

"I doubt Gloсин will prove but shand after a', mistresse," said Jabos, as he passed through the little lobby beside the bar; "but this is a gude half-crown ony way."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

A man that apprehends death to be no more dreadful but as a drunken sleep; careless, reckless of that which is present, or to come; insensible of mortality, and desperately mortal.

Measure for Measure.

Gloсин had made careful minutes of the information derived from these examinations. They threw little light upon the story, so far as he understood its purport; but the better informed reader has received through means of this investigation, an account of Brown's proceedings, before the Attorney left him upon his way to Kippletringan, and the time when, stung by jealousy, he so rashly and unhappily presented himself before Julie Mannerings, and well nigh brought to a fatal termination the quarrel which his appearance occasioned.

Gloсин rode slowly back to Ellengowan, pondering on what he had heard, and more and more convinced that the active and raspy prosecution of this mysterious business was an opportunity of ingranitising himself with Haslewood and Mannerings, to be on no account neglected. Perhaps, also, he felt taking his professional acuteness interested in bringing it to a successful close. It was, therefore, with great pleasure that on his return to his house from Kippletringan, he heard his servants announce hastily, that Mac

Guflug, the thief-taker, and two or three concurrents, had a man in hands in the kitchen waiting for his honour.

He instantly jumped from horseback, and hastened into the house. "Send my clerk here directly, I'll find him copying the survey of the estate in the little green parlour. Set things to rights in my study, and wheel the great leathern chair up to the writing-table corner, and take a stool for Mr. Scrupus. (for, he entered the presence-chamber,) hand down Sir

George Mackenzie on Crimes; open it at the section prisoner—I know I’ll sort him—but stay, first send up Mac-Guffog. Now, Mac-Guffog, where did ye find this child?

Mac-Guffog, a stout handy-legged fellow, with a neck like a bull, a face like a firebrand, and a most portentous squint of the left eye, began, after various contortions by way of courtesy to the Justice, to tell him how he had seen the Jew strike the boy by a pretence of knowing winks, which appeared to bespeak an intimate correspondence of ideas between the narrator and his principal audior. ‘Your honour sees I went down to the dock-yard, and I am a man of business, and I keep my eye on ’em; and I have kept my eye on ’em, by your leave, ever since I first stepped into that dock; and that is what the warrant is all about, or that is why I was kept by her that your honour knows ’em, by the sea-side. —So, says she, what are you after here? I’ll be come w—— a broom in your pocket first—Eliogbowan—So, says she, I’ll give you a broom and come free there. The Spaniards, for ye ken, says she, his honour Eliogbowan himself in former times—’

‘Well, well,’ said Glossin, ‘no occasion to be particular, tell the essentials.

‘Well, so we sat nattering about some brandy that I said I wanted, till he came in.’

‘What?’

He was pointing with his thumb inverted to the kitchen, where the prisoner was in custody. ‘So he had his griego wrapped close round him, and I judged he was not dry-handed — so I thought it was been done on to so he could sell it, and I was a Manxman man, and I kept my eye on him and her, for fear she had whistled. And then we began to drink about, and then I boiled he would not drink out a quantity of Hollands without drawing breath—and then he tried it—and he spoke so loud and clear, and the justice was sitting so near—Spurn came in, and we clinked the darest on him, took him as quiet as a lamb—and now he’s had his bit sleep out, and is as fresh as a May gowanan, to answer what your honour likes to speak. ’

This narrative, delivered with a wonderful quantity of gesture and grimace, received at the conclusion the thanks and praises which the narrator expected.

‘I’d like to ask the Justice, ’

‘Ay, ay, they are never without oarkers and slashers.’

‘Any papers?’

‘This bundle,’ delivering a dirty pocket-book.

‘Go down stairs, then, Mac-Guffog, and be in waiting. The officer left the room.

The clink of iron was immediately heard upon the stairs, and in two or three minutes a man was introduced, hand-cuffed and fettered. He was thick, brawny, and muscular, and although his shaggy and grazied hair marked an age somewhat advanced, his lithe figure showed he appeared, nevertheless, a person few would have chosen to cope with in personal conflict. His coarse and savage features were still fresh, and his eye still assumed the look of the potato plant, which had proved the immediate cause of his seizure. But the sleep, though short, which Mac-Guffog had allowed him, and still more a sense of the peril of his situation, had restored to him the full use of his faculties. The worthy judge, and the no less estimable captive, looked at each other steadily for a long time without speaking. Glossin apparently recognised his prisoner, but seemed at a loss how to proceed with his investigation. At length he broke silence. ’

‘A stranger,’ replied the other; ‘strange enough, I think — for hold me der d c y f l, if I seen ever here before.’

‘That won’t pass, Mr. Captain.’

‘I’ll try to pass, Mr. Justice — suppose? ’

‘And who will you be pleased to call yourself, then, for the present,’ said Glossin, ‘just until I shall bring some other folk to refresh your memory concerning who you are, or at least who you have seen?’

‘What bin I?—donner and blitzen! I bin Jans Jansou, from Covthaven — what salt Ich bin.’

‘What? a salt from a case which is found in the apartment a pair of small pocket pistols, which he loaded himself.’

‘Unarmed! ’

‘Gives information to the party concerned. ’ with ostentations care. ‘You may retire,’ said to his clerk, ‘and carry the people with you, but — but wait in the lobby within.’

‘Hand-cuffed.’

The clerk would have offered some remonstrance to his patron on the danger of remaining close such a desperate character, although ironed by the possibility of active exertion, but Glossin was too busy in his mind and with him; and—by the good fortune of Mrs. Justice took two short turns through the corridor, then drew his chair opposite to the prisoner, as we confronted him fully, placed the pistols before him, and kept his honor Eliogbowan himself in former times —’

Yow, Mynheer."

Glossin paused—the stout break upon his brow with its deep furrowed lines betokened sad feelings, while the hard encrusted miscreant who sat opposite, cooly rolled his tobacco in his cheek, and squirted the juice into the fire-grate. "It would be ruin," said Glossin to himself, while his eye and brow darkened; there was no breadth or space left in his Within and then what might be the consequence of concoction with these men?—yet there is so little time to take measures—Hark you, Hatterack; I can't set you at liberty; if I can put you where you may set yourself at liberty—I always like to assist an old friend. I shall confine you in the old castle for to-night, and give these people double allowance of grog. Mac-Guflog will come and see you. They have stanchions on the window of the strong-room, as they call it, are wasted to pieces, and it is not above twelve feet from the level of the ground without, and the further deepens."

"But the darbies," said Hatterack, looking upon his fetters.

"Hark ye," said Glossin, going to a tool chest, and taking out a key, "there's a friend for you, you know the road to the sea by the staircase."

Hatterack shook his chains in ecstasy, as if he were already at liberty, and strove to extend his fettered hand towards his protector. Glossin laid his finger upon his lips, and ordered the idea of murder to be put aside, and then proceeded in his instructions. When you escape, you had better go to the Kaime of Dernclough."

"Donner! that howff is blown.""

"The devil!—well, then, you may steal my skiff that lies on the beach there, and away. But you must remain safe at the Point of Warroch till I come to see you."

"The Point of Warroch?" said Hatterack, his countenance again falling. "What, in the cave, I suppose? I would rather it were any where else—no, no, I must go; I must go."

But don't be hasty!—Strafe mich helle! it shall never be said Dick Hatterack feared either dog or devil. So I am to wait there till I see you?"

"Ay, ay," answered Glossin, "and now I must call in the men." He did so accordingly."

"I can make nothing of Captain Janson, as he calls himself, Mac-Guflog, and it's now too late to bundle him off to the county jail. Is there not a strong room yonder in the old castle?"

"Ay there is, sir; my uncle the constable once kept a man in it,—it was safe and strong, a man might take out a man's head. But there was an unco dust about it—it was tried in the Inner-house afore the seiften.

"I know all that, but this person will not stay there very long."

"Well, I will have a night, a mere lock-up house till further examination. There is a small room through which it opens, you may light a fire for yourselves there, and I'll send you plenty of stuff to make you comfortable. But be sure you lock the door upon the prisoner; and hark ye, let him have a fire in the strong room too, the season requires it. Perhaps he'll make a clean breast to-morrow."

With these instructions, and with a large allowance of food and liquor, the Justice dismissed his party to keep guard for the night in the old castle, under the full hopes and belief that they would neither spend the night in watching nor prayer.

There was little fear that Glossin himself should that night sleep over-sound. His situation was perilous in the extreme, for the schemes of a life of villainy seemed at once to be crumbling around and above him. He laid himself to rest, and tossed upon his pillow for a long time in vain. At length he fell asleep, but it was only to dream of his patron—now, as the cloud had passed, and the sun was rising upon his features, then again transformed into all the vigour and comeliness of youth, approaching to expel him from the mansion-house of his fathers. There he stood—wild, and wilder, and wilder, heath, came he at length to an inn, from which sounded the voice of revelry; and when that entered, the first person he met was Frank Kennedy, all smashed and gory, as he had lain on the beach at Warroch Point, but with a reeking punch-bowl in his hand. Then the scene changed to a dungeon, where he has heard how Hatterack, with his latest under sentence of Death, confessing his crimes to a clergyman.—"After the bloody deed was done," said the penitent, "we retreated into a cave close beside, the secret of which is known to all the good men of this country; we were debating what to do with the child, and we thought of giving it up to the gipsies, when we heard the cries of the pursuers hallooing to us. So we took the child and each other and hid ourselves in the cave, and it was that man who knew the secret—but we made him our friend at the expense of half the value of the goods saved. By his advice we carried it off to Holland in our craft, which came the following night to take us from the coast. That man was—"

"No, I deny it!—it was not I!" said Glossin, in half-uttered accents: and, struggling in his agony to express his denial more distinctly, he awoke.

It was, however, conscience that had prepared this mental phantasmagoria. The truth was, that knowing much better than any other person the haunts of the smugglers, he had, while the others were secret in different directions, gone straight to the cave, even before he had learned the murder of Kennedy, whom he expected to find their prisoner. He came and made known to Hatterack the misdeeds of them in the midst of their guilty terrours, while the rage, which had hurried them on to murder, began, with all but Hatterack, to sink into remorse and fear. Glossin was by no means such a base and heartless man as he was already possessed of Mr. Bertram's ear, and, aware of the facility of his disposition, he saw no difficulty in enriching himself at his expense, provided the liquids were removed, while the estate became the unlimited property of the weak and prodigal father. Stimulated by present gain and the prospect of continuing advantage, he accepted the bribe which the friar offered him, and connived at, or rather encouraged, their intention of carrying away the child of his benefactor, who, if left behind, was old enough to have described the scene of blood which he had witnessed. The only palliative which the unceasing of Glossin could offer to his conscience was, that the temptation was great, and came suddenly upon him, embracing an it were the very advantages on which his mind had so long rested, and promising to relieve him from distresses which must have otherwise speedily overwhelmed him. Besides, he endeavoured to think that self-preservation required it. He felt, in some degree, in the power of the robbers, and pleased hard with his conscience, that had he declined their offers, the assistance which he could have called upon in the hour of distress, he would not have arrived in time to save him from men, who, on less provocation, had just committed murder.

Galled with the anxious forebodings of a guilty conscience, Glossin now arose, and looked out upon the night. The scene which we have already described in the beginning of our first volume, was now covered with snow, and the brilliant, though wasteful, whiteness of the land, gave to the sea by contrast a dark and vivid tinge. A landscape covered with snow, though abstractedly it may be called beautiful, has, both from the association of cold and barrenness, and from its comparative infrequency, a wild and desolate appearance. Objects, well known to us in their common state, have either disappeared, or are so strangely varied and disguised, that we seem gazing on an unknown world. But it was not with such reflections that the mind of this bad man was occupied. His eye was upon the gigantic and gloomy outline of the old castle, where, in a flanking tower, he had placed a number of dead men, who, by means of their lights, one from the window of the strong room, where Hatterack was confined, the other from that of the adjacent apartment occupied by his keepers. "Has he been there?—for all that is out and about so?—Have these men watched, who never watched before, in order to complete my ruin?—If morning finds him there, he must be committed to prison."

Mac-Morlan or some other person will take the matter.
Woodbourne, are now lying in the Custom-house at Portranferry (a small fishing-town).—Now I will come and carry him, which you know is beside the Custom-house.

"Yaw, the Rasp-house; I know it very well."

"And the red-coats are dispersed through the country; you land at night with the rew of your lugger, receive your own goods, and arrive the younger Brown with you back to Flushing.
Wont that do?"

"I will carry him to Flushing," said the Captain, "or to America?"

"Ay, ay, my friend."

"Or—to Jericho?"

"Ah! Wherely you have a mind."

"Ay, or—pitch him overboard?"

"Nay, I advise no violence."

"Nay, nay—you leave that to me. Sturm-wetter!
I am a man of old. But hark ye, that am I, Dirk Hatterick, to be the better of this?"

"Why, is it not your interest as well as mine?"
said Glosen; "besides, I set you free this morning.
You are no longer my servant; I set myself free. Besides, it was all in the way of your profession, and happened a long time ago, ha, ha, ha!"

"PSHAW! PSHAW! dont let us jest; I am not giving you a French compliment—but it's your affair as well as mine."

"What do you talk of my affair? is it not you that keep the younger's whole estate from him? Dirk Hatterick has enough to worry him with.

"Hush—hush—I tell you it shall be a joint business."

"Why, will ye give me half the kit?"

"What, half the estate?—d'ye mean we should set up here in Balloch, with the property Ellangowan, and take the barony, ridgy about?"

"Sturm-wetter, no! but you might give me half the value—half the gelt. Live with you? no. I would have a lust-haus of mine own on the Middlebrough, no thyka, and a blumen-garten like a burgomaster's.

"Ay, and a wooden lion at the door, and a painted sentinel in the garden, with a pipe in his mouth—but hark ye, Hatterick; what will all the tigers, flower-gardens, and pleasure-houses in the Netherlands do for you, if you are hanged here in Scottland?"

Hatterick's countenance fell. "Der devill hunged.

"Ay, hanged, meinheer Captain. The devil can scarcely save Dirk Hatterick from being hanged for a treason like this. If the matter of Ellangowan should settle in this country, and if the galfant Captain chances to be caught here re-establishing his fair trade! And I won't say but, as peace is now so much talked of, their High Mightinesses may not hand him over to oblige their new allies, even if he remained in fader-land.

"Fox hagel blitzen and donner! I—do not you say true."

"Not," said Glosen, perceiving he had made the desired impression, "not that I am against being civil;" and he slid into Hatterick's passive hand a bank-note of some value.

"Is this all?" said the smuggler; "you had the price of half a cargo for winking at our job, and made us do your business too."

"But, my good friend, you forget—in this case you will recover all your own goods."

"Ay, at the risk of all our own necks—we do that without you."

"Doubt not what Captain Hatterick," said Glosen
d dryly, "because you would probably find a dozen red-coats at the Custom-house, whom it must be my business, if we agree about this matter, to have removed.
Could you, come as I am, I say, be liberal as I can, but you should have a conscience."

"Now strafe mich der devill!—this provokes me more than all the rest!—You rob and you murder, and you want me to rob and murder, and play that silver-cooper, or kidnapper, as you call it, a dozen times over, and then, hanged and wind-storm I you speak to me of conscience!—Can you think of it fairer way of getting rid of this unlucky lad?"

"No, mein heer; but as I commit him to your charge."

"To my charge—to the charge of steel and gun powder and—well, if it must be, must—but you have a tolerably good guess what's like to come of it."

"O, my dear friend, I trust no degree of severity will be necessary," replied Glosen.

"Severity!" said the fellow, with a kind of groan,
"I wish you had had my dreams when I first came to this dog-hole, and tried to sleep among the dry sea-grass. First, there was that devilish thing he cut his broken back, sprawling as he did when I hurled the rock over a-top on him—he, lie, you would have sworn he was lying on the floor where you stand, wriggling like a fish, in the wet sand then."

"Nay, my friend," said Glosen, interrupting him,
"what signifies going over this nonsense?—If you are turned chicken-hearted, why, the game's up, that's all—the game's up with us both."

"Chicken-hearted?—No. I have not lived so long upon the account to start at last, neither for devil nor Dutchman."

"Well, then, take another snatches—the cold's at your heart still. And now tell me, are any of your old crew with you?"

"Nay—all dead, shot, hanged, drowned, and annoyed. Brown has died and—God bless all—die but God and he would go off the country for a spil of money —or he'll be quiet for his own sake—or old Meg, his aunt, will keep him quiet for hers."

"Which Meg?"

"Meg Merrylies, the old devil's limb of a gipsey witch."

"Is she still alive?"

"Nay."

"And in this country?"

"And in this country. She was at the Kimm of Dermleigh, at Vanbeest Brown's last wuke, as they call it, the other night, with two of my people, and some of her own blasted gypsies and then."

"That's another breaker a-head, Captain! Will she not squeak, think yo?"

"Not she—she won't start—she swore by the salmon, if we did the kinekin no harm, she would ever tell how the gauer got it. Why, man, though I gave her a wipe with my hanger in the heat of the matter, and cut her arm, and though she was so long after in trouble, I tell you it at up at your borough-town there, der devill! old Meg was as true as steel."

"Why, that's true, as you say," replied Glosen.

"And yet if she could be carried over to Zeeland, or Hamburg, or—anywhere else, you know, it were as well."

Hatterick jumped upright upon his feet, and looked at Glosen from head to heel. "I don't see the spout's foot," he said, "and yet he must be the very devil!—But Meg Merrylies is closer yet with the Kobold than you are—ay, and I had never such weather as after having drawn her blood. Nein, nein, I'll meddle with her no more—she's a witch of the fiend—a real devill's kind—but that's her affair.
Donner and wetter! I neither make nor meddle—that's her work.—But for the rest—why, if I thought the trade would not suffer, I would soon rid of the younger, if you send me word when he's under embargo.

In brief and under tunes the two worthy associates concocted their revenge, and agreed at which of his haunts Hatterick should be heard of. The stay of his lugger on the coast was not difficult, as there were no king's vessels there at the time.

CHAPTER XXXV.

You are one of those that will not serve God if the devil bids you:—because we come to do you service, you think we are raising. Odalisc.

When Glosen returned home, he found, among other letters and papers sent to him, one of coventrates. "The great and invincible oath of the strolling vine."
ple importance. It was signed by Mr. Protocol, an attorney in Edinburgh, and, addressing him as the agent for Godfrey Bertram, Esq. late of Ellangowan, and Lucy, he informed him of the sudden death of Mrs. Margaret Bertram of Singleside, requesting him to inform his clients thereof, in case they should judge it proper to have any person present for their inspection. Opening the repository of the deceased, Mr. Glosin perceived at once that the letter-writer was unacquainted with the breach which had taken place between him and his late patron. The estate of the deceased lady should by rights, as he well knew, descend to Lucy Bertram, but it was one thousand to one that the caprice of the old lady might have altered its destination. After running over contingencies and probabilities in his fertile mind, to ascertain what sort of personal advantage might accrue to him from this incident, he could not perceive any mode of availing himself of it, except in so far as it might go to assist his plan of recovering, or rather creating, a character, the want of which he had already experienced, and was likely to feel yet more deeply. I must place myself, he thought, on strong ground, that, if any thing goes wrong with Davie, my host, I must have the consideration in my favour at least.—Besides, to do Glosin justice, bad as he was, he might feel some desire to compensate to Miss Bertram in a small degree, and in a case in which he did not feel at ease with her, the infinite mischief which he had occasioned to her family. He therefore resolved early the next morning to ride over to Woodbourne.

He arrived there at an hour that he took this step, having the natural reluctance to face Colonel Manning, which fraud and villany have to encounter honour and probity. But he had great confidence in his own powers. His talents were acutely acute, and by no means confined to the line of his profession. He had at different times resided a good deal in England, and his address was free both from ceremony and profession; so that he had considerable powers both of address and persuasion, joined to an unshaken effrontery, which he affected to disguise under plainness of manner. Confident, therefore, in himself, he appeared at Woodbourne, about ten in the morning, and was admitted as a gentleman come to wait upon Miss Bertram. He did not announce himself until he was at the door of the breakfast-parlour, when the servant, by his desire, said aloud,—"Mr. Glosin, to wait upon Miss Bertram." Lucy, remembering the last scene of her father's existence, turned as pale as death, and had a high flush of inward grief; Colonel Manning flew to her assistance, and they left the room together. There remained Colonel Manning, Charles Hazlewood, with his arm in a sling, and the Domine, whose gaunt visage and dark eyes assumed a most hostile aspect in recognising Glosin.

That honest gentleman, though somewhat abashed by the effect of his first introduction, advanced with confidence, and hoped he did not intrude upon the ladies. Colonel Manning, in a very upright and stately manner, observed, that he did not know to what he was to impute the honour of a visit from Mr. Glosin.

"Hem! hem! I took the liberty to wait upon Miss Bertram, Colonel Manning, on account of a matter of business."

"If it can be communicated to Mr. Mac-Morlan, her agent, sir, I believe it will be more agreeable to Mr. Bertram."

"I beg pardon, Colonel Manning," said Glosin, "making a wretched attempt at an easy demeanour; you are a man of the world—there are some cases in which it is least prudent for all parties to treat with principals."

"Then," replied Manning, with a repulsive air, "if Mr. Glosin will take the trouble to state his ob- ject, I assure you that Miss Bertram pays proper attention to him."

"Certainly," stammered Glosin; "but there are cases in which a man must be persuaded—Hem! I per- ceive that Colonel Manning has adopted some prejudices which may make my visit appear intru- sive; but I submit to his good sense, whether he ought to exclude me from a hearing without knowing the purpose of my visit, or of how much consequence it may be to the young lady whom he honours with his acquaintance."

"Certainly, sir. I have not the least intention to do so," replied the Colonel. "I will learn Miss Ber- tram's pleasure on the subject, and acquaint Mr. Glosin, if he can spare time to wait for her answer."

So saying, he left the room. But Glosin seized upon a chair, and threw himself into it with an air between embarrassment and effrontery. He felt the silence of his companion a discordant and oppressive, and resolved to interrupt it.

"A fine day, Mr. Sampson."

The Domine answered with something between an affected grunt and an indignant growl.

"You never come down to see your old acquaintance on the Ellangowan property, Mr. Sampson—You would find most of the old stagers still stationary there. I have no doubt you refuse to disturb old residents, even under pretence of improvement. Besides, it's not my way—I don't like it—I believe, Mr. Sampson, Scripture particularly condemns those who oppress the poor, and remove landmarks."

"Or who devour the substance of orphans," sub- joined the Domine. "Anathema, Maranatha!"

"So saying, he regarded the poor man, who he had been pursuing, faced to the right about, and marched out of the room with the strides of a grenadier."

Mr. Glosin, no way disconcerted, or at least feel- ing it necessary, turned to young Hazlewood, who was apparently busy with the newspaper. "Any news, sir?" Hazlewood raised his eyes, looked at him, and pushed the paper towards him. He then left the room, as Glosin observed, and was about to leave the room. "I beg pardon, Mr. Hazlewood—but I can't help wishing you joy of getting so easily over that infernal accident." This was answered by a sort of inclination of the head as slight and stiff as could well be imagined. Yet it encouraged our man of law to proceed. "I can promise you, Mr. Hazlewood, few people have taken the interest in that matter which I have done. Both for the sake of the country, and on account of my particular respect for your family, which has so high a stake in it; indeed, so high a stake to-day, that, as Mr. Featherhead is in its way, there's a good chance that Mr. Hazlewood and I shall be in the Chiltern Hundred, it might be worth your while to look about you. I speak as a friend, Mr. Hazlewood, and as one who understands the roll; and if in going over it to- gether—"

"I beg pardon, sir, but I have no views in which your assistance could be useful."

"O very well—perhaps you are right—it's quite time enough, any way I love to see young gentlemen cautious. But I was talking of your wound—I think I have got a cleft to that business—I think I have—and if I don't bring the fellow to condivid punishment—"

"I beg your pardon, sir, once more; but your zeal outruns my wishes. I have every reason to think the wound was accidental—certainly it was not premeditated. At the same time, my heart and my respon- sibility, should you find any one guilty of them, my re- sentment will be as warm as your own. This was Hazlewood's answer.

Another reply; but thought Glosin; I must try him upon the other tack. "Right, sir; very nobly said! I would have no more mercy on an ungrateful man than I would on a woodcock—and now we talk of hard times, (the country is full of hard times,) I think that which Glosin had learned from his former patron.) I see you often carry a gun, and I hope you will be soon able to take the field again. I observe you are confirmed in your confidence in yourself. You confess yourself converts of the Hazlewood turn. I hope, my dear sir, you will make no scruple of following your game to the Elly.
gowan bank: I believe it is rather the best exposure of the two, though both are equally capital. As this offer only excited a cold and constrained bow, Glossin was obliged to remain silent, and was presently afterwards somewhat relieved by the entrance of Sir.

"I have detained you some time, I fear, sir," said he, addressing Glossin; "I wished to prevail upon Miss Bertram to see you, as, in my opinion, her objections ought to give way to the necessity of hearing in her own person what is stated to be of importance that she should know. But I find that circumstances of recent occurrence, and not easily to be forgotten, seem to render it necessary to have a personal interview with Mr. Glossin, that it would be cruel to insist upon it: and she has deputed me to receive his commands, or proposal, or, in short, whatever he may wish to communicate to her.

"Hem, hem! I am sorry, sir—I am very sorry, Colonel Manning, that Miss Bertram should suppose—that any prejudice, in short—or idea that any thing on my part, &c.

"Sir," said the inflexible Colonel, "where no accusation is made, excuses or explanations are unnecessary. Have you any objection to communicate to me—now, that you have found my heart so accessible, the circumstances which you conceive to interest her?"

"None, Colonel Manning; she could not choose a more respectable friend, or one with whom I, in people of higher stations, might more anxiously wish to communicate to us.

"Have the goodness to speak to the point, sir, if you please.

"Sir, it is not so easy all at once—but Mr. Hadlow must not leave the room,—I mean so well to Miss Bertram, that I could wish the whole world to hear my part of the conference.

"Well, sir, and Mr. Charles Hadlow will not probably be anxious, Mr. Glossin, to listen to what cannot concern him—and now, when he has left us alone, let me pray you to be short and explicit in what you have to say. I am soldier, not romantic, and not accustomed to forms and introductions." So saying, he drew himself up in his chair, and waited for Mr. Glossin's communication.

"Be pleased to look at that letter," said Glossin, putting Protocol's epistle into Manning's hand, as the shortest way of stating his business.

The Colonel read it, and returned it, after pencilling the back, to the writer in his memorandum-book. "This, sir, does not seem to require much discussion—I will see that Miss Bertram's interest is attended to.

"Yes, sir, but, Colonel Manning," added Glossin, "there is another matter which no one can explain but myself. This lady—this Mrs. Margaret Bertram, to my certain knowledge, made a general settlement of her affairs in Miss Lucy Bertram's favor while she lived with my old friend, Mr. Bertram, at Ellangowan. The Dominie—that was the name by which my deceased friend always called that very respectable man Mr. Sampson—he and I witnessed the deed. And she had full power at that time to make such a settlement, for she was in fee of the estate of Singlesside even then, although it was let possessed by an elder sister. It was a numerical settlement of old Singlesside's; a small estate of two or three miles, with two courts, and ten or twelve acres of land, all divided and allocated.

"Well, sir," said Manning, without the slightest smile of sympathy, "but to the purpose. You say that this power to settle her estate on Miss Bertram, and that she did so?"

"Even so, Colonel," replied Glossin, "I think I should understand the law—I have followed it for many years, and though I have given it up to retire upon a handsome competence, I did not throw away that knowledge which is pronounced better than house and land, and which I take to be the knowledge of every lawyer. Your common rhyme has it, 'Tis most excellent, To win the land that's gone and spent."

"No, no, I flinch at the smack of the whip—I have a little, a very little, only a very little, to say to Miss Bertram.

"Glossin ran on in this manner thinking he had made a favourable impression on Manning. The Colonel insisted on referring him to Miss Bertram's interest, and resolved that his strong inclination to throw Glossin out at window, or at door, should not interfere with the personal interview. He put his hand on his desk, and sat down, and proposed to listen with patience at least, if without complacency. He therefore let Mr. Glossin get to the end of his self-congratulations, and then asked him if he knew where the deed was.

"I know—that is, I think—I believe I can recover it. In such cases custodiers have sometimes made a charge.

"We won't differ as to that, sir," said the Colonel, taking out his pocket-book.

"But, my dear sir, you take me so very short—I said some persons might make such a claim—I mean for payment of the expenses of the deed, treatable in the affair, &c. But I, for my own part, only wish Miss Bertram and her friends to be satisfied that I am acting towards her with honour. There's the paper, sir. It would have been a satisfaction to me to have delivered it into Miss Bertram's own hands, and to have wished her joy of the prospects which it opens. But since her prejudice on the subject is invincible, there is no use in expressing best wishes to you, Colonel Manning, and to express that I shall willingly give my testimony in support of that deed when I shall be called upon. I have the honor to wish you success.

This parting speech was so well got up, and had so much the tone of conscious integrity unjustly suspected, that even Colonel Manning was staggered in his heart. He followed him to the door, and resolving to take another step, and took leave of him with more politeness (though still cold and formal) than he had paid during his visit. Glossin left the house half pleased with the interview which he had made, half mortified by the stern caution and proud reluctance with which he had been received. "Colonel Manning might have had more politeness," he said to himself—"it is not every man that can bring a good chance of 400l. a year to a young man thirty-six years of age. 400l. a year—now—there's Reiliggegan, Gilliwick, Loverless, Liceilone, and the Spurner's Knowe—good 400l. a year. Some people might have made their own of it in my place—and yet, to own the truth, after much consideration, I don't see how that is possible.

Glossin was no sooner mounted and gone, than the Colonel dispatched a groom for Mr. Mac-Morlan, and, putting the deed into his hand, requested to know if it was likely to be available to his friend. Lucy Bertram, Mac-Morlan perused it with eyes that sparkled with curiosity, and snapped his hand at length, and at length exclaimed. "Available!—it's as tight as a glove—nobody can make better war than Glossin, when he didn't let down a stock on purpose.

—but this countenance falling, the said Mr. Mac-Morlan, that I should say so, might alight at pleasure!" "Ah! And how shall we know whether she has done so?"

"Somebody must attend on Miss Bertram's part, when the repositories of the deceased are opened."

"Can you go?" said the Colonel.

"I fear I cannot," replied Mac-Morlan, "I must attend a trial to-morrow.

"Then I will go myself," said the Colonel, "I'll set out to-morrow. Sampson shall go with me—he is witness to this settlement. But I shall want a legal advice before we reach her, which I will instantly draw out. Besides, I will be cautious for her prudence, and that she will consider it only in the light of a chance."
ed exulting hopes upon the prospect thus unexpectedly opening before her. She did indeed, in the course of time, get to know the old-fashioned, as if by accident, what might be the annual income of the Haslewood property; but shall we therefore aver for certain that she was considering whether an heiress of four or five hundred a year might be a suitable match for the young Laird?

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Living near a cup of such to make mine eyes look red—For I must speak in passion, and I will do it in King Charles's vein.

Henry IV. Part I.

MANNERING, with Sampson for his companion, lost not time in his journey to Edinburgh. They travelled in the Colonel's post-chariot, who, knowing his companion's habits of abstraction, did not choose to lose him out of his own sight, nor trust to him on horsecarriage, where, in all probability, a knavish stable-boy might with little advantage have contrived to mount him with his face to the tail. Accordingly, with the aid of his valet, who attended on horsecarriage, he took him in the coach of the Mr. Sampson safe to an inn in Edinburgh—for hotels in those days there were none—without any other accident than arose from his straying twice upon the road. On one occasion he was firstนก his head by ordinary horses, and wound up the hill in the manner of a children's game, this with a laugh. On another, he was made to stand by and hear the discussion of a great orator, and南海 the meaning of the word Molobatthar in that lyric effusion. His second escapade was made for the purpose of visiting the field of Killon—green, which was dear to the heart of the old vagabond. Having, on both occasions forgotten his friend, patron, and fellow-traveller, as completely, as if he had been in the East Indies. On being reminded that Colonel Mannering was waiting for him, he entered his usual ejaculations of "Prodigious!—I was oblivious," and then strode back to his post. Barnes was surprised at his master's patience on both occasions, knowing by experience how little he booked neglect or delay; but the Domine was in every respect a privilege in his patron and friend, he was never for a moment in each other's way, and it seemed obvious that they were formed to be companions for life. If Mannering wanted a particular book, the Domine found it, and brought it to him; if he wished to have accounts summed up, or checked, his assistance was equally ready; if he desired to recall a particular passage in the classics, he could have the Domine at command, and he could read from the front of the Luckenbooths to the head of the Canongate, and corresponding in breadth and length to the uncommon height of the buildings on either side.

Mannering had not much time to look and admire. His conductor hurried him across this striking scene, and suddenly dived with him into a very steep paved lane. Turning to the right, they entered a scale stair-case, as it is called, the state of which, so far as he could judge by one of his senses, annoyed Mannering's delicacy not a little. When they had ascended cautiously to a considerable height, they heard a heavy padlock and two stone steps above them. The door opened, and immediately ensued the sharp and warning bark of a dog, the squalling of a woman, the screams of an assequit cat, and the hoarse voices of a number of individuals, with vociferous tone, "Will ye, Mustard? Will ye down, sir, down!"

"Lord preserve us!" said the female voice, "an he had worried my cat, Mr. Pleydell would never have forgiv'n me."

"Aweel, my doo, the cat's no a prin the war—So he's no in, ye say?"

"Na, Mr. Pleydell's ne'er in the house on Saturday at e'en," answered the female voice.

And the morn's Sabbath too," said the querist; "I dinna ken what will be done."

By this time Mannering appeared, and found a tall strong countryman, clad in a coat of pepper-and-salt-coloured mixture, with huge metal buttons, a glazed hat and boots, and a large horse-whip beneath his arm, in collar and coat, a life-sized, well-set piece, in one hand the lock of the door, and in the other a pail of whiting, or comestane, as it is called, mixed with water—a circumstance which indicates Saturday night in Edinburgh.

"So Mr. Pleydell is not at home, my good girl?" said Mannering.

"Ay, sir, he's at home, but he's no in the house: he's aye out on Saturday at e'en."

"But, my good girl, I am a stranger, and my business express—Will you tell me where I can find him?"

"His honour," said the chairwoman, "will be at Clerigh's about this time—Hersell could ha' telt ye that, but she thought ye wanted to see his house."

"Well, then, show me to this tavern—" he will see me, as I come on business of some conse-quencing.

"Damn, sir," said the girl, "he didn't like to be disturbed on Saturdays' wi' business—but he's aye civil to strangers.

"I'll grug to the tavern too," said our friend Din-mont, "I am a stranger also, and on business e'ven sic like.

"Na," said the hand-maiden, "'an he see the gentleman, he'll see the simple body too—but, Lord's aye wise, aye wise, aye wise, aye wise, aye wise.

"Atween, I am a simple body, that's true, hinny, but I am no come to steal any 'o' his skeel for nau-thing," said the farmer in his honest pride, and strutted up and down in his plaid, fully 18 to the manner and the cadilio. Manning could not help admiring the determined stride with which the stranger who preceded them divided the prose, shouldering from him, but one, the old fellow, and turned and told the drunk and sober passengers. "He'll be a Tievotladle tue tae ane," said the chairmaun, "tat's for keeping a crown o' a causeway tae gate—he'll no gang far enough for to get some, to bell to cat wi' his own.

His shrewd augury, however, was not fulfilled.

Those who recoiled from the colossal weight of Din-mont, on looking up at his size and strength, apparently judged his heady metal to be rashly and concountered, as he had suffered him to make his course unchallenged. Following in the wake of this first-rate, Manning proceeded till the farmer made a pause, ami, looking back to the chairman, said, "I'm th' bawbee, will you play?"

"Ay, ay," replied Donald, "tat's tae close.

Dinmont descended confidently, then turned into a dark alley—then up a dark stair—and then into an open door, as if he was whistling for the waiter, as if he had been one of his collie dogs, Mannering looked round him, and could hardly conceive how a gentleman of a liberal profession, and good sense, should choose such a sultry and secluded abode.

Besides the miserable entrance, the house-
"itself seemed paltry and humble. The passage in which they stood had a window to the close, which admitted a weak light and the rain. Not in the habit of Holyrood, he held the woman and the strangers to be what we heralds, our pursuivants, our Lyon, our Marchmont, our Carrick, and our Snowdown? Let the strangers be placed at our board, and regarded as a proof of these acts and these the high holiday-morn we will hear their tidings.

"So please you, my liege, to-morrow's Sunday," said one of the company.

"Sunday, is it? then we will give no offence to the assembly of the kirk—on Monday shall be their audience.

Manning, who had stood at first uncertain whether the weather was so he was now resolved to stay for the moment into the whin of the scene, though internally fretting at Mac Moriain, for sending him to consult with a crack-brained humourist. He there craved permission to lay his credentials at the feet of the Scottish monarch, in order to be perused at his best leisure. The gravity with which he accommodated himself to the humour of these acts and these the high holiday-morn we will hear their tidings.

"You are, I presume to guess," said the monarch

A large and smiling gentlewoman, Manning who drank it to the health of the reigning prince

"You are, I presume to guess," said the monarch

"You are, I presume to guess," said the monarch ten that the moist and humid air of our valley of Liddedel inclines to stronger potation. —Senechal, let our faithful yeoman have a cup of brandy; it will be more good for him than for you.

“And now,” said Mannering, “since we have unwarily intruded upon your majesty at a moment of mirthful retirement, be pleased to say when you will return, which will be better with us to be a little headed, cutting off some of those affinities of weight which have brought him to your northern capital.

The monarch opened Mac-Morlan’s letter, and read it with the same interest. His voice was included, with his natural voice and manner, “Lucy Bertram of Ellangowan, poor dear Nissie!”

“A forfeit! a forfeit!” exclaimed a dozen voices;
his majesty has forgot his kingly scepter.

“Now, what is a forfeit? I’ll ring the bell; I’ll be judged by this courteous knight. May not a monarch love a maid of low degree? Is not King Conett and the Beggar-maid, an adjudged case in point?”

“Professional! professional! —another forfeit,” exclaimed the umlautoly.

“Had not our royal predecessors,” continued the monarch, “exacted a sovereign voice to drown these disaffected clamours,—”Had they not their Jean Loege, their Besane Carmichaels, their Oliphants, their Sandilands, and their Weirs, and shall it be denied to my son to have a voice to proclaim my regal honour? Nay, then, sink state and perish sovereign-ity for, like a second Charles V., we will abdicate, and seek in the private shades of life those peace-some hours that the court is never able to bestow.

So saying, he flung away his crown, and sprung from his exalted station with more agility than could have been expected from his age, ordered lights and a wash-hand basin and towel with a cup of green tea, into another room, and made a sign to Mannerning to accompany him. In less than two minutes he washed his face and hands, settled his wig in the gen’l manner, and in the meantime looked at a different man from the childish Bacchanalian he had seen a moment before.

“T’other folks,” he said. “Mr. Mannering, before whom one should take care how they play the fool—because they have either too much malice, or too little wit, as the poet says. The best compliment
I can pay Colonel Mannering, is to show I am not assumed to expose myself before him—and truly I think you have a right to take notice of your good-nature. —But what’s that great strong woman wanting?”

Dinmont, who had pushed after Mannering into the room, was seated with a scrape of his foot and a scratch of his head in unison. “I am Dandie Din-mont, sir, of the Charities-hope—the Liddesdale lad—well mind me!—it was for me ye won your grand pla.

“I tell you,” said the lawyer, “I’ve a right to think I can remember all the fools that come to plague me!”

“Sir, land, it was the grand plea about the grazing
’at the Langstrack,” said the farmer.

“Well, curse thee, never mind; give me the memoir, and come to me on Monday at ten,” replied the learned counsel.

“Ob, sir, I haff got any distinct memoir?”

“No memorial, man?” said Pleydell.

“Na, sir, nae memorial,” answered Dandie; “for your honour said before, Mr. Pleydell, ye’ll mind, that ye haff a right to war us hill-folk tell our ain tale by word o’ mouth.”

“Belew thy tongue, that said so!” answered the counselor, “it will cost me ears a dinning. —Well, say in two words what you’ve got to say—ye see to the gentleman?”

“Ou, sir, if the gentleman likes he may play his ain spring first; it’s a nane to Dandie.”

“Aw, sir, just you be honest, and I’ll see ye see to your business,” said Dandie, not a wit disconcerted.

* The Scottish memorial corresponds to the English brief.

by the roughness of this reception. “We’re at the auld wark o’ the marches again, Jock o’ Dawston Clough and me. Ye see we march on the top o’ You-shop-rigge, aye we cross the Pomorogans, and Slackeneepool, and Bloodalyews, they come in there, and they belong to the Peel; but after ye pass Pomorogans at a skulking great sauce-er, we’re on the top o’ the Liddesdale, and when there, Dawston Clough and Charities-hope they march.
Now, I say, the march runs on the top o’ the hill where the wind and water sheets; but Jock o’ Daw-ston, he don’t mind it. Jock is a knight—no, I am saying, that it hands down by the auld drove-road that runs awa by the Knot o’ the Gate ower to Keldar-ward—and that makes an unco difference.”

“And what difference does it make, friend?” said
Pleydell. “Have ye a dram, will ye?”

“Ou, no mony,” said Dandie, scrathing his head, —“it’s lying high and exposed—it may feed a hog, or aibline twa in a good year.”

“And for this grazing, which may be worth about five shillings a-year, you are willing to throw away a hundred pound or two?”

“Na, sir, it’s no for the value of the grass,” replied
Dinmont; “that’s worth a feece.”

“My good friend,” said Pleydell, “justice, like charity, should begin at home. Do you justice to your wife and family, and think no more about the matter.”

“Dinmont and I are both Kirkmen,” said Jock. “It’s no for that, sir—but I would like ill to be bragged wi’ him—he threeps he’ll bring a score o’ witnesses and mair—and I’m sure there’s as mony will swear for my friend, folk that lived a’ their days upon the Charities-hope, and wadna like to see the land lose its right.”

“Zounds, man, if it it be a point of honour,” said the lawyer, “why don’t ye take good cudgels and settle it?”

“Ano, sir, if ye think it wadna be again the law, it’s a nane to Dandie.”

“Hold! hold!” exclaimed Pleydell, “we shall have another Lord Soulive’s mistake—Pray, man, comprehend me! I warn you to consider how very, very trifling and foolish a lawsuit you wish to engage in.”

“Ay, sir!” said Dandie, in a disappointed tone.

“So ye winna take on wi’ me, I’m doubting?”

“Mef! mef!—go home, go home, take a pint and agree.” Dandie looked but half contented, and still remained stationary. “Any thing more, my friend?”

“Only, sir, about the succession of this laddie that’s death, said Miss Margaret Bertram o’ Singledean.

“Ay, what about her?” said the counselor, rather surprised.

“Ou, we hae nae connexion at a’ wi’ the Ber-trams,” said Dandie, “they were grand folk by the like o’ us—But Jean Lilup, that was o’ Single-dean’s housekeeper, and the mother of these twa young ladies that are gone—the last o’ them’s dead at a ripe age, I vow—Jean Lilup came out o’ Lidded water, and she was as near our connexion as second cousin to my mother’s half-sister—She drew up wi’ Singledean, nee doubt, when she was his hou-keeper, and it was for her sake and her lines. But he acknowledged a marriage, and satisfied the kirk—and now I wad ken free us if we haff not some claim by law?”

“Not the least of a claim,” said Dandie.

“Aw, we’re nae purry,” said Dandie—but ane may ha’ thought on us if she was minded to make a testament.—Well, sir, I’ve said my say—I see ‘en wish you good night, and”—putting his hand in his pocket.

“No, no, my friend; I never take fees on Saturday nights, or without a memorial—away with you, Dan- dike! And Dandie made his reverence, and departed accordingly.

"Your majesty," said Manning, laughing, “has solemnized your abdication by an act of mercy and charity.—That fellow will scarcely think of going to law."

"O, you are quite wrong," said the experienced lawyer. "The only difference is, I have lost my client and my fee. He’ll never rest till he finds somebody to encourage him to commit the folly he has permitted, and of which he is not indifferent himself.

"And sometimes through the week, I should think," said the artist, "he might have his nose in the same tone."

"Why yes; as far as my vocation will permit. I am, as Hamlet says, indifferent honest, when my clients and their solicitors do not make me the medium of converting their double-distilled lies to our bank. But oprior vite! it is a sad thing. And you to our business. I am glad my old friend Mac- Morlan has sent to me; he is an active, honest, and intelligent man, long resident in the western parish of the county of—under me, and still holds the office. He knows I have a regard for that unfortunate family of Ellangowan, and for poor Lucy. I have not seen her since our last interview, and she was then a sweet pretty girl under the management of a very silly father. But my interest in her is of an early date. I was called upon, Mr. Manning, being then sheriffs-depute of that county, to investigate the particulars of a murder which had been committed near Ellangowan the day on which that poor child was born; and which, by a strange combination that I was unhap-santly not able to trace, involved the death or abstrac-tion of her only brother, a boy of about five years old. No, Colonel, I shall never forget the misery of the house of Ellangowan that morning—the father half-dressed and dead in the doorway, the helpless infant, with scarce any one to attend it, coming wailing and crying into the miserable world at such a moment of unutterable misery. We lawyers and legislators are all of us, that ye, the soldiers are of steel. We are conversant with the crimes and distresses of civil society, as you are with those that occur in a state of war, and to do our duty in either case a little apathy is perhaps necessary—

But the devil take a soldier whose heart can be as hard as his sword, and his dam catch the lawyer who braves his bosom instead of his forehead!—But come, I am losing my Saturday at e'en—will you have the kind—can’t I trust you with the papers which relate to Miss Bertram’s business?—and stay—tomorrow you’ll take a bachelor’s dinner with an old lawyer,—I insist upon it, at three precisely—and so you are not likely to have less than three hours to-morrow—extravagance.—Good night—Harry, go home with Mr. Manning to his lodging.—Colonel I expect you at a half past two to-morrow.”

The Colonel returned to his inn, equally surprised at the childish frolics in which he had found his meal consumed, and then engaged, at the point of his sense which he had in a moment summoned up to meet the exigencies of his profession, and at the too of feeling which he displayed when he spoke of the friendless.

In the morning, while the Colonel and his most quiet and silent of all retainers, Dominie Sampson were finishing the breakfast which Barnes had mad and poured, the Dominie offered the Colonel to seize him in the attempt. Mr. Pleydell was suddenly ushered in. A nicely dressed bob-wig, upon every hair o which a zealous and careful barber had bestowed it proper array of livery, powdered, powdered, and a mas blad suit, with very clean shoes and gold buckles and stock-buckle; a manner rather reserved and forms than intrusive, but, withal, showing only the formal ity of manner, by no means that of awkwardness; countenance, the expressive and somewhat com features of which were in complete resume,—all show ed a being perfectly different from the choicer spirit o the evening before. A glance of shrewd and piercing fire in his eyes, and an only marked expression which recalled the name of "Saturday at e’en."

"I am come," said he, with a very polite address "to use my regal authority in your behalf in spiritual as well as temporal matters—can I assure you, Provostly or Episcopal meeting-house.—

"Trost Tyrius, a lawyer, you know, is of both re ergious, or rather I should say of both forms—or can I assist in passing the former through a period of your old-fashioned importance—I was born a time when a Scotchman was thought inhospitable if he left a guest alone a moment, except when they are silent—but I must add that I have my stories.

"Not at all, my dear sir," answered Colonel Man nering,—"I am delighted to put myself under your pilature. I should wish to hear some of your Scottish wits, and thus gain an honour to your country—your Blair, your Robertson or your Henry; and I embrace your kind offer with all my heart.—Only drawing the lawyer a little aside, and turning his eye towards Sampson, "my worthy friend there in the reverie is a little helpless and abstracted, and my servant, Barnes, who is his pilot in ordinary, cannot well assist him here, espe cially as he has expressed his determination of going to some of your darker and more remote places o worship."

"The lawyer’s eye glanced at Dominie Sampson. "A curious book! I have never traveled in the west of Scotland. fit custodian.—Here you, sir, (to the waiter), go a Luckie Finlayson’s in the Cowgate for Mike Mach the candle, he’ll be there this time, and tell him I wish to see him on a matter of importance."

"The person wanted soon arrived. "I will comm you my friend to this man’s charge," said Pleydell;—he’ he’ll attend him, or conduct him wherever he chooses to, with a happy indifference as to kirk or market meeting or court of justice, or—any other place whatever—and bring him safe home at whatever hour you appoint; so that Mr. Barnes there may be left to the freedom of his own will.

"This was easily arranged, and the Colonel com mitted the Dominie to the charge of this man while they should remain in Edinburgh.

"And now, sir, if you please, we shall go to the Greyfriars church—the memorial of the Caroline of the Continent, and of America."

"They were disappointed—he did not speak that morning.—Never mind," said the counsellor, "have a moment’s patience, and we shall do very well.

"The colleague of Dr. Robertson ascended the pulpit. "His external appearance was not prepossessing. A remarkably fair complexion, strangely contrasted with a black beard without a hair of hair, short hair, thin row chest and a stooping posture; hands, which placed like props on either side of the pulpit, seemed necessary rather to support the person than to assist the gestures of the speaker, who was of a size larger that of Genoa, a tumbled band, and a gesture which seemed scarce voluntary, were the first circumstances which struck a stranger. The preacher seems a very kindly person," whispered Manning to his new friend.

"This was the celebrated Dr. Ertkine, a distinguished clergy man, and a most excellent man."

"Never fear, he's the son of an excellent Scottish lawyer—he'll show blood, I'll warrant him." The lecture was delivered, fraught with new, striking, and enterprising views of Scripture history—a sermon, in which the Calvinism of the Kirk of Scotland was traced to its source and made the basis of a sound system of practical morals, which should neither shelter the inner under the cloak of speculative faith or of peculiarly of opinion, nor leave him loose to the waves of wretched fanaticism. Something there was of an antiquated turn of phrase and metaphor, but it only served to give zest and peculiarities to the style of declamation. The sermon was not read—a scrap of paper containing the heads of the discourse was occasionally referred to, and the enunciation, which at first seemed imperfect and embarrassing, became, by the preacher warmed in his progress, animated and distinct; and although the discourse could not enter into the finer and more eloquent details, yet Manning had seldom heard so much learning, metaphysical acuteness, and energy of argument, brought into the service of Christianity. Manning found that the church, "must have been the preachers to whose unerring minds, and acute, though sometimes rudely exercised talents, we owe the Reformation."

"And you, Mr. Plydell, what do you think of their points of difference?"

"Why, I hope, Colonel, a plain man may go to heaven without thinking about them at all—besides, I am a member of the suffering and Episcopal Church of Scotland—the shadow of a shade now, and fortunately so—but I love to pray where my fathers prayed before me, without thinking worse of the Presbyterian forms, because they do not affect the same thing. And with this remark they parted until dinner-time.

From the awkward access to the lawyer's mansion, Manning was induced to form very moderate expectations of the entertainments he was to receive. The house, however, was pleasantly dim by daylight than on the preceding evening. The houses on each side of the lane were so close, that the neighbors might have shaken hands with each other from the difference sides, and occasionally the space between was traversed by wooden galleries, and thus entirely closed up. The star, the scale-star, was not well illuminated; and on entering the house, Manning was struck with the dimness and smallness of the wainscotted passage. But the library into which he was shown by an elderly respectable-looking servant, was a complete contrast to these unproductive rooms, and a perfect eminence of the finest Scotch library, hung with a portrait or two of Scotch characters of eminence, by Jamieson, the Caledonian Yanke, and surrounded with books, the best editions of the best authors, and in particular an admirable collection of classics.

"These," said Plydell, "are my tools of trade. A lawyer without history or literature is a mechanic, a mere laborer. If you know anything of these, you may venture to call himself an architect."

But Manning was chiefly delighted with the view from the windows, which commanded that incomparable prospect of the ground between Edinburgh and the sea; the Firth of Forth, with its islands; the embankment which is terminated by the Law of the North Berwick, the Trinity Church, and the northward, indenting with a hilly outline the clear blue horizon.

When Dr. Plydell had sufficiently enjoyed the surprise of his guest, he called his attention to Miss Bertram's affairs. "I was in hopes," he said, "though I don't think, to have discovered some means of ascertaining her indefensible right to this property of Singlestone; but all researches have been in vain. The old lady was certainly absolute far, and might dispose of it in full right of property. All that we have to hope is, that the devil may not have tempted her to alter this will of her son's settlement. You must attend the old lady's funeral to-morrow, to which you will receive an invitation, for I have acquainted her agent with your being here on Miss Bertram's part; and I will meet you afterwards at the house she inhabited, and be present to see fair play at the opening of the settlement. The old cat had a little girl, the orphan of some relation, who lived with her as a kind of slave and received no eloquent or eloquent from conscience to make her independent, in consideration of the pains forte et dure to which she subjected her during her life-time."

Three green-coats now appeared, and were introduced to the stranger. They were men of good sense, gayety, and general information, so that the day passed very pleasantly over; and Colonel Manning assisted, about an hour, in drinking the landlord's bottle, which was, of course, a magnum. Upon his return to the inn, he found a card inviting him to the funeral of Mrs. Margaret Bertram, late of Cafeald, and now a widow, to the house to the place of interment in the Greyfriars churchyard, at one o'clock afternoon.

At the appointed hour, Manning went to a small house in the Best Street, where he found a card inviting him to the funeral of Mrs. Margaret Bertram, late of Cafeald, and now a widow, to the house to the place of interment in the Greyfriars churchyard, at one o'clock afternoon. The house was, in such a way, where he found the place of mourning, indicated, as usual in Scotland, by two useful figures with long black coats, white crapes and hat-bands, holding in their hands poles, adorned with melancholy streamers of the same description. By two other mutes, who from their visages, seemed suffering under the pressure of some strange calamity, he was ushered into the dining-parlour of the defunct, where the company were assembled for the funeral. In Scotland, the custom, now diminished in England, of inviting the relations of the deceased to the interment, is universal. Although this has a singular and striking effect, but it degenerates into mere empty form and grimace, in cases where the defunct has had the misfortune to live belied and die unlauded. In England, the most beautiful and impressive parts of the ritual of the church, would have, in such cases, the effect of fixing the attention, and uniting the thoughts and feelings of the audience present, in an exercise of devotion so peculiarly adapted to such an occasion. But according to the Scottish custom, if there be not real feeling among the assistants, there is nothing to supply the deficiency, and exalt or rouse the attention; so that a sense of tedious form, and almost hypocritical restraint, is soo apt to pervade the company assembled for the mournful solemnity. Mrs. Margaret Bertram was so luckily one of those whose acquaintance attached no general friendship. She had no near relations who might have mourned from natural affection, and therefore her funeral exhibited merely the exterior trappings of sorrow. Manning, therefore, stood among this luscious company of cousins in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth degree, composing his countenance to the deceased solemness, in a sort of half-way between being much concerned on Mrs. Margaret Bertram's account, as if the deceased lady of Singlestone had been his own sister or mother. After a deep and awful pause, the company began to feel the weight of their breaths, however, and as if in the chamber of a dying person.

"Our poor friend," said one grave gentleman, "10!"
scarely opening his mouth, for fear of deranging the necessary solemnity of his features, and slitting its whiteness between his teeth. But this was unobserved as possible.—"Our poor friend has died well to pass in the world."

"Nae doubt," answered the person addressed, with haste and sorrow. "Poor Mrs. Margaret was so careful of the gear."

"Any news to-day, Colonel Manning," said one of the gentlemen whom he had dined with the day before, but in one which, might, for its impressiveness, have communicated the death of his whole generation.

"Nothing particular, I believe, sir," said Manning, with some sarcasm. The reading of the observer, the observed, apprised the house of mourning.

"I understand," continued the first speaker, emphatically, and with the air of one who is well informed—"I understand there is a settlement."

"And what does little Jenny Gibbon get?"

"A hundred, and the auld repeater."

"That's but some gear, pair things; she had a pair time of it with the auld laddie. But it's ill waiting for dead folk's shoon."

"I am afraid," said the politician, who was close by Manning, "we have not done with your old friends this year yet—I doubt not the Company more plague; and I am told, but you'll know for certain, that East India Stock is not rising."

"I trust it will, sir, soon."

In the crowd, another person, mingling in the conversation, had some India bonds. I know why, for I drew the interest for her—it would be desirable now for the trustees and creditors to have the Company, and the time about the same as the time of converting them into money. For my part I think—but there's Mr. Mortoloe to tell us they are gaining to lift.

Mr. Mortoloe the undertaker did accordingly, with a flourish of the funeral band, and a most pious solemnity, distribute among the pall-bearers little cards, assigning their respective situations in attendance upon the coffin. As this ceremony is supposed to be regulated by propriety to the deunct, the undertaker, however skilful a master of these lugubrious ceremonies, did not escape giving some offence. To be related to Mrs. Bertram was to be of kin to the lands of Singleside, and was a prophecy of which each present present at that moment was particularly jealous. Some murmurs there were on the occasion, and our friend Dimmont gave more open offence. For his personal account, it is not to utter it in the key properly modulated to the solemnity. "I think we might have at least given me a leg of her to carry," he exclaimed, in a voice considered for her earthly position, "heavenly God! she was as good as the singing of a song, and I know she would have had her to carry myself, for as many gentlemen as are here."

A score of frowning and repining brows were bent upon the magnificent yeoman. His great coat and his cap, which, in his dudgeon, he thrust upon his head, to the displeasure, stalked sturdily down stairs with the rest of the company, totally disregarding the censure of those whom his remarks had scandalized.

And then the funeral pump set forth; saucily with their batons, and gompions of tarnished white crepe, in honour of the well-preserved maiden fame of Mrs. Margaret Bertram. Six starved horses, themselves the very emblems of mortality, well clothed and shod, moved along the hearse with its dismal embellishment, crept in slow state towards the place of interment, preceded by Jamie Duff, an idiot, who, with weeping eyes and a groan made of white paper, attended on every funeral, and followed by six mourning coaches, filled with the company. Many of these now gave more free loose to their tongues, and discoursed very much about the amount of money, the succession, and the probability of its destination.

The principal expectors, however, kept a prudent silence, indeed ashamed to express hopes which might prove false. The moment, and the recent death, of a man who alone knew exactly how large a sum were stood, maintained a countenance of mysterious importance, if determined to preserve the full interest of anxiety and awe.

"At length they arrived at the churchyard gate, and from thence, amid the gaping of two or three of male and female with infants in their arms, and ever followed by the twofold things, the hearse and the coach, and screaming alongside of the side processions, finally arrived at the burial place of the deceased. This was a square enclosure in the frigate churchyard, guarded on one side by a strong wall, without a moss, and having only one entrance, the door of which was shut during the service. Captain Andrew Bertram, first of Sinsinna, ascended the very ancient and honourable box; Eliza Elgovan, had caused this monument to be erected for himself and his descendants. A number of sepulchres and hour-glasses, and a few heads, and cross bones, garnished the following with sepulchral poetry, to the memory of the founders of the mausoleum.

Nathaniel's heart, Beazley's head,
If ever any loved,
Their bodies in thy bosom held,
Who both in this bed.

Here then, amid the deep black fat loam upon her ancestors were now resolved, they deemed a body of Mrs. Margaret Bertram; and, like sage returning from a military funeral, another person, mingling in the conversation, might be interested in the settlement. The lady, urged the dog-cattle of the hackney coach to the speed of which they were capable, and the time was put an end to further suspense on this important topic.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Die and endow a college or a cat.

Tynan is a tale told by Lucian, that while a troop of monkeys, well drilled in the art of war, were performing a tragedy with great aplomb, decorum of the whole scene was at once destroyed and the natural passions of the actors called into very indelicate and active emulation, by a who threw a handful of nutshells upon the stage. In manner, the approaching crisis stirred up many expectors, feelings of a nature very different, those, of mortoloe, they had but now been endeavoured to imitate the expression. Those eyes which were devotedly cast up to heaven, or with greater bent solemnly upon God, suddenly opened, and silverly darting their glances through shutters and windows, turkeys, and drawers, and cabinets, and all the corners of the old maiden lady's repositories.

The whole was their search without interest, though they did not find the will of which they were in quest.

Here was a promissory note for 20l. by the name of the non-juring chapel, interest marked as per Martinus last, carefully folded up in a new words to the old tune of "Over the Water to Charlestown there was a curious love correspondence for the deceased and a certain Lieutenant O'Keeffe, marching regiment of foot, and a letter was a document, which at once explained relatives why a connexion that booted them little had been suddenly broken off, being the Lucan bond for two hundred pounds, upon which so little whatever appeared to have been paid. One and bonds to a larger amount, and signed by names (I mean commercially) than these worthy dinners and also occurring the course of their researches, besides a box of men in uniform, and seen broken gold and silver, old ear-rings, hair crinkled of age and letters, c.

Still no made it appearance, and Lord Manning began full well to hope the settlement which he had obtained from Denny gained the anticipated arrangement of the old lady. But his friend Pether, who had gone..."
the room, cautioned him against entertaining this belief. "I am well acquainted with the gentleman," he said, "who is conducting the search, and I guess from his manner that he knows something more of the house and the people in it, and, while the search proceeds, let us take a brief glance at one or two of the company who seem most interested.

Of Dimont, who, with his large hunting-whip under his arm, stood poking his great round face over the shoulder of the homme d'affaires, it is unnecessary to say anything. That thin-looking oldish person, in a most correct and gentleman-like suit of black, was none other than Sir Robert Loquai, formerly of Dimont, who was ruined by having a legacy bequeathed to him of two shares in the Ayr bank. His hopes on the present occasion are founded on a very distant relationship, upon his sitting in the same pew with the deceased every Sunday, and upon his playing at bridge with her regularly on the Saturday evenings—taking great care never to come off a winner. That other coarse-looking man, wearing his own grey hair tied in a leathern cue more greasy still, is a teabossist, a relation of Mrs. Bertram's mother, who, having a good stock in trade when the colonial war was at its height, rewarded the merchant of his town with a commission in all the world. Mrs. Bertram alone excepted, whose tortoise-shell snuff-box was weekly filled with the best rapping at the old prices, because the maid servant called "Cherry", who is responsible for her cousin Mr. Quid. That young fellow, who has not had the decency to put off his boots and buckskin, might have stood as forward as most of them under similar circumstances. A very good-looking and solemnly young man; but it is thought he has forfeited the moment of fortune, by sometimes neglecting her tea-table when solemnly invited; sometimes appearing too busy in the business-like to attend the funeral of the lady. Theحياء company; twice treading upon her cat's tail, and once affronting her parrot.

To Marning, the most interesting of the group was the deceased's favourite female attendant, who, drinking into a corner as soon as possible, she saw with wonder and affright the intrusive researches of the strangers amongst those recesse to which from childhood she had looked with awful veneration. This girl was regarded with an unfavourable eye by all the competitors, honest Dimont only excepted; the rest conceived they should find in her a formidable antagonist that could best entertain and diminish their chance of success. Yet she was the only person present who seemed really to feel sorrow for the deceased. Mrs. Bertram had been protected through these hours of voluntary mourning and her expressions of sympathy were forgotten at the moment while the tears flowed after each other fast down the cheeks of her frightened and friendless dependant. "There's o'er muckle salt water there, Drum-mag," said the teabossist to the ex-proprietor, "to bide ither folk muckle gude. Folk seldom gret that rate but ken what it's for." Mr. Mac-Casquil only replied with a nod, feeling the propriety of saying nothing in the presence of Mr. Pleydell and Colonel Marning.

"Very queer if there shall be nae will after a', friend," said Dimont, who began to grow impatient, "to the many of business affairs.

"A moment's patience, if you please—she was a good and prudent woman, Mrs. Margaret Bertram—a good and prudent and well-judging woman, and knew well her duties. She may have put her last will and testament, or rather her mortis causae settlement, as it relates to heritage, into the hands of some safe friend." "I don't suppose," said Pleydell, whispering to the Colonel, "he has got it in his own pocket yet"—then addressing the man of law, "Come, we'll cut this short if you please—here is a settled estate of several years' duration, in favour of Miss Lucy Bertram of Ellangowan." The company stared fearfully wild. "You, I presume, Mr. Protocol, can inform us if there is a later deed?" "Please to favour me, Mr. Pleydell,"—and so saying, he took the deed out of the learned counsel's waistcoat pocket, and, on opening it, showed the underside of the document to the learned counsel. "Too cool," said Pleydell, "too cool by half—he has another deed in his pocket still." "Why does he not show it then, and be d—d to him?" said the military gentleman, whose patience began to wax threadbare.

"Why, how should I know?" answered the barister,—"why does a cat not kill a mouse when she takes him to her company. Protocol has a love of teasing, I suppose. Well, Mr. Protocol, what say you to that deed?"

"Why, Mr. Pleydell, the deed is a well-drawn deed, properly authenticated and tested in forms of the statute."

"But recalled or superseded by another of posterior date in your possession, eh?" said the counsellor. "Something of the sort I confess, Mr. Pleydell," rejoined the man of business, producing a bundle tied with tape, and sealed at each fold with a black wax. "That deed, Mr. Pleydell, which you cheerfully asked me to examine this morning, you now produce and formerly examined this afternoon—breaking the seals and unfolding the document slowly—"He dated the 20th—no, I see it is the 21st, of April of this present year, being ten years posterior."

"Marry, hang her, brock!" said the counsellor, borrowing an exclamation from Sir Tolyth Bech—"just the month in which Ellangowan's distresses became generally public. But let us hear what she has done."

Mr. Protocol accordingly having required silence, began to read the settlement aloud in a slow, steady, business-like style, which the listener had been in the habit of hearing, and which the counsel afterward repeated into his own ears, to catch the sense of the short sentences that he was intended to impress. He repeated it in a single tone, and in a style, and the visages of several of the hearers, which had attained a longitude that Mr. Mortlock might have envied, were perceptibly shortened, "in a style always in the uses, ends, and purposes herein after mentioned."

In these "uses, ends, and purposes," lay the cream of the affair. The first was introduced by a preamble setting forth, that the testatrix was linearly descended from the ancient house of Ellangowan, her respected great-grandfather, Henry Bertram, first of Singleside, of happy memory, having been second son to Allan Bertram, fifth of Allan Bertram. On his departure from the title, he was in a condition to state, that Henry Bertram, son and heir of Godfrey Bertram, now of Ellangowan, had been stolen from his parents in infancy, but that she, the testatrix, was well assured that he was not dead, and that the providence of heaven would be restored to the possession of his ancestors—in which case the said Peter Protocol was bound and obligated, like an hound and obliged himself, by acceptance of these presents, to dedicate himself of the said lands of Singleside and others, and of all the other effects thereby conveyed, excepting everything always useful or satisfactory to an end and in favour of the said Henry Bertram in his return to his native country. And during the time of his residing in foreign parts, or in case of his never again returning to Scotland, the said Peter Protocol, was directed to distribute the rents of the land, and interest of the other funds, deducting always a proper gratification for his trouble in the premises, in equal portions, among four charitable establishments pointed out in the will. The power of management, of letting leases, of raising and lending such sums as the business would bear, was vested in this confidential trustee, and, in the event of his death, went to certain official persons named in the deed. There were only two legacies; one was a sum of money left to a lady, another of the like sum to Janet Gibson (whom the deed stated to have been supported by the charity of the testatrix) for the purpose of binding her an apprentice to some honest trade.

A settlement in Inverness is in Scotland termed a mortification, and in one great borough, Aberdon, (if I remember rightly,) there is a municipal officer who takes care of these public endowments, and is thence called the Besser of Mortification, or, as another of the like sum to Janet Gibson (whom the deed stated to have been supported by the charity of the testatrix) for the purpose of binding her an apprentice to some honest trade.

GUY MANNERING.

I can't ask you home neither. Monday's a sacred day—so's Tuesday—and Wednesday we are to be heard in the great teind case in presence—but still—it's frosty weather, and if you don't leave town, and that venison would keep till Thursday—"

"You will dine with me that day?"

"Under no circumstances."

"Well, then, I will indulge a thought I had of spending a week here; and if the venison will not keep, why we will see what else our landlord can do for us."

"O, the venison will keep," said Pleydell; and now good by—look at these two or three notes, and deliver them if you like the addresses. I wrote them for you this morning—farewell, my clerk, has left me waiting this hour to begin a d—d information."—And he walked Mr. Pleydell with great activity, diving through closes and ascending covered stairs, in order the Stratae of Magellan are to the more open, but circumstaneous passage round Cape Horn.

On looking through the introduction which Pleydell had thrust into his hand, Mannerings was gratified with seeing that they were addressed to some of the first literary characters of Scotland.

"To Dr. Ferguson." "To Dr. Black." "To Lord Kames." "To Mr. Hutton." "To John Clerk, Esq. of Edin." "To Adam Smith, Esq." "To Dr. Robertson."

"Upon my word, my legal friend has a good selection of acquaintances—these are names pretty widely blown indeed—an East-Indian must rub up his faculties, and put his mind in order, before he enters this sort of society."

Mannerings gladly availed himself of these introductions; and we regret deeply, it is not in our power to give the account of the information which he received in admission to a circle never closed against strangers of sense and information, and which has perhaps at no period been equaled, considering the depth and variety of talent which it embraced, and concentrated.

Upon the Thursday appointed, Mr. Pleydell made his appearance at the inn where Colonel Mannerings lodged. The venison proved in high order, the claret excellent, and the learned council, a professor amiable in the affairs of the table, did distinguish me honour to both. I am uncertain, however, if even the good cheese gave him more satisfaction than the presence of Doctor Samson, an acquaintance of his own juridical style of wit, he contrived to extract great amusement, both for himself and one or two friends among whom the Colonel regaled on the same occasion. The lawyer afterwards answered to the insidious questions of the barrister, placed the bonhomie of his character in a more luminous point of view than Mannerings had yet seen it. Upon the same occasion he drew forth a strange quantity of miscellaneous and abstruse, though, generally speaking, useless learning. The lawyer afterwards compared his mind to the magazine of a pawn-broker, stored with goods of every description, but so cumbersomely piled together, and in such total disorganization, that the owner can never lay his hands upon any one article at the moment he has occasion for it.

As for the advocate himself, he afforded at least as much exercise to Samson as he extracted amuse-ment from him. When the man of law began to get into his animadversions, and his wit, naturally shrewd and dry, became more lively and poignant, the Dominie looked upon him with that sort of surprise with which we can conceive a tame bear might regard his future acquaintance, and would, naturally, on their first introduction to each other. It was Mr. Pleydell's delight to state in grave and serious argument some position which he knew the Dominie would be inclined to dispute. He then added the most exquisite parts of his work, with the most profound labour with which the honest man arranged his ideas for reply, and tasked his inert and sluggish powers to the board with so small wonder at a sight which many of them had never witnessed in their lives before.

be thrown into irreparable confusion by a movement

Dutch were in a crucial hour. Those mental exortions, made at unusual speed and upon the pressure of the moment, reckoned this one of the white days of his life, and always mentioned Mr.
Peck, as a very erudite and faceious gentleman.
By degrees the rest of the party dropped off, and left those three gentlemen together. Their conversation turned to Mrs. Bertram's settlements. Now

Colonel Mannerings took this opportunity to request
Mr. Pleydell to inform him of the particulars attending the loss of the boy; and the counsellor, who was said of talking upon subjects of criminal jurispruexperience, went through the circumstances at full length. And what is your opinion upon the result of the whole?"

"O, that Kennedy was mured-red; it's an old case which has occurred on that coast before now—the case of Smuggler versus Exciseman."
What then is your conjecture concerning the fate of this boy?"
"O, mured-red too, doubtless," answered Pleydell,
"He was old enough to tell what he had seen, and these ruthless smugglers would not scruple committing murder. He was shot to the head, and the cause of the whole?"
"The Dominie groaned deeply, and ejaculated:
"Enormous!"
"The General's mention of gipsies in the business

"He won't appear in character, will he?" said Mannerings.
"We shall know more of that, Hal, an thou lovest me," said Pleydell, "but we must have some news from the land of Egypt, if possible. O, if I had but hold of the slightest thread of this complicated skein, you should see how I would unravel it!—I would want the advice of all my Bohemian acquaintance to While Mr. Pleydell was thus vainly shouting his knowledge of his profession, the waiter re-entered Mr. Driver, and the frog of the last draught of two-penny

CHAPTER XL.

Ovn narrative now recalls us for a moment to the period when young Hazlewood received his wound.
That accident had no sooner happened, than the consequences of it flashed upon Brown's mind. From the manner in which the muzzle of the piece was pointed when it went off, there was no great fear that the consequences would be catastrophic. But an arrest in a strange country, and while he was unprovided with any means of establishing his rank and character, was at least to be avoided.

He therefore resolved to escape for the present to the neighbouring coast of England, and to remain conccealed till, if possible, until he should receive letters from his regimental friends, and remittances from his agent; and then to resume his own character, and the name of Hazlewood, if his friends would offer any explanation or satisfaction they might desire.

With this purpose he walked stoutly forward, after leaving the spot where the accident had happened, and reached within sight of his destination, the village which he had called Portanferry, (but which the reader will in vain seek for under that name in the county map.)
A large open boat was just about to leave the quay, hounded for the little town in the farther land of Antrim, in Ulster.
In this vessel Brown embarked, and resolved to make that place his temporary abode, until he should receive letters and money from England.

On the course of the port vessel he entered into some conversation with the steersman, who was also owner of the boat, a jolly old man, who had occasionally been engaged in the smuggling trade, like many fishers on the coast. After talking about objects of less interest, Brown endeavoured to turn the discourse toward the Mannerings family.
The sailor had heard of the attack upon the house at Woodbourne, but disapproved of the smugglers' proceed-

"And this Colonel Manning?" said Brown.

"That's a na good name to me," said the fisher, "but tell me why you blame me for what I did for saving the gentry's lives—that was very right; but it wanna like a gentleman to fight among the poor folk's people and brandy keys, however, he's a grand man and an officer man, and they do what they like wi' the like o' us,"

"And his daughter," said Brown, with a throbbing heart, "is going to be married into a great fa-ty too, as I have heard."

"What, into the Hazlewoods?" said the pilot.

"Na, na, that's but idle clashes—every Sabbath day, as regularly as it came round, did the young man ride hanging round the little town of the latter's birth—there my daughter Peggy's in the service up at Woodbourne, and she says she's sure young Hazlewood thinks no man of Miss Manning than you do.

But confidingly concurring in his own precipitate adoption of a contrary belief, Brown yet heard with delight that the suspicions of Julia's fidelity, upon which he had so rashly acted, were probably void of foundation.

I know Miss Manning in India, and did

The old man, a friend to smuggling, readily answered for the letter's being arrived at Allony, Brown wrote to Miss and your rashness has nearly occasioned the death of a young man of the highest worth and honour. May he say, as I said, that he has been my self very ill in consequence of your violence, and its effects? And, alas! I need say still further, that I have thought anxiously upon them as they are likely to affect you, although you have seen me such slender evidence for ventures of this nature. The C. is gone from home for several days; Mr. H. is almost quite recovered; and I have reason to think that the blame is laid in a quarter different from that where it is deserved. Yet do not think of venturing here. Our fate has been crossed by accidents of a nature too violent and terrible to permit me to think of renewing a correspondence which has so often threatened the most dire result. Farewell, therefore, and believe that no one can wish your happiness more sincerely than "J. M."

This letter contained that species of advice, which is frequently given for the precise purpose that it may lead to a directly opposite conduct from that which it recommends. At least so thought Brown, who immediately told the young fisherman if he came from Portaferry.

"Ay," said the lad; "I am said Willie Johnstone's son, and I got that letter from my sister Peggy, who's married to Lewis Donegall."

"My good friend, when do you sail?"

"With the tide this evening."

"I'll return with you; but as I do not desire to go to Portaferry, I could put me on shore somewhere on the coast."

"We can easily do that," said the lad.

Although the price of provisions &c. was then very moderate, and the advantages of his living, together with that of a change of dress, which safety as well as a proper regard to his external appearance rendered necessary, brought Brown's reason into a strong decision, he directed me to the post-office that he should be forwarded to Kippeltrigan, whither he resolved to proceed, and retain the treasure which he had deposited in the hands of Mrs. Mac-Candish. He also felt it would be his duty to assume his proper character as soon as he should receive the necessary evidence for supporting it, and, as an officer in the king's service, give and receive every explanation which might be necessary with young Mr. Lewis. When he arrived at Kippeltrigan, his first care was to find and purchase as much bark as he could. He intended to make a boat of that kind, which he was told could not damp and shake, and, besides, he was more embarking on the Solway firth. The wind was adverse, and attended by some rain, and they struggled against it without much assistance from the tide. The boat was held together by a rope of iron. After they had spent the whole night upon the firth, they were at morning sight of a beautiful bay upon the Scottish coast. The weather was now more mild. The wind had been fresh and busy; it had given way entirely under the fresh gale of the proceeding night. The more distant hills, indeed, remained their snowy mantle, but all the open country was cleared, unless where a few white patches indicated that it had been drifted to an uncommon depth. Even under its wintry appearance, the shore was highly interesting. The line of sea-coast, with all its various forms and features, swept away from the sight on either hand, in that varied, minute, yet graceful and easy line, which the eye loves so well to pursue. And it was no less relieved and diversified by the different forms of the shore; the beach in some places being bordered by steep rocks, and in others rising smoothly from the sands in easy and swelling slopes. Building..."
of necessities which he had been obliged to purchase at Allony, was left on the rocks beneath the ruin.

And thus, unconscious as the most absolute stranger, and in circumstances, which, if not destitute, were highly embarrassing; without even the countenance of a friend within the circle of several hundred miles; accused of a heavy crime, and, what was as bad as all the rest, being nearly penniless and the hard-won wares of the result added, after the toils and labours of so many years, approach the remains of the castle, where his ancestors had exercised all but regal dominion.

CHAPTER XLII.

Yes, ye moss-green walls,
Ye towers defences, I revisit ye,
Beneath the arches where your trophies now? (1)
Your towered courts, the tytulla, the tumult.
That spoke the grandeur of my house, the homage Of neighbouring Baronies—Mysteries Maker.

Entering the castle of Ellangowan by a postern door-way, which showed symptoms of having been once secured with the most jealously care, Brown (whom, since he had set foot upon the property of his father, he had never be called the castle of Bertram) wandered from one ruined apartment to another, surprised at the massive strength of some parts of the building, the rude and impressive magnificence of the fragments of the walls and towers and gates, and of the remains of the ruined castle in his new edifice. In two of these rooms, close beside each other, he saw signs of recent habitation. In one small apartment were empty bottles, half-gnawed bones, and dirt and filth on the floor. In the next, which a strong door, then left open, he observed a considerable quantity of straw, and in both were the relics of recent fires. Hereupon, with a current of suspicion and a presentiment that such trivial circumstances were closely connected with incidents affecting his prosperity, his honour, perhaps his life.

At satisfying his curiosity by a hasty glance through the interior of the castle, Bertram now advanced through the great gate-way which opened to the land, and paused to look upon the noble landscape which it commanded. Having in vain endeavoured to guess the position of Woodburne, and having nearly ascertained that of Kippletringan, he turned to take a parting look at the gate-way which he had just traversed. He admired the massive charm of the superb tower, the height of the arch, the strength of the stones, the height of the tower, and the weight and beauty of the stonework, and the beauty of the stones of the ruined castle in his new edifice. According to the ancient custom of the old castle of Ellangowan, by which the ancient castle was supposed to be an ancient castle, and that, having no great pleasure in the remains of the stranger till he was close upon him.

"Yes, sir, as I have often said before to you, the Old Place is not a great quantity of land, but would be better for the estate if it were all down, since it is only a den for smugglers." At this instant Bertram turned short round upon Glossin at the distance of two yards only, and said—"Would you destroy this fine old castle, sir?"

His face, person, and voice, were so exactly those of his father in his best days, that Glossin, hearing his exclamation, and seeing such a sudden appearance in the town, left the spot where he had stood, and in no hurry, and in no hurry, and in no hurry, went in the direction of the castle and met the very spot where he had been asked, almost thought the grave had been asked, almost thought the scenes of his infancy, and, on the other, compelled to be extremely cautious in his replies, lest he should say anything that would be a source of mortification to the slumbering train of association. He suffered, indeed, during the whole scene, the agonies which he so richly deserved; yet his pride and integrity, like the finest grains of a North American Indian, enabled him to sustain the tortures inflicted at once by the contending satellite of a guilty conscience, of hatred, of fear, and of suspicion.

"My name is Glossin," said Bertram, "of the family to whom this stately ruin belongs?"

"It is my property, sir; my name is Glossin."

Glosin—Glosin?" repeated Bertram, as if the answer were quite different from what he expected; "I beg your pardon, Mr. Glosin; I am apt to be very absent.—May I ask if the castle has been long in your family?"

"Yes, sir, said Bertram, "which is upon that scroll above the entrance gates and encircles the arms.

"Yes, sir, I really do not exactly know," replied Glosin.

"I should be apt to make it out, Our Right makes our Might.

"I believe it is something of that kind," said Glosin.

"May I ask, sir," said the stranger, "if it is your family motto?"

"N—no—no—no ours. That is, I believe, the motto of the former people—mine is—mine is—in fact I have had some correspondence with Mr. Cumming of Lorn, a nobleman about mine. He writes me the Glosinis anciently bore for a motto, 'He who takes it, makes it.'"

"If there be any uncertainly, sir, and the case were merely a matter of arms, which seems to me the better of the two."

Bertram, whose tongue by this time cove to the root of his mouth, only answered by a nod.

"It is old enough," said Bertram, fixing his eye upon the hand, and gato-way, and addressing Glosin, partly as they were thinking aloud—"it is old tracks which our memory plays upon. The remnants of an old prophecy, or song, or rhyme, of some kind from other records and the legend concerning that motto—it is a strange jangle of sounds:

'The dark shall be light,
And the wrong made right.'

When Bertram's right and Bertram's might shall meet on:

I cannot remember the last line—on some particular light—Arising is the rhyme, I am sure; but I cannot hit upon the preceding word.

'Confound your memory,' muttered Glosin; 'you remember by far too much of it!'

There are other rhymes connected with these early traditions of the castle, of which I have no recollection, so that I cannot tell you any more.

"I could sing such a ballad," said Bertram, "from end to another, when I was a boy. You must know I left Scotland, which is my native country, very young, and those who brought me up discouraged all my attempts to preserve recollection of my native land, on account, I believe, of a boyish wish which allied itself to the kind of interest which pervades young men; and which, very different from the round bold bullying voice with which he usually spoke. Indeed his appearance and demeanour during all this conversation seemed to diminish even his strength and stature; so that he appeared to wither into the shadow of himself, now advancing, now retreating, now stooping and wriggling his shoulders, now fumbling with the buttons of his waistcoat, now clapping his hands together,—in short, he was the picture of a mean-spirited水务 of the day."

To these appearances Bertram was totally indifferent, being dragged on as it were by the current of his own associations. Indeed, although he addressed Glosin—Glosin—Glosin again, it was in the capacity of the judge, as arguing upon the embarrassing state of his own feelings and recollection. "Yes," he said, "I preserved my language among the sailors, most of whom spoke English, and when I could get into a corner by myself, I used to sing that song over from beginning to end—I have forgot it all now—but I remember the tune well, though I cannot guess what should at present so strongly recall it to my memory."

He took his flageolet from his pocket, and played a simple melody. Apparently the tune awoke the corresponding associations of a damsel, who, close to Bertram, turned aside and perceived something about him, and which had once supplied the castle with water, was engaged in bleaching linen. She immediately took up the song.

"Auster the Links of Forth, she said,
Or are they the crooks of Dee,
Or the upper woods of Warrock-head?
The wind would soon cease."

"By Heaven," said Bertram, "it is the very ballad! I must learn these words from the girl."

Confusion! thought Glosin; if I cannot put a stop to this, all will be out. O the devil take all ballads, and ballad-makers, and ballad-singers! and d—d jade too, to set up her pipe!—You will have time enough for this on some other occasion," he said aloud; "at present"—(for now he saw his emissary with the same remark) "that I had, and which had once supplied the castle with water, was engaged in bleaching linen. She immediately took up the song.

Confusion! thought Glosin; if I cannot put a stop to this, all will be out. O the devil take all ballads, and ballad-makers, and ballad-singers! and d—d jade too, to set up her pipe!—You will have time enough for this on some other occasion," he said aloud; "at present"—(for now he saw his emissary with the same remark) "that I had, and which had once supplied the castle with water, was engaged in bleaching linen. She immediately took up the song.

"Auster the Links of Forth, she said,
Or are they the crooks of Dee,
Or the upper woods of Warrock-head?
The wind would soon cease."

"By heaven," said Bertram, turning short upon him, and not liking the tone which he made use of.

"Why, sir, as to that—I believe your name is Brown," said Glosin.

"And what of that, sir?"

Glosin looked over his shoulder to see how near his party had approached; they were coming fast on.

"Vanbeest Brown? If I mistake not."

"And what of that, sir?" said Bertram, with increasing asperity. "Any acquaintance you have with me, I respect no more."

"Why, in that case," said Glosin, observing his friends had now got upon the level space close beside them,—"in that case you are my prisoner in the king's name!"—At the same time he stretched his hand towards Bertram's collar, while two of the men who had come up seized upon his arms; he shook himself, however, free of their grasp by a violent effort, in which he pitched the most pernicious down the bank, and, drawing his cutlass, stood on the defensive, while those who had felt his strength recoiled from his presence, and gazed at a safe distance. "Observe," he called out at the same time, "that I have no purpose to resist legal authority; satisfy me that you have a magistrate's warrant, and are authorized to make this arrest, and I will obey it quietly; but let no man who loves his life venture to approach me, till I am satisfied for what crime, and by whose authority, I am apprehended."

Glosin then caused one of the officers to show a warrant for the apprehension of Vanbeest Brown, accused of the crime of wilfully and maliciously shooting at Charles Hazwood, younger of Hazwood, with an intent to kill, and also of other crimes and misdemeanors; which warrant, having been so apprehended, to be brought before the next magistrate for examination. The warrant being formal, and the fact such as he could not deny, Bertram threw himself upon the tender mercies of the officers, who, flying on him with exasperation and responding to their former pusillanimity, were about to load him with irons, alleging the strength and activity which he had displayed, as a justification of his conduct. But Glossin was astounded or afraid, and he permitted this unnecessary insult, and directed the prisoner to be treated with all the decency, and even respect, that was consistent with safety. Afraid, however, in giving the new body arms to the Nova Scotia badge depending from the shield.

Sir Robert Haslwood of Haslwood returns Mr. G. Glossin's compliments, and thanks him for the trouble he has taken in preparing the examination for which he should receive from the Baronet. In about half an hour his servant returned with the following answer, handsomely folded, and sealed with the Haslwood seal.

"SIR ROBERT HASLWOOD, BRITISH BARONET,

"To Mr. Gilbert Glossin,

"SIR ROBERT HASLWOOD, BRITISH BARONET,

"I have the honor to inform you that Mr. G. Glossin has been engaged by the Baronet to be his legal adviser in a matter which has been referred to him by the Baronet. I am, therefore, in a position to inform you that Mr. G. Glossin is the person who is to conduct the examination of the prisoner."

Addressed,

"Haslo and courtesy with which he could waive it, and descend to the level of ordinary conversation with ordinary men. Mr. Glossin, in short, is a gentleman of a manner in which "young Hazlewood" was so inter-mixedly concerned, and, pointing to his family pictures, observed, with a gracious smile, "Indeed these vows of mine: and I assure you, Mr. Glossin, do much ob-good as I am in this case, for the labour, pains, care, and trouble which you have taken in their behalf;
and I have no doubt, were they capable of expressing themselves, would join me, sir, in thanking you for the favour, you have conferred upon the house of Hazlewood, by taking care, and trouble, sir, and interest, in behalf of the young gentleman who is to enjoy this influence.

Thrice bowed Glossin, and each time more profoundly than before; once in honour of the knight who stood upright before him, once in respect to the acquaintances who patiently hung upon the wain-scot, and a third time in deference to the young gentleman who was to carry on the name and family.

"Admirer as he was, Sir Robert was gratified by the honours which he rendered, and proceeded, in a tone of gracious familiarity: "And now, Mr. Glossin, my exceeding good friend, you must allow me to avail myself of your knowledge of law in our proceedings in this case. I must premise that the law, as a body of action such as a justice of the peace; it must better with other gentlemen, whose domestic and family affairs require less constant superstition, attention, and ma-enagement.

Of course, whatever small assistance Mr. Glossin could render was entirely at Sir Robert Hazlewood's service; but, as Sir Robert Hazlewood's name stood high in the list of the family, the voice of Mr. Glossin could not presume to hope it could be either necessary or useful.

"Why, my good sir, you will understand me only too accurately. I do not lay claim to a knowledge of the practical knowledge of the ordinary details of justice-business. I was indeed educated to the bar, and might boast perhaps at one time, that I had made more of the abstruse and speculative, and abstract, and abstruse doctrines of our municipal code; but there is in the present day so little opportunity of a man of fortune and fortune rising to that eminence at the bar, which is attained by adventurers who are as willing as I am to zeal for John a Nokes as for the first noble of the land, that I was really early disgusted with practice. The first case, indeed, which was laid on my table, was not one of trespass respecting a bargain, such as a tallow, between a butcher and a candle-maker; and I found it was expected that I should grease my mouth, not only with their vulgar names, but with all those that have been overspread with the name of their dirty arts. Upon my honour, my good sir, I have never been able to bear the smell of a tallow-candle since."

Prying, as seemed to be expected, the mean use to which the Baronet's faculties had been degraded on this melancholy occasion, Mr. Glossin offered to official as clerk or assessor, or in any way in which he "should be most useful. "And with a view to possessing you of the whole business, and in the first place there will, I believe, be no difficulty in proving the main fact, that this was the person who fired the unlawful shot. Should he deign it, it can be proved by Mr. Hazlewood, I presume?"

"Young Hazlewood is not at home to-day, Mr.
Glossin; "But we can have the oath of the servant who attended him," said the ready Mr. Glossin; "Indeed I hardly think the fact will be disputed. I am more conscious, that, from the too favourable and in-justifiable belief that Mr. Hazlewood has been pleased to represent the business, the assault may be considered as accidental, and the injury, as unintentional, so that the fellow may be finally set at liberty to do more mischief."

"I have not the honour to know the gentleman who now holds the office of king's advocate," replied Sir Robert, gravely; "but I presume, sir, may say, that the boatman, that got the man, has the right of having wounded young Hazlewood of Hazlewood, even by inadvertency, to take the matter in his mildest and gentlest, and in its most favourable light and impression, and in the most easy manner of deportment.

"Indeed, Sir Robert," said his amnesting brother in justice, "I am one of your own; but I don't know how it is, I have observed the Edinburgh gentlemen of the bar, and even the officers of the crown, pique themselves upon an indifferently administration of justice, without respect to rank and family; and I should fear—"

"How, sir, without respect to rank and family? Will you tell me that doctrine can be held by men of birth and blood? Impossible! No, even if the street is termed mere picketry, but is elevated into sacrifice if the crime be committed in a church.
so, according to the just gradations of society, the guilt of an injury is enhanced by the rank of the person to whom it is offered, done, or perpetrated, sir."

Glossin bowed low to this declaration as cathedra, but observed, that in case of the very worst, and of such unnatural doctrines being actually held as he had already hinted, "the law had another hold on Mr. Vanbeest Brown!"

"Vanbeest Brown! Is that the lad's name? Good God, Mr. Glossin! young Hazlewood of Hazlewood should have had his life endangered, the clavicle of his right shoulder considerably lacerated and dislodged, several large drops or slugs deposed in the common channel, the arterial supply of his right arm expressed bears, and all by an obscure wretch named Vanbeest Brown!"

"Why, really, Sir Robert, it is a thing which one cannot easily bear, but, beginning ten thousand pardons for resuming what I was about to say, a person of the same name is, as appears from three papers, (producing Dirck Hatterick's pocket-book,) that freebooter who offended Mr. Glossin in the viciousness of his pursuits and those of a young laundress at Woodbourne, and I have no doubt that this is the same individual; which, however, your acute discrimination will easily be able to ascertain."

"The same, my good sir, he must assuredly be—it would be injustice even to the meanest of the people, to suppose there could be found among them two persons doomed to bear a name so shocking to one's ears as that of Vanbeest Brown."

"True, Sir Robert; most unquestionably; there cannot be a shadow of doubt of it. But you see further, that this circumstance accounts for the man's desperate flight, the child's desperate flight, the motive for his crime—you, sir, will discover it without difficulty, on your giving your mind to the examination; for my part, I cannot help suspecting it had something to do with the devotion of the infantry with which Mr. Hazlewood, with all the spirit of his renowned forefathers, defended the house at Woodbourne against this villain and his lawless companions."

"I will inquire into it, my good sir," said the learned Baronet. "Yet even now I venture to conjecture that I shall adopt the solution or explanation of this riddle, epigen, or mystery, which you have in some degree thus started. Yes; revenge it must be—and, good Heaven! entertained by and against whom?— tertained, fostered, cherished, against young Haklewood of Hazlewood, and in part carried into effect, executed, and implemented, by the hand of Van-beest Brown! These are dreadful days indeed, my worthy neighbour (this epithet indicated a rapid advance in the Baronet's good graces)—days when the bulwarks of society are shaken to their mighty base, and that rank, which forms, as it were, its highest grace and ornament, is mingled and confused with the viler and more meaner orders of men. That Mr.
Gilbert Glossin, in my time, sir, the use of swords and pistols, and such honourable arms, was reserved by the nobility and gentry to themselves, and the disadvantages and duties of the civil profession to those which nature had given them, or by cudgels cut, broken, or hewed out of the next wood. But now, sir, the clouted shoe of the peasant galls the knee of the courtier, and the mark of having wounded young Hazlewood of Hazlewhich they must bring, forsooth, to fatal arbitlement. But what, will you? Well, lost my time—let us have it in this fellow, the Vanbeck Brown, and make an end of it at least for the present."

CHAPTER XLIII.

'Twas he Gave heat unto the injury, which returned,
Like a pestilence lighted into the bosom
Of him gave it to. Yet I hope his hurt
Is not so dangerous but he may recover.

Fair Maid of the Inn.

The prisoner was now presented before the two worshipful magistrates. Grosset, partly from some compunctious visitings, and partly out of his cautious resolution to suffer Sir Robert Hazlwood to be the ostensible manager of the whole examination, looked down upon the table, and busied himself with reading and arranging the papers respecting the business, only now and then throwing in a skilful catchword as prompter, when he saw the principal, and apparently most important, witness of the affair, stand in need of a hint. As for Sir Robert Hazlwood, he assumed on his part a happy mixture of the austerity of the justice, combined with the display of personal dignity appointed as a deposit of another party.

"There, constables, let him stand there at the bottom of the table. Be so good as look me in the face, sir, and raise your voice as you answer the questions which I may go to ask you to put," said the prisoner; "for the honest gentlemen who have brought together this sort of interjunctial whips, in a nodding and standing the difficulty, not have been furnished to answer any information upon that point."

"And pray, sir," answered Sir Robert, "what has your name and quality to do with the questions I am about to ask you to put?"

"Nothing, perhaps, sir," replied Bertram; "but it may considerably influence my disposition to answer them."

"Why, then, sir, you will please to be informed that you are in presence of Sir Robert Hazlwood of Hazlwood, and another justice of peace for this county—that's all."

From this intimacy produced a less stunning effect upon the prisoner than he had anticipated, Sir Robert proceeded in his investigation with an increasing dislike to the object of it.

"Is your name Vanbeck Brown, sir?"

"It is," answered the prisoner.

"So far well—and how are we to design you further, sir?" demanded the magistrate.

"Captain in his majesty's—regiment of horse," answered Bertram.

The Baronet's ears received this intimation with astonishment; but he was refreshed in courage by an incredulous look from Grosset, and by hearing him gently utter a sort of interjunctional whisper, in a nodding of surprise and contempt. "I believe, my friend," said Sir Robert, "we shall find you, before we part, a more humble title."

"If you do," replied the prisoner, "I shall willingly submit to any punishment which such an impertinent shall be thought to deserve."

"Well, sir, we shall see," continued Sir Robert.

"Do you mean," said the Baronet, "young Hazlwood?"

"I never saw the gentleman who I am informed bears that name excepting once, and I regret that it was under very unpleasant circumstances."

"Do you, sir, in the present young Hazlwood?"

"I have never been to the town," replied Bertram.

"I thought as much," said Sir Robert.—"Were you not during that night—in the ruins of Dernecleugh?"

"I have never been to the town," said Bertram.

"Do you intend answering that question?"

"Yes, sir, and you Vanbeck Brown who is there mentioned?"

It must be remarked, that Grosset had shuffled among the papers some writings which really did belong to Bertram, which family had lost during several large drops or slugs in the acrobatic process."

Why, sir," replied Bertram, "I can only say I am equally ignorant of and sorry for the extent of the damage as your family sustained. I met him in a narrow path, walking with two ladies and a servant, and before I could either pass them or address them, this young Hazlwood took his gun from his servant, presented it against my body, and commanded me in the most haughty tone to stand and address him. I had to submit to his authority, or to leave him in possession of the means to injure me, which he seemed disposed to use with such rashness. I therefore closed with him for the purpose of disarming him; and just as I had nearly effected my purpose, the piece went off accidentally, and, to my great regret then and since, inflicted upon the young gentleman a serious chastisement than I desired, though I am glad to understand it is like to prove no more than his unprovoked folly deserved."

"And so, sir," said the Baronet, every feature swoln with offended dignity,—"You, sir, admit, sir, that it was your purpose, sir, and your intention, sir, and the reason, sir, to arm young Hazlwood of Hazlwood of his gun, sir, or his fowling-piece, or his fusil, or whatever you please to call it, sir, upon the king's highway, sir?—I think this will do, my worthy neighbour! I think he should stand committed?"

"You are by far the best judge, Sir Robert," said Grosset, in his most instructing tone; "but if I might presume to hint, there was something about these smugglers."

"Very true, good sir.—And besides, sir, you, Vanbeck Brown, who call yourself a captain in his majesty's service, would not be better or worse than a rascally mate of a smuggler!"

"Really, sir," said Bertram, "you are an old gentleman, and acting under some strange delusion, otherwise I should not have said this angry word."

"Old gentleman, sir! Strange delusion, sir!" said Sir Robert, colouring with indignation. "I protest and declare—Why, sir, have you any papers or letters that can establish your pretended rank, and estate, and commission?"

"None at present, sir," answered Bertram; "but in the return of a post or two."

"And how do you, sir," continued the Baronet, "if you be a captain in his majesty's service, how do you chance to be travelling in Scotland without letters of introduction, credentials, baggage, or any thing belonging to your pretended rank, estate, and condition, as I said before?"

"Sir," replied the prisoner, "I had the misfortune to be robbed of my clothes and baggage."

"Oho! then you are the gentleman who took a post-chaise from — to Kipplingtanach, gave the boy the slip on the road, and sent two of your accomplices to beat the boy and bring away the baggage?"

"I was, sir, in a carriage as you describe, was obliged to alight, and I tell you, and I entreat you to enquire of the road to Kipplingtanach. The landlord of the inn will inform you that on my arrival there the next day, my first inquiries were after the boy."

"Then give me leave to ask where you spent the night—not in the snow, I presume? you do not suppose that will pass, or be taken, credited, and received?"

"I beg leave," said Bertram, his recollection turning to the gipsy female, and to the promise he had given her, "I beg leave to decline answering that question."

"I thought as much," said Sir Robert.—"Were you not during that night in the ruins of Dernecleugh? —in the ruins of Dernecleugh, sir?"

"I have never been to the town," said Bertram.

"Do you intend answering that question?"
established fully. They are mingled with ship-accounts and other papers, belonging apparently to a range of the same name.

"And wilt thou attempt to persuade me, friend," exclaimed Sir Robert, "that there are two persons in this country, at the same time, of that very uncommon and very pronounced sounding name?"

"I really do believe there are," said an old Haselwood and a young Haslewedge, why there should not: an old and a young Vanbeest Robert. And, to do him justice, I was educated in Holland, and I saw that this name, however unsonorous it may sound, is British ears."—

Glossin, conscious that the prisoner was now out to enter upon dangerous ground, interfered, sought the intervention was unnecessary, for the purpose of diverting the attention of Sir Robert Haslewood, who was speechless and motionless with astonishment at the preposterous comparison implied by Bertram's last question. In fact, the veins of his nostril and of his temples swelled almost to bursting, and he sat with the indignant and disconcerted look of one who has received a mortal insult from a man of his rank, as he is now at Nottingham. The courageous make no reply. While with a bent brow and an angry eye he was drawing in his breath slowly and intently, and putting forth again with deep and measured steps, it leaped upon his countenance. I should think now, Sir Robert, with great submission, that this matter may be closed. One of the stablers, besides the pregnant proof already produced by the prisoner, showed me the day on which the prisoner was that morning confined (while using the mail advertised), and in a legal and warrant was annexed, a letter from him in a fray between the officers and persons to their attitude upon Vooodleburn. And yet," he added, "I would not give any rash construction upon that letter; perhaps the young man can explain how he happened to write that in that state of mind.

"That question, sir," said Bertram, "I shall also answer, sir."—

"There is yet another circumstance to be inquired into, always under Sir Robert's leave," intimated Glossin. "This prisoner has put into the hands of Mrs. Mac-Canfield of Kippeltrum, a parcel containing a variety of gold coins and valuable articles of different kinds. Perhaps, Sir Robert, you might think it right to ask me any property of a description which seldom occurs?"

"You, sir, Mr. Vanbeest Brown, sir, you hear the answer, sir, which the gentleman asks you?"

"I would rather decline to answer that question," answered Bertram.

"Then I am afraid, sir," said Glossin, who had sought matters to the point he desired to reach, "there is no ground for the necessity to sign an warrant of committal."

"As you please, sir," answered Bertram; "take me, however, what you do. Observe that I know not what Mr. Vanbeest Brown means, and that I am just returned from India, and therefore cannot possibly be connected with any of the contraband traders you talk of; that my Lieutenant, Major, with the officers of my corps, at Kingston-upon-THAMES, I offer before you both to submit to any degree of ignorance, if, within the return of the Lieutenant-Colonel, I am able to establish these points. Or you may write to the regiment, if you please and—"

"This is all very well, sir," said Glossin, beginning to feel the firm resolution of Bertram could make some impression on Sir Robert, who would almost have died of shame at committing such an absurdity as sending a captain of horse to jail!—"This is all very well, sir, but there is no person who could refer to?"

"There are only two persons in this country who may any thing of me," replied the prisoner. "One is a plain Liddesdale shepherd, named Dinmont Conner, and the other is a tradesman, whom I was supposed to be a farmer, and whom I told him, and what I now tell you."

"Why, this is well enough, Sir Robert!" said Glossin. "I suppose he would bring forward this skill-mouthed fellow to give his oath of credulity, Sir Robert, ha, ha, ha!"—

"And what is your other witness, sir," said the Baronet.

"A gentleman whom I have some reluctance to mention, because of certain private reasons, under whose grace and protection I am safe in India, and who is too much a man of honour to refuse his testimony to my character as a soldier and gentleman."

"And who is this doughty witness, pray, sir?" said Sir Robert, "a half-pay quartermaster or sergeant, I suppose?"

"Colonel Guy Mannerings, late of the — regiment, in which, as I told you, I have a troop."

Colonel Guy Mannerings! thought Glossin,—who the devil could have guessed this?—

"Colonel Guy Mannerings!" echoed the Baronet, and I am ready," mumbled in his opinion,—"My good sir! —apart to Glossin, "the young man, with a dreadful plebeian name, and a good deal of modest assurance, has nevertheless something of the tone, and manners, and feeling of a gentleman. I have lived in good society—they do give commissions very loosely, and carelessly, and inaccurately, in India—I think we had better pause, till Colonel Mannerings shall return; and, by the way, I have not seen him for a long time."

"You are in every respect the best judge, Sir Robert," answered Glossin, "in every possible respect. I would only submit to you, that we are certainly hard put to it to decide whether the commission which cannot be satisfied by proof, and that we shall incur a heavy responsibility by detaining him in private custody, without committing him to a public trial, which we are absolutely sure, you are the best judge, Sir Robert; and I would only say, for my own part, that I very lately incurred severe censure by detaining a man in a place in which I thought perfectly secure, and under whose custody of the best officers. The man made his escape, and I have no doubt my own character for attention and circumspection as a magistrate has in some degree suffered—I only hint this—I will join in any step you, Sir Robert, think most advisable."

But Mr. Glossin was well aware that such a hint was of power sufficient to decide the motions of his self-importance, but not self-relying colleague. So that Sir Robert Haslewood summed up the business of the following day, which proceeded partly upon the superscription of the prisoner being really a gentleman, and partly upon the opposite belief that he was a villain—Sir, Mr. Vanbeest Brown,—I would call you Captain Brown if there was the least reason, or cause, or grounds to suppose that you are a captain, or had a troop in the very respectable corps you mention, or indeed in any corps in his majesty's service, to which circumstance I beg to be understood to give no positive, settled, or unalterable judgment, declaration, or opinion. I say therefore, sir, Mr. Brown, we have determined, considering the unpleasant predicament in which you now stand, having been robbed, as you say, an asssertion to which I suspend my opinion, and being possessed of much and valuable treasure, I am with the officers of my corps, at Kingston-upon-THAMES, offer before you both to submit to any degree of ignorance, if, within the return of the Lieutenant-Colonel, I am able to establish these points. Or you may write to the regiment, if you please and—"

"With humble submission, Sir Robert," said Glossin, "may I inquire if it is your purpose to send this young gentleman to the county jail?—for if that were not your settled intention, I would take the liberty to hint, that there would be less hardship in sending him to the fortress of Portaferry, where he could be secured without public exposure; a circumstance which, on the mere chance of his story being really true, is much to be avoided."

"Why, there is a guard of soldiers at Portaferry, to be sure, for the protection of the goods in the Customshouse; and upon the whole, considering every thing and that the place is comfortable for such a place, say all things considered, we will commit this person, I would rather say authorize him to be detained, in the workhouse at Portferry.

The warrant was made out accordingly, and Bertram was informed he was next morning to be removed to his place of confinement, as Sir Robert had determined he should not be taken any longer under cloud of night, for fear of rescue. He was, during the interval, to be detained at Hazlewood-house.

It cannot be so hard as my imprisonment by the Lord Chancellor, I don’t think it has lasted so long. But the devil take the old formal duffer, and his more eloquent associate, who speaks always under his breath—they cannot understand a plain man’s story when it is told them.

In the meanwhile Glossin took leave of the Baronet, with a thousand respectful bows and courtesies apropos for not accepting his invitation to dinner, and venturing to hope he might be pardoned in paying his respects to him, Lady Hazlewood, and young Mr. Hazlewood, on some future occasion.

"Certainly, sir," said the Baronet, very gravely, "I hope our family was never at any time deficient in civility, and it will be in my power to give a little that way. Good Mr. Glossin, I will convince you of this by calling at your house as familiarly as is consistent— that is, as can be hoped or expected." He pulled himself together, "to find Dirk Hatterrack and his people—to get the guard sent off from the Custom-house—and then for the grand cast of the dice. Every thing must depend upon speed. How long a time has broken himself to Edinburgh! His knowledge of this young fellow is a most perilous addition to my dangers,"—here he suffered his horse to shew off his pace—"What if I should try to come up? To the court?—It’s likely he might—be brought to pay a round sum for restitution, and I could give up Hatterrack—but no, no!—there were too many eyes on me. Hatterrack himself, and the garnet—there is something that strikes to my original plan." And with that he struck his spurs against his horse’s flanks, and rode forward at a hard trot to put his machines in motion.

CHAPTER XLIV.

A prison is a house of care.
A place where none can thrive,
A friend to none true or false,
A cave for all my desolation.
Sometimes a place of right,
Sometimes a place of wrong,
Sometimes a place of rogues and thieves,
And honest men.

Early on the following morning, the carriage which had brought Bertram to Hazlewood-house, was, with his two attendants, taken to Portferry, with the intention of carrying him to his place of confinement at Portferry. This building adjoined to the Custom-house established at that little sea-port, and both were situated so close to the sea-bench, that it was necessary to defend the back part with a large and strong rampart or bulwark of huge stones, disposed in a slope towards the surf, which often reached and broke upon them. The entrance was surrounded by a high wall, enclosing a small court-yard, within which the miserable inmates of the mansion were occasionally permitted to take exercise and air. The prison was used as a House of Correction, and sometimes as a chapel of ease to the county jail, which was old, and far from being conveniently situated with reference to the Kippeltingian district of the county. Mac-Guffog, the officer by whom Bertram had at the time apprehended, and who was now in attendance upon him, was keeper of this palace of little ease. He caused the carriage to be drawn close up to the outer gate, and then led Bertram to supper.

The noise of his rap alarmed some twenty or thirty ragged boys, who left off selling their mimic sloops and frigates in the little pools of salt water left by the ebb tide, and who, being allowed to see what luckless being was to be delivered to the prison-house out of Glossin’s braw new carriage.

The door of the court-yard, after the heavy clanking of many chains and bars, was opened by Mrs. Mac-Guffog, an awful spectacle, being a woman for strength and resolution capable.

The warrant was made out accordingly, and Bertram was informed he was next morning to be removed to his place of confinement, as Sir Robert had determined he should not be taken any longer under cloud of night, for fear of rescue. He was, during the interval, to be detained at Hazlewood-house.

It cannot be so hard as my imprisonment by the Lord Chancellor, I don’t think it has lasted so long. But the devil take the old formal duffer, and his more eloquent associate, who speaks always under his breath—they cannot understand a plain man’s story when it is told them.

In the meanwhile Glossin took leave of the Baronet, with a thousand respectful bows and courtesies apropos for not accepting his invitation to dinner, and venturing to hope he might be pardoned in paying his respects to him, Lady Hazlewood, and young Mr. Hazlewood, on some future occasion.

"Certainly, sir," said the Baronet, very gravely, "I hope our family was never at any time deficient in civility, and it will be in my power to give a little that way. Good Mr. Glossin, I will convince you of this by calling at your house as familiarly as is consistent— that is, as can be hoped or expected." He pulled himself together, "to find Dirk Hatterrack and his people—to get the guard sent off from the Custom-house—and then for the grand cast of the dice. Every thing must depend upon speed. How long a time has broken himself to Edinburgh! His knowledge of this young fellow is a most perilous addition to my dangers,"—here he suffered his horse to shew off his pace—"What if I should try to come up? To the court?—It’s likely he might—be brought to pay a round sum for restitution, and I could give up Hatterrack—but no, no!—there were too many eyes on me. Hatterrack himself, and the garnet—there is something that strikes to my original plan." And with that he struck his spurs against his horse’s flanks, and rode forward at a hard trot to put his machines in motion.

CHAPTER XLIV.

A prison is a house of care.
A place where none can thrive,
A friend to none true or false,
A cave for all my desolation.
Sometimes a place of right,
Sometimes a place of wrong,
Sometimes a place of rogues and thieves,
And honest men.

Discipline.

Early on the following morning, the carriage which had brought Bertram to Hazlewood-house, was, with his two attendants, taken to Portferry, with the intention of carrying him to his place of confinement at Portferry. This building adjoined to the Custom-house established at that little sea-port, and both were situated so close to the sea-bench, that it was necessary to defend the back part with a large and strong rampart or bulwark of huge stones, disposed in a slope towards the surf, which often reached and broke upon them. The entrance was surrounded by a high wall, enclosing a small court-yard, within which the miserable inmates of the mansion were occasionally permitted to take exercise and air. The prison was used as a House of Correction, and sometimes as a chapel of ease to the county jail, which was old, and far from being conveniently situated with reference to the Kippeltingian district of the county. Mac-Guffog, the officer by whom Bertram had at the time apprehended, and who was now in attendance upon him, was keeper of this palace of little ease. He caused the carriage to be drawn close up to the outer gate, and then led Bertram to supper.

The noise of his rap alarmed some twenty or thirty ragged boys, who left off selling their mimic sloops and frigates in the little pools of salt water left by the ebb tide, and who, being allowed to see what luckless being was to be delivered to the prison-house out of Glossin’s braw new carriage.
right to be stripped of your money and sent to jail without a mark to pay your fees; they might have kept my neck up for evidence. But why, for a blind bottle-head, did not ye ask the guinea and I kept winking and nodding at the time, and the donnett deswil was never once look my way?—Melancholy. The sight of that title to have that property delivered up to me, I shall apply for it; and there is a good deal more than enough to pay any demand you can set up.

"Well, sir," said Mac-Guflog, "ye may be here lang enough. And then the gifting credit man be considered in the fees. But, however, as ye do seem to be a chap by common, though my wif wi' ye a gin to the in the event, I will give an order for my fees upon that money—I dare say Glosem will make it forthcoming—I ken something about an escape from Ellangowan—ay, ay, he'll be glad to carry me there.

"Well, sir," replied Bertram, "if I am not furnished in a day or two otherwise, you shall have such an order.

"Ay, weel, when ye shall be put up like a prince," said Mac-Guflog, "but mark ye me, friend, that we may have nae colly-shangie hereafter; these are the fees that I always charge a swell that must have his life. Thirty shillings a week for lodging, and twenty a week for a single bed, and I dinna get the whole of it, for I must give half a crown out of it to Donald Laird the man; for sheep, feeding, that should sleep with you by your homely in the night, and may eat some whiskey beside. So I make little upon that.

"Well, sir, go on.

"Then for meat and liquor, ye may have the best, and nae charge above twenty per cent. ower tavern price for pleasing a gentleman that way—and that's little enough for sending in and sending out, and wearing thelass's shoon out. And then if ye do drink, take care ye get wi' ye a glift in the event. Just ye give a man, and help ye out wi' your bottle. I have drank mony a gless wi' Glosem, man, that did you up, though he's a justice now. And then I'll warrant ye'll be for fire that cauld nights, or if ye want candle, that's an expensive article, for it's against the niles. And now I'll tell ye the head articles of the charge, and I dinna think there's muckle mair, though there will be some odd expenses ower and above.

"Well, sir, I must trust to your conscience, if ever you happened to hear of such a thing—I cannot help myself.

"Na, na, sir," answered the cautious jailor. "I'll permit you to be saying that—I'm forcing nothing upon ye;—an ye dinna like the price, ye needna take the article—I force no man; I was only explainin' what the expense was. The sum run o' the house, it's a' ane to me—I'll be saved trouble, that's a.

"Nay, my friend, I have, as I suppose you may easily guess, no inclination to dispose of your terms upon such a penalty," answered Bertram. "Come, show me where I am to be, for I would fain be alone for a little while.

"Ay, come along then, Captain," said the fellow, with a contortion of visage which he intended to be a smile; "and I'll tell you now—"to show you that I have a conscience, as ye ca', d—n me if I can understand it. They take the case in the court, and ye may walk in very near three hours a day, and play at pitch and toss, and hand ba', and what not.

"With this gracious promise, he ushered Bertram into the house, and showed him up a steep and narrow stone staircase, at the top of which was a strong door, chained with iron, and studded with nails. Bertram entered the cell, and found it having three cells on each side, wretched vaults, with iron bed-frames, and straw mattresses. But at the further end was a small apartment, of rather a more delicate appearance, that is, having less the air of a place of confinement, since, unless for the large lock and chain upon the door, and the crossed and ponderous stanchions upon the window, it rather resembled the "worst inn's worst room." It was designed as a sort of infirmary for prisoners whose state of health required some indulgence; and, in fact, Donald Laird himself had been just dragged out of one of the two beds which it contained, to try whether clean straw and whiskey might not have a better chance to cure his intermittent fever.

"Oh, the sight of that..." Alas! and the middle of the narrow chamber, like the banner of a chiefain, half-sinking amid the confusion of a combat.

"Never mind that being out o' sorts, Captain," said Mrs. Mac-Guflog, who now followed them into the room; then, turning her back to the prisoner, with as much delicacy as the action admitted, she stepped from her knee her ferret garter, and applied to a splicing a new fastening the breach bed-post then used more pins than her apparel could well spare to fasten up the bed-curtains in faststools—then shook the bed-clothes into something like form—then hung over all a taffeta bluish green—after which, the bed itself, and all that things were now "something picturesque.

"And there's your bed, Captain," pointing to a massy four-posted hulk, which, owing to the inequality of the floor that had been constructed (it now, having been built by contract, stood upon three legs, and held the fourth aloft as if puming the air, and in the attitude of advancing like an elephant, comatose upon the pannel of a coach—"There's your bed and the blankets; but i, ye want sheets, or bowser, or pillow, or any sort o' nappery for the table, or for your hands, ye'll have to speak to me about it, for that's out o' the warrant, I warrant ye."

"Well, I think I'll make this time left the room, to avoid, probably, any appeal which might be made to him upon this new excitation; and I never engage for any thing like that.

"In God's name," said Bertram, "let me have what is decent, and make any charge you please."

"Aweel, sweed, that's some settled; we'll no excise you neither, though we live lassie near the Custom-house. And I maun see to get you some fire and some dinner too, I'me warrant: but your dinner will be but a pur ane the day, no expecting company that would be nice and fashionable."—So saying, and in all haste, Mrs. Mac-Guflog fetched a hearth-stick and having replenished the "rusty grate, unconscious of a fire" for months before, she proceeded with unwashed hands to arrange the stipulated bed-linen, and, without a word, took a tray of buns, and without even mattering to herself as she discharged her task, seemed, in invertebrate spleen of temper, to grudge even those accommodations for which she was to receive payment. At length, however, she departed, grumbling between her teeth, that "she wad rather lock up a hail ward than be fikking about these naff-uffly galooties that gae see muckle fish wi' their faneci."
GUY MANNERING.

CHAPTER XLV.

But if thou shouldst be drage’d in scorn
To ponder ignominious love,
Thou shalt not want one faithful friend
To share the cruel fate’s decree.

Thee, Gwenn, thou record of guilt and anime, Fell, since he was afflicted with a disposition to low spirits.
"I have been in worse situations than this too," he said, "for what signifies a little more or less? I am in the midst of the town, nothing to do, and I am a great deal better off than you are."

Be gone, thou record of guilt and anime!" he said, flinging the book upon the spare bed; "a Scottish jail shall not break, on the very first day, the spirits which have resisted climate, and want, and penury, and disease, and imprisonment, in a foreign land. I have fought many a hard battle with Dame Fortune, and she shall not beat me now, if I can help it.

Then there was a son of fortune, who, exasperating to a Scottish court, he endeavoured to view his situation in the most favourable light. Delaere must soon be in Scotland; the certificates from his commanding officer must soon arrive; nay, if Mannering were first applied to, who could say but the effect might be a reconciliation between them? He had often observed, and now remembered, that when his former colonel took the art of making no less than five different suits of clothes in a single day, that he seemed to love those persons most who had lain under obligation to him. In the present case, a favour, which had been given with honour and gratitude, with readiness, might be the means of reconciling them to each other. From this his feelings naturally turned towards Julia; and, without very nicely measuring the consequences of such a solicitude, of such a solicitude, he ex-} near by. But Wasp rode thirty of them afores me on the saddle, and the pur doggie balanced itself on one of the weasns hae dune, whether I trotted or cantered."

In this strange story Bertram obviously saw, supposing the warning to be true, some intimation of danger more violent and imminent than could be likely to arise from a flight through the coppice on the other side. At the same time it was equally evident that some unknown friend was working in his behalf. "Did you not say," he asked Dindmont, "that this man Gabriel was of gipsy blood?"

"It was ev'n judged so," said Dindmont, "and I think this makes it likely; for they are few where the ganges of ilk ather are to be found, and they can par gares three like a' the rest of the folk, and beneath the compell'd like. An I forgot to tell ye, there's been an unco inquiry after the auld wife that we saw in Bwercastle; the sherif's had folk over the Limestone ridge after, and an unco ranging, and an unco none has gotten a sight for her; but she'll no be taen wi' them unless she likes, for a'that."

And how comes that," said Bertram. "Oh, I daurna say it's nonsense, but they say she has gathered the fern-seed, and can gang ony aigle she likes, like Jock-the-Giant-killer in the ballant, wi' his coat o' darkness and his shoon o' cunning."

A na, gudeman, said Gabriel, and I want to see yours."

"Ay, said I, and ye'll be waiting eilding now, or supping, or going to your house."

"A na, na, qu'ho, it's na I'm seeking; but I tak an unco concern in that Captain Brown that was staying wi' you, ye've na?"

"Truth do I, Gabriel," says I; "and what about ye?"

"Says he, 'There's mair tik an interest in him than you, and some that I am bound to obey; and it's no just on my sin will that I here to tell you something.'"

"Faith, naething will please me, qu'ho, I that's no meaning to him."

"And then, qu'ho, ye'll be ill-sorted to hear that he's gotten into the prison at Portanferry, if he di an take a' the better care o' himself, for there's been warnants out to tak him as soon as he comes over the water frin Allonby. And now, gudeman, an ever ye were a rich man when o' a' Portanferry ladies and let nae grass grow at the nag's heels; and if ye do in confinement, ye mae stay beside him night and day, for a day or twa, for he'll want friends that has haith heart and hand; and if ye neglect this ye'll never rue but ane, for it will be for your life."

"But, safe us, man, qu'ho, I 'ow did ye learn o' this? it's an unco way between this and Portanferry."

"Na, na, qu'ho, them that bring the news rade night and day, and ye maa be aff constantly if ye wad do any guide—and sae I have nae thing mair to tell ye.―Sae he sat himself down and haued his way intae the plan, where it wad hae been following him wi' thae beast, and I cam back to Charles—hope to tell the gudewife, for I was uncertain what to do. It wad look unco-like, I thought, not to be sent out on a hunt-the-gowk errand wi' a hand-looper like that. But, Lord! as the gudewife set up her throat about it, and said what a shame it wad be if ye was to come to any wrong, an I could na say naething else but to let them. So I took to the kist, and out wi' the pickles note a case they should be needed, and a' the ba'rians ran o' the saddle Dumble. By great luck I had taken the other beast to Portanferry, so Dumble had nae fresh meat. Says I, 'Och, and Wasp, for me, for ye wad nae haith thought he kenn'd where I was gaun, purr cast; and here I am after a trot o' sixty mile, or the handle of a stoup o' liquor; than which, our provost seems to infer there is nothing comes more readily to the green.
we acquaint the reader with some other circum
cstances which occurred about the same period.

CHAPTER XLVI.

—Stay from whence
You cometh (Wisdom 7:20).
Upon this blasted heath you stop our way
With such prophetic greeting?—
So Jonas foretold.

Upon the evening of the day when Bertram’s examination had taken place, Colonel Manning arived at Woodbourne from Edinburgh. He found his family in their usual state, which probably, so far as it concerned Julian, who had not been informed of the case, she had learned the news of Bertram’s arrest.
But as, during the Colonel’s absence, the two young ladies lived much retired, this circumstance fortunately had not reached their kindred. Miss Bertram acquainted with the downfall of the expectations which had been formed upon the bequest of her kinswoman. Whatever hopes that news might have had in it, he set about preventing her from joining her friend in affording a cheerful reception to the Colonel, to whom she endeavoured to express the deep sense she entertained of her paternal kindness. She touched on her regret that at such a season of the year he should have made, upon her account, a journey so fruitless.

"That it was fruitless to you, my dear," said the Colonel, "is what I feared; I had deeply lamented for my own share, I have made some valuable acquaintances, and have spent the time I have been absent in Edinburgh with peculiar satisfaction; so that, on that score, there is nothing to regret. Miss Bertram’s best friend, the Dominie is returned thrice the man he was, from having sharpened his wits in controversy with the geniuses of the northern metropolis.

"Of a surety, the Dominie has proved himself to the Colonel, with great complacency," I did wrestle, and was not overcome though my adversary was cunning in his art.

"I presume," said Miss Manning, "the contest was somewhat fatiguing, Mr. Sampson?"

"Very much, my lady—when I girded up my loins and strove against him.

"I can bear witness," said the Colonel; "I never saw an affair better contested. The enemy was like the Mahometan caravans; he incessantly presented no fair mark for artillery; but Mr. Sampson stood to his guns, notwithstanding, and fired away, now upon the enemy, and now upon the dust which he had flung up into the air. But my friend the Dominie returned thrice the man he was, from having sharpened his wits in controversy with the genius of the northern metropolis."

The next morning at breakfast, however, the Doimie did not return to his usual cheerful air. He had walked out, a servant said, early in the morning. It was so common for him to forget his meals, that his absence never endangered the family. The housekeeper, a decrepit old-fashioned Presbyterian woman, having, as such, the highest respect for Sampson’s theological acquisitions, had it in charge on these occasions to take care that he was no sufferer by his absence of mind, and therefore usually waylaid him on his return, to remind him of his sublunary wants, and to minister to their relief. It seldom, however, happened that he was absent from two meals together.

As was the case in the present instance, he must explain the cause of this unusual occurrence.

The conversation which Mr. Pymdoll had held with Mr. Manning on the subject of the loss of Harry Bertram, had awakened all the painful as-tions which that event had inflicted upon Sampson. The affectionate heart of the poor Dominie had always reproached him, that his negligence in leaving the charge of the family to Mrs. Bertram and the ruin of the family of his patron. It was a subject which he never ceased to reflect upon, of indeed the worst of his misfortunes, which he could call to himself at any time,—but it was often present to his imagination.

The sort of hope so strongly affirmed and asserted in Mrs. Bertram’s last settlement, had excited a conponding feeling in the Dominie's bosom, which exasperated into a sort of sickening anxiety, by discord with which Pleddell had treated it.—And the appearance of Sampson to himself, as a man of condition, and well skilled in the weighty matters of law; but he is also a man of humorous levity and inconsistency of speech; and wherefore should he not be interpreted as to be accorded with the just application of their infernal practices, a belief of such legends had been impressed upon the Dominie as an article indivisible from his religious faith, and perhaps it would have been equally difficult to have induced him to doubt the one as the other. With these feelings, and in a thick misty day, which was already drawing to its close, Dominie Sampson did not pass the Kain of Dornelough, which seemed false justification of their infernal practices.

What then was his astonishment, when, on passing the door—that door which was supposed to have been placed there by one of the latter Lairds of Ellan-gowan, to prevent proumpuous strangers from incurring the dangers of the haunted vault—that door, supposed to be always locked, and the key of which was popularly said to be deposited with the presbytery—that door, that very door, opened suddenly, and the figure of Meg Merrilies, well known, though not seen for many a revolving year, was placed at once before the eyes of the startled Dominie! She stood and gazed at him, and fixed him in her brain so absolutely, that he could not avoid her except by fairly turning back, which his manhood prevented him from thinking of.

"I ken't ye, my bonny lass," she said with her harsh and hollow voice: "I ken wha ye seek; but ye maun do my bidding.

"Are ye sure?"—Conjuror, continuo the Dominie, "abujo, con-sensor, atque virilis imperio tibi!"

"What, in the name of Sathan, are ye feared for? wi' your French gibberish, that would make a dog sick? Listen, ye sickit stammer, to what I tell ye, or ye shall rue it while there's a limb o' ye hinges to another!—Tell Conjuror the Dominie that when he's speak ing me. He kens, and I ken, that the blood will be wiped out, and the lost will be found,

And Brittain's right and Brittain might also speak what he thought.

If he has a letter to him; I was gaun to send it in another way,—I canna write myself; but I hae them that will write and read, and ride and run for me. Tell him that I know not, nor can I understand, and the wheel's turning. Bid him look at the stars as he has looked at them before.—Will ye mind 'a this?"

"Assuredly," said the Dominie, "I am dubious for, woman, I am perturbed at thy words, and my flesh quakes to hear thee."

"They do you nay ill though, and maybe muckle guile." "Avoid ye! I desire no good that comes by unlawful means."

"Fule-body that thou art," said Meg, stepping up to him with a frown of indignation that made her dark eyes flash like lamps from under her bent brows, "Fule-body! if I meant ye wrong, couldna I claud ye ower that crook, and wan man ken how yan cunn be out and out eer than Frank Kennedy? Hear ye that, ye wormie?"

"In the name of all that is good," said the Dominie, recollecting, and pointing his long pewter-headed walking cane toward the man, "In the name of all that is good, bide hands! I will not be handled, woman, stand off, upon thine own proper peril!— despit, I say; I am strong, lo, I will resist thee."

Conjuror, continuo the Dominie, Meg armed with supernatural strength, (as the Dominie asserted) broke in upon his guard, but by a thrust which he made at her with his cane and blood him into the vault, "as easily," said he, "as I could away a Kitchen's Atlas."

"Sit down there," she said, pushing the half-throttled preacher with some violence against a broken chair,—"sit down there, and gather your wind and voice. I say, and for the good of o' the kirk that ye are—Are ye fou or fasting?"

"Fasting—from all but sin," answered the Dominie, who, recovering his voice, and finding his exorcuiions only served to exasperate the intractable sorcerer, thought it best to affect complaisance and submission, inwardly coming over, however, the whole of which injuries which he durst no longer utter aloud. But as the Dominie's brain was by no means equal to carry on two trains of ideas at the same time, a word or two of his mental exercise sometimes escaped, and mingled with his uttered speech, in a truly humorous enough, especially as the poor man shrank himself together after every escape of the kind, from terror of the effect it might produce upon the irritating feelings of the witch.

In the meanwhile, went to a great black cauldron that was boiling on a fire on the floor, and, lifting the lid, an odour was diffused through the vault, which, if the vapours of a witch's cauldron could in such a place have imparted breath to the her-broth which such vessels are usually supposed to contain. It was in fact the savour of a goody stew, composed of bowls, hare, partridges, and moorgambeef, with various other meats, and potatoes, and loeks, and from the size of the cauldron, appeared to be prepared for half a dozen of people at least. "So ye hae eat naething a' day!" said Meg, harrying a little heartily. "Aye," said he, "but I am too stewed with salt and pepper.

"Nothing," answered the Dominie,—"sectelastia-me"—that is—gudewife.

"Aye," said the housekeeper, placing the dish before him,
"there's what will warm your heart."

"I do not hunger—maleficea—that is to say—Mrs.
Merrilies!" for he said unto himself, "the savour is sweet, but it hath been cooked by a Canidia or an Englishman."

"If ye dinna eat instantly, and put some soul in ye, by the bread and the salt, I'll put your throat wi' the cutty spoons, scalding as it is, and whether ye will or no. Cape, sin, wa', and awaw!"

Sampson, afraid of eye of newt, and toe of frog, tigers' eahadrons, and so forth, had determined not to venture; but the smell of the stew was fast melting his heart. He said, "Well, if I hae hipment as were in streams of water, and the witch's threats deceived him to feed. Hunger and fear are excellent ca-

Saul," said Hunger, "feasted with the witch of Endor,"—"And," quoth Fear, "the salt which she sprinkled upon the food showed plainly it is not a romantic banquet, in that season neither seething nor burning, he might see Hunger, after the first spoonful, "it is savoury and refreshin' viands."

"So ye like the meat?" said the hostess.

"Yea," answered the Dominee, "and I give thee thanks—sectelastia me—which means—Mrs. Margaret."

"Aweel, eat your fill; but an ye ken'd how it was gotten, ye may wade like it saw weel.

Samp-slew," said the ne'er do well, in a tone bearing its let-ing his head to his mouth. "There's been a moon a lightning watch to bring a' that trade thereon," continued Meg,—"the folk that are to eat that dinner thought little o' your game lives."

Is that all I thought Sampson, resuming his spoon,

"We must again have recourse to the contribution to Blackwood's Magazine, April, 1817.

"To the admixture of good eating, gory cookery seems to have little to recommend it. I can assure you, however, that the cookery of the times, in Scotland, is a novel and self-contained. The novel reader ever reads even a novel without an eye to the enlargement of the culinary scicence, has added to the Almanach des Gourmands, a certain Pet-agere, Deverses, who gives us a large collection of gour-self and novelty of all kinds, stewed with vegetables into a soup, which

As Mr. Sampson crossed the hall with a bewidled look, Mrs. Allan, the good housekeeper, who, with the reverent attention which is usually rendered to the clerk in Scotland, was on the watch for his return, called for some of the grace. "Why, Sampson," Sampson, is waw than ever!—ye'll really do yourself some injury w thae lang fasts—naething's soe hurtful to the stomach, Mr. Sampson—if ye would but put a few of the game bricks in your or let Bernes cut ye an Sabbath.

"Avid thee!" quoth the Dominie, his mind run-ing still upon his interview with Meg Merrilies, and making for the dining parlour.
"Na, ye needs gang in there, the cloth's been removed, an hour or two, an' the Colonel's at his wine; but just awa', laddie, let the go'laud, 'tis the a'it, an' the cook will do in a moment."

"Exorcise it!" said Sampson, "that is, I have din'd!"

"Dined! it's impossible—who can ye has dined wi', you that gangs out nae gate?"

"With Beelzebub, I believe," said the minister.

"Na, then he's bewitched for'ard again," said the housekeeper, getting her hold; "he's bewitched, or he's daft, and ony way the Colonel maun just guide him his ain gate—Woo's me! Ho! aye! It's a sair thing to see learning bring folk to this!" And with this opinion of private execution, she retired into her own premises.

The object of her commissieion had by this time entered the dining parlour, where his appearance gave great surprise. He was mud up to the shoulders, and the natural paleness of his hue was twice as cadaverous as usual, through terror, fatigue, and perturbation of mind. "What on earth is the meaning of this, Mr. Sampson?" said Manning, who observed Miss Bertram looking much alarmed for her simple but attached friend.

"Exorcise it," said the Dominie.

"I can do it," replied the astonished Colonel.

"I crave pardon, honourable sir! but my wits!—" Are gone a wool-gathering, I think—pray, Mr. Sampson, collect yourself, and let me know the matter."

Sampson was about to reply, but finding his Latin formula of exorcism still came most readily to his tongue, he俨erently desired from the attempt, and put the sheets of paper which he had received from the spay into Manning's hand, who broke the seal and read it with surprise. "This seems to be some jest," he said, "and a very dull one."

"It came from no jesting person," said Mr. Sampson.

"From whom then did it come?" demanded Manning.

The Dominie, who often displayed some delicacy of recollection in cases where Miss Bertram had an interest, remembered the painful circumstances, connected with Meg Merrilies, looked at the young ladies, and remained silent. "We will join you at the tea-table in an instant, Julia," said the Colonel; "I see that Mr. Sampson wishes to speak to me alone."

"And now they are gone, what, in Heaven's name, Mr. Sampson? is the matter or will it pass?"

"It may be a message from Heaven," said the Dominie, "but it came by Beelzebub's postmiseress. It was that witch, Meg Merrilies, who should have been hanged within thirty years since, for a harlot, thief, witch, and gypsy."

"Are you sure it was she?" said the Colonel with great interest.

"Are you, honoured sir?—Of a truth she is one not to be forgotten—the like o' Meg Merrilies is not to be seen in any land."

The Colonel paced the room rapidly, contembling with himself. "To send out to apprehend her—" but it is too distant to send to Mac-Morlan, and Sir Robert Hazlewood is a pompous coxcomb; besides the chance of not finding her upon the spot, or that the lairder of silence that seized her before may again render her invisible—" He then obtained a sheet from a table neglect the course she points out. Many of her class have been set out by being impostors, and end by becoming enthusiasts, or hold a kind of darkling conduct between both limits of right, and almost when they are cheating themselves, or when imposing on others—"

"Well, my course is a plain one at any rate; and if my efforts are fruitless, it shall not be owing to over-tidiness of plan, or the making me on all occasions."

With these the bell rang, and ordering Barnes into his private sitting-room, gave him some orders, with the result of which the reader may be made acquainted; and then he had to turn his thoughts to other adventure, which is also to be woven into the story of this remarkable day.

Charles Hazlewood had not ventured to make a visit at Woodbourne during the absence of the Colonel. Indeed Manning's whole behaviour impressed upon him an opinion that this would be disadvantageable; and he regretted that the house should have a nice streak that the cook will do in a moment."

"Exorcise it!" said Sampson, "that is, I have din'd!"

"Dined! it's impossible—who can ye has dined wi', you that gangs out nae gate?"

"With Beelzebub, I believe," said the minister.

"Na, then he's bewitched for'ard again," said the housekeeper, getting her hold; "he's bewitched, or he's daft, and ony way the Colonel maun just guide him his ain gate—Woo's me! Ho! aye! It's a sair thing to see learning bring folk to this!" And with this opinion of private execution, she retired into her own premises.

The object of her commissieion had by this time entered the dining parlour, where his appearance gave great surprise. He was mud up to the shoulders, and the natural paleness of his hue was twice as cadaverous as usual, through terror, fatigue, and perturbation of mind. "What on earth is the meaning of this, Mr. Sampson?" said Manning, who observed Miss Bertram looking much alarmed for her simple but attached friend.

"Exorcise it," said the Dominie.

"I can do it," replied the astonished Colonel.

"I crave pardon, honourable sir! but my wits!—" Are gone a wool-gathering, I think—pray, Mr. Sampson, collect yourself, and let me know the matter."

"Well, my course is a plain one at any rate; and if my efforts are fruitless, it shall not be owing to over-tidiness of plan, or the making me on all occasions."

With these the bell rang, and ordering Barnes into his private sitting-room, gave him some orders, with the result of which the reader may be made acquainted; and then he had to turn his thoughts to other adventure, which is also to be woven into the story of this remarkable day.

Charles Hazlewood had not ventured to make a visit at Woodbourne during the absence of the Colo-which was the line that Glossin patronised, assured his friend it should be his fault if his father did not come along with another of that kind. But these various interruptions consumed the morning. Hazlewood got on horseback at least three hours later than he intended, and, curving fine ladies, pointers, pause-pigeon shots, and all the picturesque elements of parliamentary business, detained beyond the time when he could, with propriety, intrude upon the family at Woodbourne.

He had passed, therefore, the turn on the road which led to that mansion, only shielded by the distant appearance of the blue smoke, curling against the pale sky of the winter evening, when he thought he beheld the Duchess taking a footpath for the house through the park. He got off his horse to let for his honest gentleman, never the most susceptible of extraneous impressions, had just that moment parted from Meg Merrilies, and was too deeply wrapp'd up in pondering upon her vaccinations, to make any answer to Hazlewood's call. He was, therefore, obliged to let him proceed without inquiry after the health of the young ladies, or any other fishing question, to which he might, by good chance, have had an answer returned wherein Miss Bertram's name might have been mentioned. All cause for haste was now over, and, slackening the reins upon his horse's neck, he proceeded further. A low sound was heard in the steep sandy track between two high banks, which, rising to a considerable height, commanded, at length, an extensive view of the neighbouring country.

Hazlewood was, however, so far from eagerly looking forward to this prospect, though it had the recommendation, that great part of the land was his father's, and most necessaries of his business, that his head still turned backward towards the chimneys of Woodbourne, although at every step his horse made the difficulty of employing his eyes in that direction beyond greater. For a time, indeed, to such a degree as if he were drowned, he was suddenly roused by a voice too harsh to be called female, yet too shrill for a man:—"What's kept you on the road so late, my good fellow do your work, he looked up: the speakwoman was very tall, had a voluminous handkerchief rolled round her head, grizzled hair flowing in Ellen's from beneath it, a long red cloak, and a staff in her hand, headed with a sort of spear-point—it was, in short, Meg Merrilies. Hazlewood had never seen this remarkable figure before: he drew up his reins in astonishment at her appearance, and was at first taken aback, considering she, they that have seen interest in the house of Ellangowan mild sleep nan's this night; three men has been seeking ye, and you gaun hame to sleep in; and there's not the lad-barn's fa's, the master will do weel, na, na?"

"I don't understand you, good woman," said Hazlewood; "If you speak of Miss—I mean of any of the late Ellangowan family, tell me what I can do for them."

"Of the late Ellangowan family? she answered with great vehemence:—of the late Ellangowan family, and when there was ever, or when there will ever be, a family of Ellangowan, but bearing the gallant name of the bold Bertrams?"

"But what do you mean, good woman?"

"If they had been good women, the country knew I am bad enough, and baith they and I may be sorry enough that I am nac better. But I can do what good women canna, and daura do. I can do what would freeze the blood 'em that is bred in big waist's for nothing but to bind bairn's liceca, and to help them in the cradle. Here me—the guard's drawn off the Custom-house at Portanferry, and it's brought up to the Custom-house at Portanferry by order of the steward. Because he thinks his house is to be attacked this night by the smugglers;—there's nobody means to touch his house, his nac gude blood and gentle blood—I say like as nae, the poor, but that the buoy is him worth meddling wi'. Send the horses back to their post, canny and quietly; see an they winna have the work, what they will, the guns will flash and the heads will drop in the boat moon."

"Good God! what do you mean?" said young Hazlewood; "your words and manner would persuade me you are nac mad, but there is a strange combination in what you say."

"I am not mad!" exclaimed the piggy; "I have been imprisoned for mad—accursed for mad—banished for mad—but mad I am not. Hear ye, Charles Hazlewood of Hazlewood-house: d'ye bear malice against him that wounded you?"

"No, dame, God forbid; my arm is quite well, and I have always said the shot was discharged by accident. I should be glad to tell the young man so himself."

"Then do what I bid ye," answered Meg Merrilies, and ye'll do him nac gude than ever he did you; for besides that he be a bloody corpse are morn, or a banished man—but there's ane shone a'.—Do as I bid you; send back the soldiers to Portanferry. There's nac more fear of Hazlewood-house than there's o' Cruflit-fell. And she vanished with her usual celerity of pace.

It would seem that the appearance of this female, and the mixture of frenzy and enthusiasm in her manner, seldom failed to produce the strongest impression upon those whom she addressed. Her words, though wild, were too plain and intelligible for actual madness, and yet too vehement and extraordinary for the tone of a madwoman. She was clearly acting under the influence of an imagination rather strongly excited than deranged; and it was wonderful how palpably the difference, in such cases, is impressed upon the mind of the auditor. This may account for the attention with which her strange and mysterious hints were heard and acted upon. It is certain, at least, that young Hazlewood was strongly impressed by her sudden appearance and imperative voice. He rode to Hazlewood at a brisk pace. It had been dark for some time before he reached the house, and on his arrival there, he saw a confirmation of what the sibyl had predicted.

Thirty dragoon horses stood under a shed near the offices, with their bridles linked together. Three of four soldiers attended as a guard, while others stemmed up and down with their lances and heavy boots in front of the house. Hazlewood asked a non-commissioned officer from whence they came.

"From Portanferry."

"Had they left any guard there?"

"No; they had been drawn off by order of Sir Robert Hazlewood for defence of his house, against an attack which was threatened by the smugglers."

"Charles Hazlewood," said Sir Robert, "and, having paid his respects to him upon his return, requested to know upon what account he had thought it necessary to send for a military escort. You are my son in law, you know, by the information, intelligence, and tidings, which had been communicated to, and laid before him, he had the deepest reason to believe, credit, and be convinced that a riotous assault would that night be attempted and perpetrated against Hazlewood-house, by a set of smugglers, gipsies, and other desperadoes."

"And what, my dear sir," said his son, "should direct the fury of such persons against ours rather than any other house in the country?"

"I should rather think, suppose, and be of opinion, sir," answered Sir Robert, "with deference to your wisdom and experience, that on those occasions and times, the vengeance of such persons is directed against the most important and distinguished in point of rank, talent, birth, and situation, who have checked, interfered with, and discouraged their unlawful and illegal and criminal actions and deeds."

Young Hazlewood, who knew his father's table, answered, and by his side, in the Custom-house where Sir Robert apprehended, but that he only wondered they should think of attacking a house where there were so many servants, and where a signal was given to the neighbors the moment any suspicious assistance; and indeed, though he doubted much whether the reputation of the family would not in some degree suffer from calling soldiers from their duty at the Custom-house, to protect them, as if they were sufficiently strong to defend themselves upon any tion. He even hinted, that in case their ies should observe that this precaution unneccessarily, there would be no end sen.
Hawleywood was rather puzzled at this

"It is indeed the duty of my office," said Mac-Morlan, who waited with impatience an opportu-ity to speak, "that makes me seem underhand.
"No intrusion!" reiterated the Baronet, gracefully waving his hand.
"But permits me to say, Sir Robert," said the Sheriff-substitute, "I do not come with the purpose of remaining here, but to recall these soldiers to Por-tanferry, and to assure you that I will answer for the safety of your house.
"To withdraw the guard from Hawleywood-house!" exclaimed the proprietor in mingled displeasure and surprise: "and you will be answerable for it! And, pray, who are you, sir, that should take your security, and caution, and pledge, official or personal, for the safety of Hawleywood-house? and what do believe, sir, and am of opinion, sir, that if any one of these family pictures were deranged, or destroyed, or injured, it would be difficult for me to make up the losses upon the guarantee which you so obligingly offer me."
"In that case I shall be sorry for it, Sir Robert," answered the downright Mac-Morlan; "but I presume I may escape the pain of telling you the cause of such irreparable loss, as I can assure you there will be no attempt upon Hawleywood-house whatever, and I have received information which includes that the name was put, and that merely in order to occasion the removal of the soldiers from Portanferry. And under this strong belief and conviction, I must exert my authority as sheriff and chief magistrate of police, and the whole or greater part of them, back again. I regret much, that by my accidental absence, a good deal of delay has already taken place, and we shall not now reach Portanferry until it is late."
"As Mr. Mac-Morlan was the superior magistrate, and expressed himself peremptory in the purpose of acting as such, the Baronet, though highly offended, could only say: "Very well, sir, it is very well, but, sir, take them all with my leave — I am far from desiring to be left here, sir. We, sir, can protect ourselves, sir. But you will have the goodness to observe, sir, that you are acting on your own proper
, sir, and peril, sir, and responsibility, sir, if any thing shall happen or befall to Hawleywood-house, sir, or the inhabitants, sir, or to the furniture and paintings,
sir."
"I am acting to the best of my judgment and in formation, Sir Robert," said Mac-Morlan, "and must pray of you to believe so, and to pardon me accordingly. I beg you to observe it is no time for ceremony — it is already very late."
But Sir Robert, without deigning to listen to his apologies, immediately employed himself with much parade in arming and arraying his domestics. Charles Hawleywood longed to accompany the military, which were about to depart for Portanferry, and which were now drawn up and mounted by direction and under the guidance of Mr. Mac-Morlan, as the civil magistrate. But it would have given just pain and offence to his father to have left him at a moment when he conceived himself and his mansion-house in danger.
Young Hawleywood therefore gazed from a window with suppressed regret and displeasure, until he heard the officer give the word of command to fire the right to the front, by files, m-a-r-ch. Leading file, to the right wheel — Troth." — The whole party of soldiers then getting into a sharp and uniform pace, were soon lost among the trees, and the noise of the hoofs died speedily away in the distance.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

We return to Portanferry, and to Bertram, and his honest-hearted friend, whom we left most innocent inhabitants of a place built for the glories.
siders of the farmers were as sound as it was possible.

Bertram's first heavy sleep passed away long before midnight, nor could be again recover that state of oblivion. Added to the uncertain and uncomfortable state of his mind, his body felt feverish and oppressed. Though only thirty minutes behind theCustom-house, there was a sort of contained air of the small apartment in which they slept. After enduring for some time the broiling and suffocating feeling attendant upon such an atmosphere, poor Bertram was too hot to leave the window to the apartment, and thus to procure a change of air. Alias! the trial reminded him that he was in jail, and that the building being contrived for security, not comfort, the meager, purring fresh air was not left at the disposal for the use of that room.

Disappointed in this attempt, he stood by the unmanageable window for some time. Little Wasp, though oppressed with the fatigue of his journey on the preceding day, crept out of bed after his master, and stood by him rubbing his sluggish coat against his legs, and expressing, by a murmuring sound, the delight which he felt at being restored to him. Thus occupied, he was in a bordering condition. Feeling which at present agitated his blood should subside into a desire for warmth and slumber, Bertram remained for some time looking out upon the sea.

The sun had set, and the large horse was now in the hovel and near below the base of the building. Now and then a large wave reached even the barrier or bulwark which defended the foundation of the house, and would roll out of the hovel and make the horse more than those which only broke upon the sand. Far in the distance, under the indistinct light of a hazy and often over-clouded moon, the ocean rolled its multitudes, its breakers, its tusks, its bar, its roar, its curving, its bursting, and mingling with each other.

"A wild and din spectacle," said Bertram to himself, "like those crossing tides of fate which have tossed me hither and thither. And now and then the light of hope and reparation. When will this uncertainty cease, and how soon shall I be permitted to look out for a tranquil home, where I may cultivate in quiet, and without dread and perplexity, those arts of peace from which my cares have been hitherto so forcibly diverted? The ear of Fancy, it is said, can di cover the voice of sounds and visions amid the bursting murmurs of the ocean; would that I could do, and that some siren or Proteus would arise from these billows, to unriddle for me the strange maze of fate in which I am so deeply entangled! Happy friend!" he said, looking at the bed where Dimont had deposited his bundle, "do you hear the now round of a healthy and thriving occupation! Thou canst lay them aside at pleasure, and enjoy the deep repose of body and mind which wholesome labour has given you, and which you have justly claimed, and which at this moment is within your reach."

At this moment his reflections were broken by little Wasp, who, attempting to spring up against the window, began to yelp and bark most furiously. The sound reached Dimont's ears, but without dispatating the illusian which had transported him from this wretched apartment to the free air of his own green hills. How? Yarrow, man—or yard—or yard—and not a word of his mouth, his voice, his greeting, doubtless, that he was calling to his sheep-dog, and hounding him in shepherds' phrase, against some intruders on the grazing. The continued barking of the dog made Bertram bloodless, and the sudden leige of the mastiff in the courtyard, which had for a long time been silent, excepting only an occasional short and deep note, uttered when the moon shone suddenly from among the clouds. Now, his clamour was continued and furious, and seemed to be excited by some disturbance distinct from the barking of Wasp, which had just given him the alarm, and which he had been induced to contrive into an angry note of low growing.

At last Bertram, whose attention was now fully awakened, conceived that he saw a boat upon the sea, and that its owner was endowed with more than common power. The moon, by making the shadows of different descriptions, some carrying lighted torches, others bearing packages and barrels down the lane to the boat that was lying at the quay, to which two or three other vessels were moored. They were loading each of them in their turn, and one or two had already put off to seaward. This speaks for itself," said Bertram; "but I four something worse has happened. Do you perceive a strong smell of smoke, or is it my fancy?"

"Fancy!" answered Dimmont, "there's a reek like a killogr. Odd, if they burn the Custom-house, it will catch here, and we'll lunt like a tar barrel!"  The grizzled head was lowered, and his voice attentive, as if he were expecting some event or news, like as if one had been a warlock! — Mac-Guffog, hear ye! — roaring at the top of his voice; "an ye wed ever had a hair bun in your skin, let's out..." muttered out.

The fire began now to rise high, and thick clouds of smoke rolled past the window, at which Bertram and Dimmont were stationed. Sometimes, as the wind was alight, they could discern everything from their sight; sometimes a red glare illuminated both land and sea, and shone full on the stern and fierce figures, who, wide with ferocious activity, were spread in a long line along the shore, and, length triumphant, and spotted in jets of flame at out each window of the burning building, while huge flares of flaming materials came driving on the wind against them. "Hagel and water, what is that?" exclaimed. The noly of smoke over all the neighbourhood. The shouts of a furious mob resounded far and wide; for the smugglers, in their triumph, were joined by all the rabble of the town and surrounding neighborhood, nobly incited, and in complete agitation, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour; some from interest in the free trade, and most from the general love of mischief and the lure of a vulgar passion.

Bertram began to be seriously anxious for their fate. There was no stir in the house; it seemed as if the jailer had deserted his charge, and left the house with its inmates to the mercy of the transported crew, which was spreading towards them. In the meantime a new and fierce attack was heard upon the outer gate of the Correction-house, which, battered with sledge-hammers and swords, was soon forced open, as great a cowardly display of strength as with his more ferocious wife, had failed; their servants readily surrendered the keys. The liberated prisoners, jubilating their deliverance with the wildest yells and shouting among the mob which had given them freedom.

In the midst of the confusion that ensued, three or four of the principal smugglers hurried to the apartment of Bertram with lighted torches, and armed with cutlasses and pistols. — Der devli, said the leader, here's our mark!" and two of them seized on Bertram; but one whispered in his ear, Make natural, and I will save you. The other put down his cutlass and pistols, reared and surrendered the keys. The liberated prisoners, jubilating their deliverance with the wildest yells and shouting among the mob which had given them freedom.

The signs of violence were heard in front. The press became furiously agitated, while we endeavoured to defend ourselves, others to escape; shots were fired, and the glittering broadswords of the dragoons began to appear flashing above the heads of the rioters. Now," said the warning whisper of the man who held Bertram's left arm, the same who had spoken before, "shame off that fellow, and follow me, we are entering his strength suddenly and effectually, easily burst from the grasp of the man who held his collar on the right side. The fellow attempted to draw a pistol, but was Blow on the head. Dimmont, an ox could hardly have received without the same humiliation. "Follow me quick," said the friendly partisan, and dived through a very narrow and dirty lane which led from the main street.

No pursuit took place. The attention of the smugglers had been otherwise and very disagreeably engaged by the sudden appearance of Mac-Morlan and the party of horse. The loud angry voice of the provincial magistrate, was heard proclaiming the riot not, and charging the crowd to disperse at their own proper peril. This interruption would indeed have happened in time sufficient to have prevented the attempt, had not the magistrate received upon the road some false information, which led him to think that the smugglers were to land at the Bay of Ellangowan. Nearly two hours were lost in consequence of this false intelligence, which it might have been in his power to suppress; but he was deeply interested in the issues of that night's daring attempt, and contrived to throw in Mac-Morlan's way, availing himself of the knowledge that the soldiers had some distance to travel, which would soon reach an ear so anxious as his.

In the mean time, Bertram followed his guide, and was in his turn followed by Dimmont. The shouts of a furious mob resounded far and wide; for the smugglers, in their triumph, were joined by all the rabble of the town and surrounding neighborhood, nobly incited, and in complete agitation, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour; some from interest in the free trade, and most from the general love of mischief and the lure of a vulgar passion.

But in spite of his charge, the two who held Bertram were the last of the party.

The signs of violence were heard in front. The press became furiously agitated, while we endeavoured to defend ourselves, others to escape; shots were fired, and the glittering broadswords of the dragoons began to appear flashing above the heads of the rioters. Now," said the warning whisper of the man who held Bertram's left arm, the same who had spoken before, "shame off that fellow, and follow me, we are entering his strength suddenly and effectually, easily burst from the grasp of the man who held his collar on the right side. The fellow attempted to draw a pistol, but was Blow on the head. Dimmont, an ox could hardly have received without the same humiliation. "Follow me quick," said the friendly partisan, and dived through a very narrow and dirty lane which led from the main street.

We must now return to Woodbourne, which, it may be remembered, we left just after the Colonel had given some directions to his servant. When he returned, his absence of mind, and an unusual expression of thought and anxiety upon his features, struck the ladies whom he joined in the drawing-room. Mannerings was not, however, a man to be questioned, even by those whom he most loved, upon the cause of the mental agitation which these signs expressed. The hour of tea arrived, and the party were partaking of that refreshment in the library, when a carriage drove up to the door; and the bell announced the arrival of a visitor. “Surely,” said Mannerings, “it is too soon by some hours.”

“Miss Lucy Bertram,” the porter exclaimed, opening the door of the saloon, announced Mr. Pleydell. In marched the lawyer, whose well-brushed black coat, and well-powdered wig, together with his point ruff, spoke for a gentleman who had no thought of paying a social call. His shoes were black, his face powdered, and gold buckles, exhibited the pains which the old gentleman had taken to prepare his person for the ladies’ society. He was welcomed by Mannerings with a hearty grip by the hand. Barnes, opening the door, said, “The very man I wished to see at this moment!”

“Yes,” said the counsellor, “I told you I would take the first opportunity so I have ventured to leave the house, Miss Lucy, and ask you to tea, and inform you of the sacrifice—but I had a notion I could be useful, and I was to attend a proof here at some time at the same time. But will you not introduce me to the young ladies?—Ah! there is a family likeness! Miss Lucy Bertram, my love, I am most happy to see you.”—And he folded her in his arms, and gave her a hearty kiss on each side of the face. "”On n’ oubte pas dans un si beau chemin,” continued the gay old gentleman, and, as the Colonel presented him to Julia, took the same liberty with that fair lady as with Miss Lucy, and laughed, and said, engaged herself. “I beg a thousand pardons,” said the lawyer, with a bow which was not at all professional awkward; “age and old fashion gives privilege, and my society, at least, is most soothing, just now at being too well entitled to claim them at all, or happy in having such an opportunity to exercise them so agreeably.”

“By my word, sir,” said Miss Mannerings, laughing, “if you make such flattering apologies, we shall begin to doubt whether we can admit you to shelter yourself under your alleged qualifications.”

“I can assure you, Julia,” said the Colonel, “you are perfectly right; my friend the counsellor is a dangerous person; the last time I had the pleasure of seeing him, he was clasped with a fair lady, who had signed him a fat-o’-the-eight at eight in the morning.”

“Indeed,” said Colonel, as the counsel, but you should add, I was more indebted to my chocolate than my charms for so distinguished a favour, from a person of such propriety of demeanour as Miss Rebecca.”

“And that should remind me, Mr. Pleydell,” said Julia, “to offer you tea—that is supposing you have dined.”

“Any thing, Miss Mannerings, from your hands,” answered the gallant jurisconsult; “yes, I have dined, that is to say, as people dine at a Scotch inn.”

And that is indifferently enough, said the Colonel, upon the bell-handle: “give me leave to order something.”

“Why, to say truth,” replied Mr. Pleydell, “I had rather not: I have been inquiring into that matter, for you must know I stood an instant below to pull off my boot-hose, ‘a world too wide for my shrunk shoes,”’ glancing down with some complacency upon limbs which looked very well for his time of life, and I had some conversation with your Barnes, and a very intelligent person whom I presume to be the housekeeper; and it was settled among us—tota re perspecta—I beg Miss Mannerings’ pardon for my Latin—that the old lady should add to your light family-supper the most substantial refreshment of a brace of wild-ducks. I told her (always under deep submission) my poor thoughts about the sauce, which coincided exactly with her own; and, if you please, I would rather wait till they are ready before eating anything solid.”

And we will anticipate our usual hour of supper,” said the Colonel.

“With all my heart,” said Pleydell, “providing I do not lose the ladies’ company a moment the sooner. I am of counsel with my old friend Burnet: I love the house, I love the people, and the inmates.”

*The Burnet, whose taste for the evening meal of the ancients is quoted by Mr. Pleydell, was the celebrated metaphysician and excellent man, Lord Montesquieu, whose care will not be soon forgotten by those who have shared his classic hospitable meal and social glass that wash out of one’s mind the cobwebs, that business or gloom have spun in one’s life during the day.”

The vivacity of Mr. Pleydell’s look and manners, and the quickness with which he made himself at home on the subject of his little epicurean connoisseurs, was observed by the young Miss Mannerings, who immediately gave the counsellor a great deal of flattering attention; and more pretty things were said on both sides during the service of the tea-table than we have space by, to repeat.

As soon as this was over, Mannerings led the counsellor by the arm into a small study which opened from the saloon, and where, according to the custom of the family, there were always lights and a good fire in the evening.

“I see,” said Mr. Pleydell, “you have got something to tell me about the Illawongan business—it is quite a fat-o’-the-eight by the way. I have consulted your Ephemerides, your Almachozen, your Almheiten.”

“No, thank you,” replied Mannerings, “you are the only Tyrole I intend to resort to upon the present occasion—a second Prospero, I have broken my staff, and frowned my book far beyond plums and wine.”

“Ah, my dear,” said Colonel, “Meg Merriles, our Egyptian sibyl, has appeared to the Dominie this very day, and, as I conjecture, has frightened the honest man not a little.”

“I see,” replied Mannerings, “you have got something to tell me about the Illawongan business—it is quite a fat-o’-the-eight by the way. I have consulted your Ephemerides, your Almachozen, your Almheiten.”

“Read aloud,” said Mannerings.

“I will try,” answered the lawyer. ""You are a good seeker, but a bad finder; you set yourself to prop a fat-o’-the-eight, but had a gay, gussy way to rise again. Lend your hand to the work that’s near, as you lent your e to the weird that was far. How a carriage this night by ten o’clock, at the end of the Crooked Thikes at Porkenberry, and let it bring the folk to Woodbourne that shall ask them, if they be in God’s name.”—Stay, here follows some poetry—

"Dusk shall be light, And wrong done to right, When Bertram’s right and Bertram’s might Shall bow Illawongans at the feet of right."

A most mystic epistle truly, and closes in a vein of poetry worthy of the Cumanean sibyl—And what have you done?”

“Why,” said Mannerings, rather reluctantly, “I was both to risk and opportunity of throwing light on this business. The woman is perhaps crazed, and these effusions may arise only from visions of her imagination; but you were of opinion that she knew more of that strange story than she ever told.”

“And so,” said Pleydell, “you sent a carriage to the place named?”

“You will laugh at me if I own I did,” replied the Colonel.

“Who, I?” replied the advocate. “No, truly I think it was the wisest thing you could do.”

"Yes," answered Mannering, well pleased to have escaped the ridicule he apprehended; "you know the worst is paying the chaise-hire—I sent a post-chaise for you yesterday. I was determined to correspond to the letter—the horses will have a long and cold station on the outpost to night if our intelligence be false."

"But I think it will prove otherwise," said the lawyer. "This woman has played a part till she believes it; or, if she be a thorough-paced impostor, without a single grain of self delusion, to quarrel with her for an act of being so blind to act in character—this I know, that I could get nothing out of her by the common modes of interrogation, and the wisest thing we can do is to give her an opportunity of making the discovery her own way. And now have you more to say, or shall we go to the ladies?"

"Why, my mind is uncommonly agitated," answered Julia, "I supposed—" the more experienced lawyer—"I am much interested certainly, but I think I shall be able to survive the interval, if the ladies will afford us some music."

"I think we may be in a little of the wild-ducks, by and by?" suggested Mannering.

"True, Colonel; a lawyer's anxiety about the fate of the most interesting cause has seldom spoiled either appetite or climate. And yet I shall be very eager to hear the rattle of those wheels on their return, notwithstanding."

So saying, he rose, and led the way into the next room, where Miss Mannering, at his request, took her seat at the harpsichord. Lucy Bertram, who sung her native melodies very sweetly, was accompanied by her friend upon the instrument, and Julia afterwards performed some of Scarlatti's sonatas with such discrimination as to make the listeners feel little upon the violincello, and being a member of the gentlewomen's in concert in Edinburgh, was so greatly delighted with this mode of spending the evening, that I dare say that some of the wild-ducks until Barnes informed the company that supper was ready.

"Tell Mrs. Allen to have something in readiness," said the Colonel. "I expect that is, I hope—perhaps some savoury entrée to come. And let the men sit up, and do not lock the upper gate on the lawn until I desire you."

"Lord, sir," said Julia, "whom can you possibly expect to come tonight?"

"Why, some persons, strangers to me, talked of calling in the evening on business," answered her father, "but without embarrassment, for he would have little conversation which would have thrown ridicule on his judgment;—it is quite certain."

"Well, we shall not pardon them for disturbing our party. We like to have our galantry to conduct her into a dinner, "the time has been—when I returned from Utrecht in the year 1739."

"Pray don't talk of it;" answered the young lady, "I never eat supper without the company of your presence; and as such alterations, as my friend and admirer, for so he has dubbed himself, Mr. Pleydell."

"Ah, Miss Julia," said Pleydell, offering his arm with an air of gallantry to conduct her into a dining room, "the time has been—since I returned from Utrecht in the year 1739."

"I dare say you have spent all the intervening years in getting rid so completely of the effects of your Dutch education."

"O forgive me, Miss Mannering," said the lawyer; "the Dutch are a much more accomplished people in point of gallantry than their volatile neighbours are willing to admit. They are constant as clock work in their attentions."

"I should think so," said Julia. "Imperturbable in their good temper," continued Pleydell.

"Worse and worse," said the young lady. "And then," said the old man, "although for six times three hundred and sixty-five days, your swain has placed the capuchin round your neck, and the stove under your feet, and driven your little sledge upon the ice in winter, and your carriage in dusty summer, you may dismiss him at once, without reason or apology, upon the two thousand one hundred and ninetieth day, which, according to my hasty calculation, a without raking keenly, will complete the cycle of the supposed adoration, and that without your amiable feelings having the slightest occasion to be alarmed for the consequences to those of us."

"Well," replied Julia, "that last is truly a Dutch recommendation. Mr. Pleydell—crystal and hearts would lose all their merit in the world, if it were not for their fragility, and that last is truly a Dutch recommendation. Mr. Pleydell—crystal and hearts would lose all their merit in the world, if it were not for their fragility.

"Well, upon that point of the argument, Miss Mannering, it is as difficult to find a heart that will break, as a glass that will not; and for that reason I think we would part."

"I think, Colonel," said Mr. Mannering, "I have a formable rival to day, and I have been on the very first night of his avowed admiration."

"Pardon me, my fair lady," answered the counselour, "your avowed rigour alone has induced me to commit the follies of eating a good supper in your presence; how shall I support your frowns without reinforcing my strength? Upon the same principle, and no other, I will ask permission to drink wine with you."

"This is the fashion of Utrecht also," I suppose, Mr. Pleydell?"

"Forgive me, madam," answered the counselour, "the French Court, for instance,--" the galant term their tavern-keepers restaurateurs, alluding, doubtless, to the relief they afford the disconsolate lover, when bowed down to the earth by his mistress's anger; and the more so, as they often, in relief, that I must trouble you for that other wing, Mr. Sampson, without prejudice to my afterwards applying to Miss Bertram for a tart—be pleased to tear the wing, sir, instead of cutting it off. Mr. Barnes will assist you, Mr. Sampson, thank you, sir—and, Mr. Barnes, a glass of ale, if you please."

While the old gentleman, pleased with Miss Mannering's vivacity and attention, ratted away for her amusement and his own, the impatience of Colonel Mannering begain to exceed all bounds. He declined sitting down at table, under pretence that he never eat supper; and traversed the parlour, in which they were, with hasty and impatient steps, now throwing up the window to gaze upon the dark lawn, now listening for the remote sound of the carriage advancing upon the avenue. At length, in a feeling of uncontrollable impatience, he left the room, took his hat and cloak, and pursued his walk up the avenue, as if his so doing would hasten the approach of those whom he desired to see. After a time, he was joined by Miss Bertram. "Colonel Mannering would not venture out after night-fall. You must have heard, Mr. Pleydell, what a cruel fright we had."

"O, with the usual reply of the advocate—"they are old friends of mine, he meant the means of bringing some of us to justice, a long time since when sheriff of this county."
"And then the alarm we had immediately afterwards, added Miss Bertram, from the vengeance of one of those watchmen."

"When young Hazelwood was hurt—I heard of that too."

"Imagine, my dear Mr. Pleydell," continued Lucy, "how much Miss Mannering and I were alarmed, with Julia, when we heard the noise. He has got such a voice in the country, and he was there, and he knew us."

"If I thought, Mr. Pleydell," said Mr. Dabney, "I should be in some danger—"

"What is that book you hold in your hand, Mr. Sampson?"

"You know the learned Dr. Lyra, sir—" I would crave his honour Mr. Pleydell's judgment, always with his best leisure, to expand a disputed passage."

"I am not in the vein, Mr. Sampson," answered Dr. Lyra, "but I will not despair to engage these two young ladies in a glee or a catch, wherein I, even myself, will adventure myself for the base part—Hang Dr. Lyra, man; keep him for a litter season."

"The distinguished Dominie shut his ponderous tome, much musing in his mind how a person, possessed of the lawyer's erudition, could give his mind to these frivolous toys. But the counsellor, indifferent to the high character for learning which he was sitting up, filled himself a large glass of burgundy, and after precluding a little with a voice somewhat the worse for the wear, gave the ladies a outrageous invitation to heay the piece in a manner which he accomplished his own part therein with great eclat."

"Are you not withering your roses with sitting up so late, my young ladies?" said the Colonel.

"But that instant the musical trial of skill, and that to lively conversation. At length, when the solitary sound of one o'clock had long since resounded on the ebon ear of night, and the next signal of the advance of time was closed up, the counsellor, whose impatience had long subsided into disappointment and despair, looked at his watch, and said, "We must now give them up"—when at that instant—but what then befell will require a separate chapter.

\textbf{Justice.} This does indeed confirm each circumstance.

\textbf{No orphan, nor without a friend at all.}"

\textbf{I am thy father, here's thy mother, there.}"

\textbf{This is my cousin, and these are my near relations.}"

\textbf{As Mannering replaced his watch, he heard a distant and hollow sound—"It is a carriage for certain—and seeming of the wind among the leafless trees. Do come to the window, Mr. Pleydell."

\textbf{The counsellor, who, with his large silk handkerchief in his hand, was expatiating away to Julia upon some subject which he thought was interesting, obeyed, however, the summons, first wrapping the handkerchief round his neck by way of precaution against the possibility of the wind. The sound of the carriage was now very perceptible, and Pleydell, as if he had reserved all his curiosity till that moment, ran out to the hall. The Colonel ran for Bertram to desire that the person should be instantly admitted into a separate room, being altogether uncertain whom it might contain. It stopped, however, at the door, before his purpose could be fully explained. A moment after, Mr. Pleydell called out, "Here's our Liddesdale friend, I protest, with a strapping young fellow of the same calibre." His voice arrested D'Imont, who recognised him with equal surprise and pleasure. "Well, if it is their lawyer, it is right and just as thick and rare can make us.""

But while the farmer stopped to make his bow, Bertram, dizzied with the sudden glare of light, and his eyes habituated to the scene, already half unconscious entered the open door of the parlour, and confronted the Colonel, who was just advancing towards it. The strong light of the apartment lent a different aspect to the man who had beheld her lover in a most peculiar and hazardous situation; and Lucy Bertram at once knew the person who had fired upon young Hazelwood. Bertram, who interested in the fixed and the unchangeable person of the Colonel into displeasure at his intrusion, hastened to say that it was involuntary, since he had been hurried hither without even knowing whether he was to be allowed to see his lady, and if he was, he would not know her with the advantage of his character, as a gentleman and man of honour."

"Mr. Brown—have I been seldom—never so much surprised at your visit, gentlemen, in an interview, have you a right to command my favourable testimony."

At this critical moment entered the counsellor and D'Imont. The former beclouded to his astonishment, the Colonel but just recovering from his first surprise, Lucy Bertram ready to faint with terror, and Miss Mannering in an agony of doubt and apprehension, both of which she communicated to her counsellor. "What is the meaning of all this?" said he; "has this young fellow brought the Gorgon's head in his hand—let me look at him—By heaven! he muttered to himself, "the very same as old Flagonwan!—Yes, the same manly form and handsome features, but with a world of more intelligence in the face—Yes!—the witch has kept her word." Then instantly turning to Lucy, "Mr. Bertram, my dear; have you never seen any one like him?"

Lucy had only ventured one glance at this object of terror, by which, however, from his remarkable height and appearance, she at once recognised the supposed assassin of young Hazelwood; a conviction which excluded, of course, the more favourable association of ideas which might have occurred on a closer view. "Don't ask me about him, sir," said she, turning away her eyes; "send him away, for heaven's sake! we shall all be murdered." "Murder! there's the poker?" said the advocate in some alarm; "but nonsense! we are three besides the servants, and there is honest Liddesdale worth half-a-dozen to boot—we have the major up upon our side—however, here's my friend Dabney-Do—" vie—what do they call you?—keep between that fellow and us for the protection of the ladies."

"Lord! Mr. Plydell," said the astonished farmer, "it's Captain Brown! d'ye no ken the Captain?"

"No, but I'm greatly honored, we may be said of enough," answered Plydell; "but keep near them!"

All this passed with such rapidity, that it was over before the Domine had recovered himself from a fit of absence, shut the book which he had been studying in a corner, and advancing to obtain a sight of the strangers, exclaimed at once, upon beholding Bertram, "If the grave can give up the dead, that is my kind and honored master!"

"We're right after all, by Heaven! I was sure I was right," said the lawyer; "he is the very image of his father. Come, Colonel, what do you think of that, you do not bid your guest welcome? I think—I believe—I trust we're right—never saw such a like-ness!—But patience—Domine, say not a word.—Sit down, young gentleman."

I beg pardon, sir; if I am, as I understand, in Colonel Mannersing's house, I should wish first to know if my accidental appearance here gives offense, or if I am welcome?"

"The young gentleman made an effort. "Welcome? most certainly, especially if you can point out how I can serve you. I believe I may have some wrongs to repair towards you—I have often suspected so; but I have no evidence. In any case, connected with painful recollections, prevented my saying at first, as I now say, that whatever has procured me the honour of this visit, it is an acceptable one to me."

Bertram bowed with an air of dignified, yet civil acknowledgment, to the grave courtesy of Mannersing. "Julia, my love, you had better retire. Mr. Brown, you will excuse us. I can sit better there, where there are circumstances which I perceive rush upon her recollection."

Miss Mannersing rose and retired accordingly; yet, as she passed Bertram, could not suppress the words, "He is a noble youth—" but no more, and went on Caf-proof of his два, to be heard by him alone. Miss Mannersing accompanied her friend, much surprised, but without venturing a second glance at the object of her terror. Some mistakes she saw there was, and was unwilling to increase it by denouncing the stranger as an assassin. He was known, she saw, to the Colonel, and received as a gentleman; certainly he either was not the person she suspected. Hazledown was right in supposing the shot accidental.

The remaining part of the company would have formed no bad group for a skilful painter. Each was lost in his own world, awed by the unusual situation of observing the others of the strangers. Bertram most unexpectedly found himself in the house of one, whom he was alternately disposed to dislike as his personal enemy, and to admire; but he was unwilling to be heard by him alone. Miss Mannersing was struggling between his high sense of courtesy and hospitality, his joy at finding himself relieved from the guilt of having shed life in a private quarrel, and the former feelings of dislike and prejudice, which revived in his heart, and raised at the sight of the object against whom he had entertained them; Sampson, supporting his shaking limbs by leaning on the back of his chair, fixed his eyes upon Bertram, with a strained expression of nervous anxiety which convulsed his whole visage; Dinmont, enveloped in his loose shaggy great-coat, and resembling a huge bear erect upon his hinder legs, stared on the whole scene with great round eyes that witnessed his amazement.

The counselor alone was in his element, shrived, prompt, and active; he already calculated the prospect of increased income, the flutterings of interest, eventful, and mysterious law-suit, and no young monarch, flushed with hopes, and at the head of a gallant army, might experience more gloe when taking the field on his first campaign. And he had energy, and it took the arrangement of the whole explanation upon himself.

"Come, come, gentlemen, sit down; this is all in my province; you must let me arrange it for you. Sit down, my dear Colonel, and let me manage; sit down, Mr. Brown, and guacumia also nominate voca-

- Domine, take your seat; draw in your chair, honest Liddesdale."

"I dinna ken, Mr. Plydell," said Dinmont, looking at his dazed-looking coat, then at the handsome furnitures, we may be said of some sort, and some gate else; and have ye till your cracks—I'm no just that well put on.

The Colonel, who by this time recognized Dandie, immediately went up and bid him heartily welcome; assuring him, that from what he had seen of him in Edinburgh, he was sure his rough coat and thick-soled boots would honour a royal drawing-room.

"Na, na, Colonel, we're just plain up-country folk; but nae doubt I would fear hear o' any pleasure that was gaun to happen the Captain, and I'm sure I will gas right if Mr. Plydell will take his bit job in hand."

"You're right, Dandie; spoke like a Hieland orake—and now be silent. Well, you are all seated at last; take a glass of wine till I begin my cateschism methodically. And now," turning to Bertram, "my dear boy, do you know who or what you are?"

In spite of his perplexity, the catechumen could not help laughing over his own former pronounced words. "Indeed, sir, I formerly thought I did; but I own late circumstances have made me somewhat uncertain."

"Then tell us what you formerly thought yourself."

"Why, I was in the habit of thinking and calling myself Vanbeest Brown, who served as a cadet or volunteer under Colonel Mannersing when he commanded the regiment, in which capacity I was not unknown to him."

"There," said the Colonel, "I can assure Mr. Brown of his identity; and add, what his modesty may have forgotten, he was distinguished as a young man of talent and spirit."

"So much the better, my dear sir," said Mr. Plydell; but that is to general character—Mr. Brown must tell you what he was born.

"In Scotland, I believe, but the place uncertain."

"Where educated?"

"In Holland, certainly."

"Do you remember nothing of your early life before you left Scotland?"

"Very imperfectly; yet I have a strong idea, perhaps more deeply impressed upon me by subsequent hand usage, that I was during my childhood under the guard of much solicitude and affection. I have an indistinct remembrance of a good-looking man whom I used to call papa, and a lady who was infirm of body, but a person of very amiable countenance and temper; but it is an imperfect and confused recollection. I remember too a tall thin kind-tempered man in black, who used to teach me my letters and walk out with me."

"That is that," said Bertram; "and that is the voice the figure of my kind old master."

The Domine throw himself into his arms, pressed him a thousand times to his bosom in convulsion of transports, which a whole flock of bobbies shook hypocritically, and, at length, in the emphatic language of Scripture, lifted up his voice and went aloft. Colonel Mannersing had recourse to his handkerchief; Plydell mopped his swelled eyes, and wiped the glass of his spectacles; and honest Dinmont, after two loud blubbering explosions, exclaimed. "Deil's in the man! he's gair'd me do that I haen a done since my sauld mither died."

"No, no," said the councillor at last, "silence in the court. We have a clever party to contend with; we must lose no time in gathering our information—for any thing I know, there may be something more at stake than a man's life on the point of the sword."

"I will order a horse to be saddled, if you please," said the Colonel.

"No, no, time enough—time enough—but come, Dominie, you must express your feelings. I must circumscribe the term you must let me proceed in my examination."

The Dominie was habitually obedient to any one who called him Master. Thus, he sulked back into his chair, spread his checkered handkerchief over his face, to serve, as I suppose, for the Grecian painter's veil, and, from the action of his folded hands, he seemed involved with his own collections, expressing what could I do? I had no means of ascertaining my doubts, nor a single friend with whom I could communicate or canvass them. The rest of my story is known to the reader who has the misfortune to be a clerk in a Dutch house; their affairs fell in confusion—I betook myself to the military profession, and, I trust, as yet I have not disgraced it."

"Thoughts, as I have been told, are the servants of the affections—" said Pleydell, and since you have wanted father so long, I wish from my heart I could ease the paternity. But this affair of young Hazlewood—"

"Was merely accidental," said Bertram. "I was travelling in Scotland for pleasure, and after a week's residence with my friend, Mr. Dimmont, with whom I had the good fortune to form an accidental acquaintance with your cousin.""

"It was my guide fortune that," said Dimmont, "odd, my brains was hae been knockit out by the blackguard, if it hadn a been for his four quarreens.

"Shortly after we parted at the town of— I lost my baggage by thieves, and it was redig at Kippleringan I accidentally met the young gentleman; as I was approaching to pay my respects to your honouring, which I had known of. Mr. Hazlewood conceiving my appearance none of the most respectable, commanded me not. But as I was in the midst of my commission, I had the misfortune to be the victim in the domicile of wounding him. And now, as I have answered all your questions—"

"No, no, not quite all," said Pleydell, winking as gravely as if there were some inside joke which shall delay till to-morrow, for it is time, I believe, to close the sedentary for this night, or rather morning."

"Well, sir," said the young man, "to the phrasing of your letters I have answered some which you have chosen to ask to-night, will you so good as to tell me who are that such as are in my affairs, and whom you take me to be entertained by this missive?"

"Why, sir, for myself," replied the councillor, "I am Paulus Pleydell, an advocate at the Scottish bar, and for it is not easy to say distinctly who you are at present, but I trust in a short time to be the person by the title of Henry Bertram. Esq., representative of one of the oldest families in Scotland, and heir of their lands and house of Ellangowan, which you will find me to be the possessor of, as you are in the possession of the house, which fate has opened before you. I was in the early years of your life, and chanced to be your friend of Ellangowan as unexpectedly as you are now at mine. Meantime, I have been doing a man's work, and speaking to himself, "we must pass over his father and serve him heir to his grandfather Lewis, the elder—and his son, the only wise man of his family that I ever heard of."

They had now risen to retire to their apartments for the night, when Colonel Manciner, walking up to Bertram, as he stood astonish at the conspiracy of his words, said, "I give you joy," he said, of the prospects which fate has opened before you. I was an early friend of your father, and chanced to be your friend, and to be the house of Ellangowan as unexpectedly as you are now at mine. Meantime, I have been doing a man's work, and speaking to himself, "we must pass over his father and serve him heir to his grandfather Lewis, the elder—and his son, the only wise man of his family that I ever heard of."

"Can't you take another then?"

"Dinna ken—the money lond o' the place, the hide to put away the add

"What, not upon thy neighbour at Dawson-

"What, on Jock o' Dawson's? ho ha—he's a can-yet clueid, and fashions about marches, and

"Thou're an honest fellow," said the lawyer; "get

Dominie had once more hailed and embraced little Harry Brittim, as he continued to call young soldier of six feet high.

she said, in an interrupted, yet solemn voice, "is this my brother?"

"It is—it is—Miss Lucy, it is little Harry Bertram, as sure as God’s sun is in that heaven!"

"哦, John! you never knew how much you gave way to all that family affectation, which had so long slumbered in his bosom for want of an object to expand itself upon—"

"It is not—no, it is Miss Lucy Bertram," circumspect Sampson, "whom by my poor aid you will find perfect in the tongues of France, and Italy, and even of Spain—in reading and writing her vernacular tongue, and in arithmetic, and book-keeping by double and single entry—I say nothing of her talents of shaping and hemming, and governing a household, which, to give every one their due, she acquired not from me, but from the housekeeper—nor do I take merit for her."

"Julia Manning—hath not mainly contributed—" and all that remains to me!—Last night, but more fully this morning, Colonel Manning gave me an account of our exploits, though without saying I should find my sister here."

"That," said Lucy, "he left to this gentleman to tell you, one of the kindest and most faithful of friends. For my other friends, I rejoice, I have witnessed his dying moments, and amid the heaviest clouds of fortune would not desert his orphan."

"God bless him for it!" said Bertram, shaking the Duke's hand. "I do not despise the truth which I have always recorded even that dim and imperfect shadow of his memory which my childhood retained."

"And God bless you both, my dear children," said Sampson, as he clapped his hands, "I have always been contented that Heaven’s pleasure so been to lay my head upon the turf beside my patron."

"But I trust," said Bertram, "I am encouraged to hope shall all see better days. All our wrongs shall be redressed, since Heaven has sent me means and friends to assert my right."

"Friends indeed!" echoed the Dominie, "and sent, as you truly say, by Him, to whom I early taught you to look up as the source of all that is good. There is the great Colonel Manning from the Eastern Indies, a man of war from his birth upwards, but who is not the less a man of great erudition, con- sidering his station and the times; moreover, the great advocate Mr. Pleydell, who is also a man of great erudition, but who descended to trifle unbecoming thereof; and there is Mr. An- ders—"

"Yes, indeed, Dominie," I said, "I have had and hold to his present possession of much erudition, but who, like the patriarchy of old, is cunning in that which belongeth to flocks and herds—Lastly, there is even I myself, whose fortune will roll out greater names than those of the aforesaid valuable persons, have not, if it becomes me to speak, been pretermitted by me, in so far as my poor faculties have enabled me to profit by them. Of a surety, little Harry, we must specify resume our studies. I will begin from the foundation—Yes, I will reform your education upward from the true knowledge of Eng- lish, Latin, and Greek, to that of the Hebrew or Cau- dalic tongue."

The reader may observe, that, upon this occasion, Sampson was infinitely more profuse of words than he had hitherto exhibited himself. The reason was, that in recovering his pupil his mind went instantly back to their original connexion, and he had, in his confusion of ideas, the strongest desire in the world to resume such lessons and half-test with young Bertram. This was the more ridiculous, as towards Lucy he assumed no such powers of tuition. But she had grown up under his eye, and had been gradually emancipated from his government by increasing in knowledge and sense, and a sense of his own inferior tact in manners, whereas his first ideas went to take up Harry pretty nearly where he had left him. From the same feelings of reviving au- thority, he indulged himself in what was to him a profession of language; and as people seldom speak more than usual without exposing themselves, he gave those whom he addressed plainly to understand, that while he deferred implicitly to the opinions and commands, if they chose to disregard every one, of all, if he met with, it was under an internal conviction, that in the article of eruditi-om, as he usually pronounced the word, he was infinitely superior to them all put together. At present, however, this intimation fell upon heedless ears, for the brother and sister were too deeply engaged in asking and receiving intelligence concerning their former fortunes to attend much to the worthy Dominie.

When they brought Bertram to Julia's dressing-room, and dismissed her attendant. "My dear sir," she said as he entered, "you have forgot our vigil last night, and have hardly allowed me time to comb my hair, which is the only thing I have to trust in to give me air of respectability—Julia Manning, you have the kindness to answer me? Was it this young man who came under your window and conversed with you during your residence at Mervyn-Hall?—Julia—I command—"

"You will be tardy to reply," said the Colonel, "where the entanglement lies, which I will try to extricate with due gentleness."

"O, everywhere," said the young lady,—"the whole is a wild and confounded hornet's nest."

"Well then, I will try to unriddle it."—He gave a brief sketch of the fate and prospects of Bertram, to which Julia listened with an interest which she in vain endeavoured to disguise—"And now, Miss Manning, are your ideas on the subject more luminous?"

"More confused than ever, my dear sir," said Julia. "Here is this young man come from India, after he had been several years in the service, like Abdullah, the great voyager to his sister Canzado and his provident brother—"

"And I am awfully, the story, I believe—Canzado was his wife—but Lucy may represent the one, and the Dominie the other. And then this lively crack-brained Scotch lawyer appears like a pantomime at the end of a tragedy—and then how delightful it will be if Lucy gets back her fortune."

"Now to the matter at hand. Do you think the most mysterious part of the business is, that Miss Julia Manning, who must have known her father's anxiety about the fate of this young man, Brown, or Ber- tram, as the case may be, and wished to consult him when Hazledew's accident took place, and never once mentioned to her father a word of the matter, but suffered the search to proceed against this young gentleman as a suspicious character and as a—a—"

Julia, much of whose courage had been hastily assumed to meet the interview with her father, was now unable to rally herself; she hung down her head in silence, after in vain attempting to utter a denial that she recollected Brown when she met him.

"No answer!—Well, Julia," continued her father, gravely but in a low voice, "do you allow me to say the only time you have been seen Brown since his return from India?—Still no answer. I must then naturally suppose that it is not the first time.—Still no reply. Julia Manning, will you have the kindness to answer me? Was it this young man who came under your window and conversed with you during your residence at Mervyn-Hall?—Julia—I command—"

"Miss Manning raised her head. "I have been, sir—I believe I am still very foolish—and it is perhaps more hard upon me that I must meet this gentleman, whom I have known, than not the case entirely, yet get the accomplice of my folly, in your presence."

"Here she made a full stop.

"I am to understand, then," said Manning "that this was the author of the serenade at Mervyn-Hall?"

what is that?" answered the Colonel, speak-ging, "Do you know what you shall immediately know and approve of. May I ask—whether Mr. Bertram is to continue a guest at Woodbourne?"

"Certainly," said the Colonel, "while his affaire render it advisable."

"Then, sir, you must be sensible, considering what is already past, that he will expect some reason for my withdrawing—I believe I must say the encourage ment, which he may think I have given.

I expect, Julia," said the Colonel, "that he will respect my roof, and entertain some sense perhaps of the services I am desirous to render him, and so will not insist upon any course of conduct which I might have reason to complain; and I expect of you, that you will make him sensible of what is due to both."

Then, sir, I understand you, and you shall be im-plcitly obeyed."

"Thank you, my love; my anxiety (kissing her) is on your account.—Now wipe these witnesses from your eyes, and so to breakfast."

And, Sheriff, I will earn—my word to you,
That I will by-to-morrow dinner-time,

First Part of Henry IV.

When the several by-plays, as they may be termed, had taken place among the individuals of the Wood-bourn family, as we have intimated in the preceding chapter, the breakfast party at length assembled.
Dandie excepted, who had contrived to obtain some viands, and perhaps in society, by partaking of a cup of tea with Mrs. Allan, just laced with two tea-spoonful of Cognis, and reinforced with various slices from a huge round of beef. He had a kind of feeling that he could cut twice as much, and speak twice as much, with this good dame and Barnes, as with the grand folk in the parlour. Indeed, the meal of this less distinguished party was much more mirth-ful than that in the higher circle, where there was an obvious air of constraint on the greater part of the assistants. Julia dared not raise her voice in asking Bertram if he chose another cup of tea. Bertram felt embarrassed so much at eating his toast and butter with the eye of Mannering. Lucy, while she indulged to the uttermost her affection for her recovered brother, began to think of the quarrel betwixt him and Hazelwood. The Colonel felt the inexpressible vileness in a proud mind, when it deems its slightest action subject for a moment to the watchful construction of others. The lawyer, while solemnly buttering his roll, had an aspect of unworsted gravity, arising, perhaps, from the severity of his morning studies. As for the Dominie, his state of mind was ecstatic:
He looked at Bertram—he looked at Lucy—he whispered—"He snuggled—he grinned—he committed all manner of solemnities in point of form—poured the whole cream (no unlucky mistake) upon the plate of durazz, which was his usual breakfast—threw the sugar into the sugar-dish instead of the slop-basin, and concluded with spilling the scalded liquor upon old Plato, the Colonells favourite spaniel, who received the libation without a howl that did little honour to his philosopher.

The Colonel's equanimity was rather shaken by this last blunder. "Upon my word, my good friend, Mr Sampson, you forget the difference between Plato and Zesperates."

"The former was chief of the Academics, the latter of the Stoics," said the Dominie, with some scorn of the supposition.

"Yes, my dear sir, but it was Zesperates, no Plato, who denied that pain was an evil."

"I should have thought," said Pleydell, "that very respectable quadruped, which is now lamenting.
of the room upon three of his four legs, was rather of the must see the form and not the advice. But there is little harm. Our friend here must be made sui juris—he is at present an escaped prisoner:
the law has an awkward claim upon him; he must be placed where she will be under my advice. But which purpose, Colonel, I will accompany you in your carriage down to Hazlewood-house. The distance is not great; we will offer our sail; and I am certain I will make his pardon—Sir Robert Hazlewood, the necessity of receiving it.

With all my heart," said the Colonel; and, ringing the bell, gave the necessary orders. "And what is next to be done?"

"We must get hold of Mac-Morlan, and look out for more proof!"

"Why," said the Colonel, "the thing is as clear as day-light—here are Mr. Sampson and Miss Bertram, and you yourself, at once recognise the young gentleman as his father's image; and he himself recollects all those peculiar marks, and he is precisely his looking this country—What else is necessary to conviction?"

"To moral conviction nothing more, perhaps," said the lawyer; "but a piece of solid proof of course.
Mr. Bertram's recollections are his own recollections merely, and therefore are not evidence in his own favour; Miss Bertram, the learned Mr. Sampson, and I, can only say, what every one who knew the late Ellangowan will readily agree with, that this gentleman is his very picture—But that will not make him Ellangowan's son, and give him the estate."

"And what will do so?" the Colonel.

"Why, what must be done then?" asked Mannering, "we must get the proof. What proof? ‘What proof can be got at in Holland, among the persons by whom your young friend was educated. But then the fear of being called in question for the murder of the gauger may make them silent; or if they speak, they are either foreigners or outlawed smugglers. In short, I see doubts."

"Under favour, most learned and honoured sir," the Dominie, "I trust His Majesty will have restored little Harry Bertram to his friends, will not leave his own work imperfect."

"I trust so too, Mr. Sampson," said Pleydell, "but we must be cautious; and I am afraid we shall have more difficulty in procuring them than I at first thought. But a faint heart never won a fair lady—and, by the way, (apart to Miss Mannerling, while Bertram was engaged with his sister,) there's a vin-dication of Holland for you! what smart fellows do you think Leyden and Utrecht must send forth, when such a genteel and handsome young man comes from the son of Middletongue?"

"Of a verity," said the Dominie, "jealous of the reputation of the Dutch seminary,—"of a verity, Mr.
Pleydell, but I make it known to you that I myself was founded in his education."

"True," said Pleydell, "I admired the advocate, ' that accounts for his proficiency in the graces, without an education—but here comes your carriage, Colonel."

"Come back again,—let there be nothing done to prejudice my rights; I am now in the court."

Their reception at Hazlewood-house was more civil and formal than usual; for in general the Baronet expressed great respect for Colonel Mannerling; and Mr. Pleydell, besides being a man of good family and characters, as well disposed to his friend, as he had been towards his wife. But now he seemed dry and embarrassed in his manner. "He would willingly," he said, "rescieve bail, notwithstanding that the offence had been directly perpetrated, committed, and done, against young Hazlewood of Hazlewood; but the young man had given himself a fictitious description, and was altogether that sort of person, who should not be liberated, discharged, or let loose upon society; and therefore"

"I hope, Sir Robert Hazlewood," said the Colonel,
"you do not mean to doubt my word, when I assure you that he served under me as cadet in India?"

"By no means or account whatsoever. But you call him a cadet; now he says, avers, and upholds, that he was a captain, or held a troop in your regiment."

"He was promoted since I gave up the command."

"But you must have heard of it?"

"No: I returned on account of family circumstances from the East Indies, and have not been here before. I was a little curious to hear particular news from the regiment; the name of Brown, too, is so common, that I might have seen his promotion in the Gazette without noticing it; but they say our news will bring letters from his commanding officer."

"But I am told and informed, Mr. Pleydell," answered Sir Robert, still hesitating, "that he does not mean to sell a claim to the estate of Ellangowan, under the name of Bertram."

"Ay, who says that?" said the counsel.

"Oh, the young man himself. He says so, that does give a right to keep him in prison?"

"Hush, Colonel," said the lawyer; "I am sure you would not, any more than I, countenance him, if he proves an impostor; and among friends, who informed you of this? Sir Robert,?"

"Why, a person, Mr. Pleydell," answered the Baronet, "who is peculiarly interested in investigating sifting, and clearing out this business to the bottom—you will excuse my being more particular."

"O, certainly," replied Pleydell—well, and he says?—"

"He says that it is whispered about among tinkers, gipsies, and other idle persons, that there is such a plan as I mentioned to you, and that this young man who is a bastard or natural son of the late Ellangowan, is pitched upon as the impostor, from his strong family resemblance."

"And was there such a natural son, Sir Robert?
demanded the counsel.

"O, certainly, my own positive knowledge.
Ellangowan had him placed as a calling-boy or pewter-monkey on board an armed sloop or yacht belonging to the revenue, through the interest of the late Commissioner Bertram, a kinman of his own."

"Well, Sir Robert," said the lawyer, taking the word out of the mouth of the impatient soldier—you have told me news; I shall investigate them, and if I find them true, certainly Colonel Mannerling and I will not consent to it; the young man is, however, while, as we are all willing to make him forthcoming, to answer all complaints against him, I do assure you, you will act most illigibly, and incur heavy responsibility, if you refuse our bail."

"Why, Mr. Pleydell," said Sir Robert, who knew the high authority of the counsellor's opinion, "as you must know best, and as you promise to give up this young man to me?

"If he proves an impostor," replied the lawyer, with some emphasis.

"Aye, certainly—under that condition I will take your bail; but in the meantime, you must say, an obliging, well-disposed, and civil neighbour, have yourselves admitted to the law, gave me a hint or caution this morning against doing so. It was from him I learned that this youth was liberated and had come abroad.
read prisoner.—But where shall we try the ball-headed? said the counsellor, addressing himself to Mr. Dophen—it will not do to harm if I dictate the needful my- self, a-writer accordingly and signed, and, saving subscribed a regular warrant for so Brown, would have the grace of courage, noble baring, and high blood, in the far-descended heir of Ellangowan.

They reached at length the little eminence or knoll upon the highest part of the common, called Gibbie’s-knowe—a spot repeatedly mentioned in this history, as being on the skirts of the Ellangowan estate.

It commanded a fair variety of hills and dale, bordered with natural woods, whose naked boughs at this season relieved the general colour of the landscape with a dark purple hue; while in other places the prospect was more formally intersected by lines of plantation, where the Scotch fir displayed its variety of dusky green.

At the distance of two or three miles lay the key of Ellangowan, its waves rippling under the influence of the western breeze, as the towers of the ruined castle, seen high over every object in the neighbourhood, received a brighter colouring from the wintry sun.

"There," said Lucy Bertram, pointing them out in the distance, "there is the seat of our ancestors. God knows, my dear brother, I do not covet in your behalf the extensive powers which the lords of these ruins are said to have possessed so long, and sometimes to have used so ill. But, O that I might see you in possession of such relics of your fortune as should give you an honourable independence, and enable you to stretch your hand the hand of the old and destitute dependants of our family, whom our poor father’s death—"

"True, my dearest Lucy," answered the young heir of Ellangowan; "and I would, with the utmost trust and confidence, receive the assistance of Heaven, which has so far guided us, and with that of these good friends, whom their own generous hearts have interested in my behalf, such a consumption of my hard adventures is now not unlikely. But as a soldier, I must look with some interest upon that worm-eaten hold of ragged stone; and if this undermining scoured, who is now in possession, dare to dispose a pebble if it.

He was here interrupted by Dimmont, who came hastily after them up the road, unseen till he was near the party. "Captain, Captain! ye’re wanted—Ye’re wanted by her ye ken o’

And immediately Meg Merrilies, as if emerging out of the earth, ascended from the hollow way, and stood before them. "I sought ye at the house," elle said, and found but him, (pointing to Dimmont,) but yest he was right, and I was wrong. It is here we should meet, on this very spot, where my eye last saw your father. Remember your promise, and follow me.

CHAPTER LIII.

To hail the king in seeming sort.
The ladie was for the churlish mine, and are res for all your motions—consider I have lawyer’s mistress twelve hours for assurance you it would be madness to at Ellangowan just now.—The utmost way is this rising ground in the common, where one might bless with a distant prospect of towers, which struck so strongly your imagination.

The knight agreed upon; and the taken their cloaks, followed the route under the escort of Captain Bertram. It was winter morning, and the cool breeze to刷新, not to chill, the fair weather, a high unacknowledged bond of kindness to the two ladies, and Bertram now hearing any accounts of his own family, now ting this advice, and the pleasure which he received. Lucy felt his words, as well from the bold and manly sentiments, as from the dangers he feared with the spirit with which he bore them. And Julia, while she pondered other’s words, could not help entertaining the independent spirit which had seemed to prevail in the humble and plebeian market, wedding or burial," and she held high her head, brooding in a menacing attitude.

"But turned round to his terrified companions.

"Excuse me for a moment; I am engaged by a promise to follow this woman." "A good heavens! engaged to a madwoman?" said Julia.

"Or to a gypsy, who has her band in the wood ready to murder you," said Lucy.

"That was not spoken like a hair of Ellangowan," said Meg, frowning upon Miss Bertram. "It is the ill-doers are ill-dreaders."

"In short, I must go," said Bertram, "it is absolutely necessary; wait for me five minutes on this spot."

"Five minutes?" said the gypsy, "five hours may not bring you here again."

"Do you hear that?" said Julia; "for Heaven's sake do not go!"

"I must, I must—Mr. Dimont will protect you back to the house."

"No," said Meg, "he must come with you; it is for that he is here. He means to take part in hand and heart; and well his part it is, for redding his quarrel might cost you dear."

"I know it's not his way,—Then let him go, and there. They are within five minutes of the place, and they no longer will be attended to; let him wait for us, unless they are making for the lane in the darkness."

"You must not go," exclaimed both the ladies at once, "let Mr. Dimont warn you, if you go must, on this strange summons."

"Indeed I must," answered Bertram, "but you see I am safely guarded—Adieu for a short time; go here with me."

He pressed his sister's hand, and took a yet more affectionate farewell of Julia, with his eyes. Almost stupefied with surprise and fear, the young ladies with a wild and anxious looks the course of Bertram, his companion, and their extraordinary guide. Her tall figure moved across the wintry heath with steps so swift, so long, and so steady, that she appeared now to be the only person in the direction they took; they are going upon the Ellangowan estate—that rascal Glossen has shown us what ruffians he has at his disposal. I wish honest Lord Dunsclough was here, as well as sufficient."

"If you please," said Haswood, "I should be most happy to ride in the direction which they have taken. I am extremely known in the country, that I can scarce think how any danger will be opposed in my presence, and I shall keep up a such a cautious distance as not to appear to watch them or interrupt any communication which she may make.

"Upon my word!" said Pleydell, (aside) "to be a spig, whom I remember with a whey face and a satchel not so very many years ago, I think young Haswood grows a fine fellow. I am more afraid of a new attempt at legal oppression than at open violence, and from that this young man's presence would deter both Glossen and his understrappers. He is away then, my boy—peer out—peer out—you'll find them somewhere about Derncough, or very probably in Warrroch-wood."

Haswood turned his horse. "Come back to us to dinner, Haswood," cried the Colonel. He bowed, spurred his horse, and galloped off.

We now return to Bertram and Dimont, who continued to follow their mysterious guide through the woods and dingles, between the open common and the ruined tower, through the ruined tower; and finally let us go back a traveller from the direct path. Her way was as straight, and nearly as swift, as that of a bird through the air. At length they reached those thickets of heather, which stood together, concealed from the skirts of the common towards the glades and brook of Derncough, and were there lost to the view.

"This is very extraordinary," said Lucy, after a pause, and turning round to her companion; "what can he have to do with that old bag?"

"It is very frightful," answered Julia, "and almost reminds me of the tales of sorceresses, witches, and evil genii, which I have heard in India. They believe there is a fascination of the eye, by which those who possess it control the will and dictate the motions of their victims. What can your brother have in common with that fearful woman, that he should leave us, obviously against his will, to attend to her commands?"

"At least," said Lucy, "we may hold him safe from harm for; he would never have submitted that faithful creature Dimont, of whose strength courage and steadiness, Henry said so much, to attend upon an expedition where she projected evil to his interest. And now let us go back to the house till the Colonel returns—perhaps Bertram may be back first; at any rate, the Colonel will judge what is to be done."

"Or the other's arm, but yet occasionally stumbling, between fear and the disorder of their nerves, they at length reached the head of the avenue, when they heard the tread of a horse behind them. They started, for their ears were awake to every sound, and beheld to their great pleasure young Haswell."

"The Colonel will be here immediately," he said; "I galloped on before to pay my respects to Miss Bertram, with this intelligence, that when the Colonel arrives, upon the joyful event which has taken place in her family, I long to be introduced to Captain Bertram, and to thank him for the well-deserved lesson he gave to my rashness and indiscretion."

"He has left us just now," said Lucy, "and in a manner that has frightened us very much."

Just at that moment the Colonel's carriage drew up, and, on alighting, he presented himself to the musing and learned counsel aiglet and joined them. They instantly communicated the new cause of alarm.

"Meg Merrilies again?" said the Colonel; "she certainly is a most mysterious and unaccountable personage; but I think she must have something to impart to Bertram, to which she does not mean we should be privy."

"The devil take the bedimmed old women," said the counsellor; "will she not let things take their course, prouf de legs, but must always be putting in her clouts? That is their way—They are always driving the action; they are going upon the Ellangowan estate—that rascal Glossen has shown us what ruffians he has at his disposal. I wish honest Lord Dunsclough was here, as well as sufficient."

"If you please," said Haswood, "I should be most happy to ride in the direction which they have taken. I am extremely known in the country, that I can scarce think how any danger will be opposed in my presence, and I shall keep up such a cautious distance as not to appear to watch them or interrupt any communication which she may make."

"Upon my word!" said Pleydell, (aside) "to be a spig, whom I remember with a whey face and a satchel not so very many years ago, I think young Haswood grows a fine fellow. I am more afraid of a new attempt at legal oppression than at open violence, and from that this young man's presence would deter both Glossen and his understrappers. He is away then, my boy—peer out—peer out—you'll find them somewhere about Derncough, or very probably in Warrroch-wood."

Haswood turned his horse. "Come back to us to dinner, Haswood," cried the Colonel. He bowed, spurred his horse, and galloped off.
"There's but one answer to that, Henry Bertram," said the sibyl. "I swore my tongue should never tell, but I never said my finger should never show. Go on and meet your fortune, or turn back and lose it that's a I has to say."

"What?" answered Bertram. "I will ask no more questions."

They descended into the glen about the same place where Meg had formerly parted from Bertram. She passed by the tall rock where he had witnessed the burial of a dead body, and stopped upon the ground, which, notwithstanding all the care that had been taken, showed vestiges of having been rubbed through the years since," she said; "he's maybe he's neither sane.

She then moved up the brook until she came to the ruined hamlet, where, passing, with a look of peculiar and solemn interest before one of the gates which was still standing, she said in a tone less abrupt, though as solemn as before. "Do you see that black and broken end of a shepherd?—there my kettle boiled for forty years—there I bore twelve boundly sons and daughters—where are they now?—where are the leaves that were on that naked tree at Martinton?—the west wind has made it bare—made a wild west wind of that tree. But it's but a blackened rotten stump now—I've sat under it many a bonnie summer afternoon, when it hung its gay garlands over the poppling water. I've sat in a tree with my foot on my knee, Henry Bertram, and sung ye sangs of the wild barons and their bloody wars. It will be, never be green again, and Meg Merrilies will never sing sangs again, be they birch of gold or no, for fear she'll get up the said wish was for her sake?—and let somebody live there that's aower guide to fear them of another world. For if ever the dead came back among the living, I'll be seen in this glen moonlight night after these cursed bars are in the mould."

The mixture of insanity and wild pathos with which she spoke, the sight of her eight arms, her head extended, her left bent and shrubbed beneath the dark red drapery of her mantle, might have been a study worthy of our Siddons herself. "And now," she said, resuming at once the short, stern, and hasty tone which was most ordinary to her—"let us to the work—let us to the work."

She then led the way to the promontory on which the rock leaned, and knocked a little hollow in the key from her pocket, and unlocked the door. The interior of this place was in better order than formerly. "I have made things decent," she said; I want to be right when you come. There is no fear of my being watched, and the man fell from his horse—I was behind that bourn-treeshow at the very moment. Sair, sair, he strove, and said he cried for mercy—but he was in the hands of that very man that never knew the world."

"Yes," answered Bertram, "imperfectly I do."

"Ay," said Bertram, "or will you give me a peep into your arms, and why the man fell from his horse—? I was behind that bourn-treeshow at the very moment. Sair, sair, he strove, and said he cried for mercy—but he was in the hands of that very man that never knew the world."

"Yes," said the sibyl in a low and scarcely audible whisper; "here the corpse was found."

"And the cave," said Bertram, in the same tone, "in close passage, you are guided to very spot."

"Yes," said the sibyl in a low and careful tone; "Bend up both your hearts—follow me, as I creep in. I have the firewood so as to screen you. Bide behind it for a stiff till I say. The hour and the man are bide."

"I will, by my soul," said Henry—"if he is the man I suppose—Jansen?"

"Ay, Jansen, Hatterslick, and twenty more names are his."

"Dinmont, you must stand by me now," said Bertram, "for this fellow is a devil."

"Ye needna doubt that," said the stout yeoman—"but I wish I could mind a bit of prayer or I creep after the witch into that hole that she's opening. It would be a sair thing to see the blessed creature of fire, air, and gang be killed, like a toad that's run to earth, in a dungeon like that. But, my sooth, they will be hard-bitten terriers will worry Dandi—so, as I said, they will be hard-bitten terriers will worry Dandi."

"Ye canna say I am not satisfied," she said, "and the powder dry—I ken this work well."

Then, without answering his questions, she armed Dinmont also with a large pistol, and desired them all to arm themselves with whatever weapons-looking blackguards, which she brought from a corner. Bertram took a stout sapling, and Dandi selected a club which might have served Hercules himself. They then left the hut together, and, in doing so, Bertram took an opportunity to whisper to Dinmont, "There's something inexplicable in all of this which we need not be at these arms unless we see necessity and lawful occasion—take care to do as you see me do."

Dinmont gave a sagacious nod; and, they continued to follow, over wet and over dry, through long and through fallow, the footsteps of their conductress. She guided them to the wood of Warroch by the same track which the late Ellangowan had used, and, when riding on Bertram in quest of his child, on the miserable evening of Kennedy's murder.

When Meg Merrilies had attained these groves, through which the wintry sea-wind was now whistling howls and shrill, she seemed to pause a moment as if to recollect the way. "We maun go the precise track," she said, and continued to go forward, but rather in a zigzag and involved course than according to her former steady and direct line of motion. At length she guided them through the maze of the wood to a little open glade of about a quarter of an acre, surrounded by trees and bushes, which made a wild and far-famed glen in its day but now was a sheltered and snugly sequestered spot; but when arrayed in the verdure of spring, the earth sending forth all its wild flowers, the simplicities multiplying their waste, and the holly and bracken and birches, which towered over the underwood, drooping their long and leafy fibres to intercept the sun, it must have seemed a place for a youthful poet to study his earliest sonnets and write them in a first mutual avowal of affection. Apparently it now awakened very different recollections. Bertram's brow, when he had looked round the spot, became gloomy and choleric. Meg Merrilies, too, seemed to recover herself. "This is the very spot," she looked at him with a ghastly side-glance. "D'ye mind it?"

"Yes," answered Bertram, "imperfectly I do."

"Ay," said Bertram, "or will you give me a peep into your arms, and why the man fell from his horse—? I was behind that bourn-treeshow at the very moment. Sair, sair, he strove, and said he cried for mercy—but he was in the hands of that very man that never knew the world."

"Yes," said the sibyl in a low and carefully whispering tone; "Bend up both your hearts—follow me, as I creep in. I have the firewood so as to screen you. Bide behind it for a stiff till I say. The hour and the man are bide."

"I will, by my soul," said Henry—"if he is the man I suppose—Jansen?"

"Ay, Jansen, Hatterslick, and twenty more names are his."

"Dinmont, you must stand by me now," said Bertram, "for this fellow is a devil."

CHAPTER LIV.

-Guy Manering.

—Dis, prophet in thy speech.

For this, among the rest, was he rewarded.

-Henry VI. Part III.

The progress of the Borderer, who, as we have said, was the last of the party, was hardly arrested by the thousand-fold height of his leg as he dragged his long limbs after him in silence and perturbation through the low and narrow entrance of the subterranean passage. The steel hilted head of the bold yeoman had well nigh given way, and he supposed with difficulty a shout, which, in the defenceless posture and situation which they then occupied, might have cost all their lives. He continued himself, however, with the extraordinary obstinacy of his birth, from the fond hopes of his unexpected follower. "Be still," said a voice behind him, releasing him; "I am a friend—Charles Hazlwood." These words were uttered in a very low voice, but they produced sound enough to startle Meg Merrilies, who led the van, and who, having already gained the place where the cavern expanded, had risen upon her feet. She began, as if to confound any listening ear, to growl, to mutter, and to sing aloud, and at the same time to make a bustle among some brushwood which was now hushed in the cave.

"Here he is!—Deyril's skink!" growled the harsh voice. "Deyril!" cried from the inside of his den, "what makes thou there?"

"Laying the roughies to keep the cauld wind frae you, ye desperate doo-nae-good—Ye're e'en ower well off to be otherwise." "Have you brought me the brandy, and any news of my people?" said Dirk Hatteraick.

"There's the flask for ye. Your people—dis-pear—broken—gone—or cut to ribbons by the red coats."

"D'ye Deyril!—this coast is fatal to me."

"Ye may have more reason to say sake."

With the dialogue往前, Bertram and Dinmont had both gained the interior of the cave, and assumed an erect position. The only light which illuminated its rugged and sable precipices was a quantity of wood burned in the iron grate, as they use in spearing salmon by night. On these red embers Hatteraick from time to time threw a handful of twigs or splintered wood; but these, even when they blazed up, afforded a light much disproportionate to the extent of the cavern; and, as its principal inhabitant lay upon the side of the grated most remote from the entrance, it was not easy for him to find any objects to lay in that direction. The intruders, therefore, whose number was now augmented unexpectedly to three, stood behind the loosely-plied branches with little risk of discovery. The two white hands of Hazlwood with one hand till he whispered to Bertram, "A friend—Young Hazlwood."

It was no time for following up the introduction, and they all stood as still as the rocks around them, obscured behind the pile of brushwood, which had been probably placed there to break the cold wind from the sea, without totally intercepting the supply of air. The branches were laid so loosely above each other, that, looking through them towards the light of the fire-grate, they could easily discover what passed in its vicinity, although a much stronger degree of illumination than it afforded, would not have enabled the persons placed near the bottom of the cave to have descried them in the position which they occupied.

The scene, independent of the peculiar moral interest and personal danger which attended it, had, from the effect of the light and shade on the uncommon objects which it exhibited, an appearance entrance of the grate with its dark-red glare of charcoal in a state of ignition, relieved from time to time by a transient flame of a more vivid or dusky light as the fuel with which Deyril had fed the fire, was better or worse fitted for its purpose. Now a dark cloud of stifling smoke rose up to the roof of the cavern, and then lighted into a red, a cloud, and other smoke, which flashed all the way up the pillar of smoke, and was suddenly rendered brighter and more lively by some drier fuel, or perhaps some a-linted fir-tilmer, which at once converted it into flame. From the observation of the red, they could see, more or less distinctly, the form of Hatteraick, whose savage and rugged cast of features, now rendered yet more ferocious by the circumstance, was, as it were, adate of his mind, assored well with the rugged and broken vault, which rose in a rude arch over and around him. The form of Meg Merrilies, which stalked about him, sometimes in the light, sometimes partially obscured in the smoke or darkness, contrasted strongly with the sitting figure of Hatteraick as he went over the flame, and from his stationary posture was constantly visible to the astonished while that of the female flitted around, appearing or disappearing like a spectre.

Bertram felt his blood boil at the sight of Hatteraick. He remembered him well under the name of Jansen, the smuggler who had adopted after the death of Kennedy; and he remembered also, that this Jansen, and his mate Brown, the same who was shot at Woodbourne, had been the brutal tyrants of his infancy.

Bertram knew further, from piecing his own imperfect recollections with the narratives of Manering and Pleydell, that this man was the prime agent in the act of violence which had torn him from his native country, and had exposed him to so many distresses and dangers. A thousand exasperating reflections rose within his bosom; and he could hardly refrain from rushing upon Hatteraick and bowing his brains out.

At the same time, this would have been no safe adventure. The flame, as it rose and fell, while it displayed the strong, muscular, and broad-chested frame of the ruffian, glanced also upon two brace of pistols in his belt, and upon the hilt of his cutlass; it was not to be doubted that his desperation was commensurate with his personal strength and resistance. Both, indeed, were inadequate to encounter the combined power of two such men as Bertram himself and his friend Dinmont, without reckoning their unexpected assistant Hazlwood, who was now armed, and of a lighter make; but Bertram felt, on a moment's reflection, that there would be neither sense nor valour in anticipating the hangman's office, and he considered the importance of making Hatteraick prisoner alive. He therefore repressed his indignation, and awaited what should pass between the ruffian and his gipsy guide.

"And has he not heard the harsh and discordant tones of his female attendant? "Said I not it would come upon you—ay, and in this very cave, where ye harboured after the deed?"

"Wetter, and now he has replied Hatteraick, "keep your deyriel's matins till they're wanted. Have you seen Glossain?"

"No," replied Meg Merrilies, "you've missed your blow, ye blood-splitter! and ye have nothing to expect from the tempter."

"Hagel!" exclaimed the ruffian, "if I had him but by the throat!—And what am I to do then?"

"Do'" answered the gipsy; "Die like a man or be hanged like a dog!"

"Hanged, ye hag of Satan!—the hemp's not sown that shall hang me."

"It's sown, and it's grown, and it's hecket, and it's twisted. Did I not tell ye, when ye wad take away the boy Harry Bertram, in spite of my prayers, —did I not say he would come back when he had dree'd his weird in foreign land till his twenty-first year? —Did I not say ye'd firewood would burn down to a spark, but wad kindle again?"

"Well, mother, you did say so," said Hatteraick, in a tone that was indignant and reproving, "and, donner and blitzen! I believe you spoke the truth—that youner of Ellangowan has been a rock head to me all my life! and now, with Glossain's cursed comb that sunk the ships, and the cursed boats destroyed, and I dare say the lugger's taken—there were not men enough left on board to work her, far less to fight her—a dredge-boat might have taken her. And what do you say?—Hagel, and storm! I shall never dare go back again to Fashing—"
"You'll never need," said the gipsy.

"What are you doing there," said her companion, "and what makes you say that?"

During this dialogue, Meg was heaping some flax together. Before answer to this question, she dropped the bundle, and, as the flax had been previously steeped in some spirituous liquor, for it instantly caught fire, and rose in a vivid pyramid of the most brilliant light up to the very top of the vault. As it ascended, Meg answered the ruffian's question in a firm and steady voice:—"Because the Hour's come, and the Man."

At the appointed signal, Bertram and Dinmont sprang from their hiding place, and rushed upon Hatternick. Hazlewood, unacquainted with their plan of assault, was a moment later. The ruffian, who instantly saw he was betrayed, turned his first vengeance on Meg Merrilies, at whom he discharged a pistol. She fell, with a piercing and dreadful cry, between the shriek of pain and the sound of laughter, when at its highest and most suffocating height. "I ken't it would be this way," she said.

Bertram, in his haste, slipped his foot upon the uneven rock which floored the cave; a fortunate stumble, for Hatternick's second bullet whistled over him, and struck the husband standing upright, it must have lodged in his brain. Ere the smuggler could draw another pistol, Dinmont closed with him, and endeavoured by main force to prise open the ruffian's eyes. When Meg Merrilies was at the watchman's personal strength, joined to the efforts of his despair, that, in spite of the gigantic force with which the Borderer grappled him, he dragged Dinmont, and the proposed victim fell into, being cut off by another arrow, in drawing a third pistol, which might have proved fatal to the honest farmer, had not Bertram, as well as Hazlewood, come to his assistance, when, by main strength and the weight of two desperate and almost convulsive struggles, the ruffian lay perfectly still and silent. "He's gane to die game any how," said Dinmont; "well, I like him na the waur for that."

This observation honest Dandie made while he was shaking the blazing flax from his rough coat and shaggy black hair, some of which had been singed in the passage. "Good God! what shall we do for this poor woman," said he to Hazlewood, the circumstances superadding the necessity of previous explanation or introduction to each other.

"I ha' been watching you these two hours—I will ride off for some assistants that may be trusted. Meanwhile, you had better defend the mouth of the cave and guard the body," said Meg Merrilies to her husband. He hastened away. Bertram, after binding Meg Merrilies's wound as well as he could, took station near the mouth of the cave with a cocked pistol in his hand; Dinmont continued to watch Hatternick, keeping a grasp, like that of Hercules, on his breast. There was a dead silence in the cavern, only interrupted by the low and suppressed moaning of the wounded female, and by the hard breathing of the prisoner.

CHAPTER LV.

For though, induced and led astray,
There's travel'd far and wander'd long,
And all the ties that led thee wrong,
Yet, cousin, trust in my advice—
Authority and danger of their situation made seem almost thrice as long, the voice of young Hazlewood, was heard without. "Here I am," he cried, "with a sufficient party."

"Come in, then," answered Bertram, not a little pleased to find his guard relieved. Hazlewood then entered, followed by two or three countrymen, of whom one was armed as a peace-officer. They lifted Hatternick up, and carried him in their arms as far as the entrance of the vault was high enough to permit them; then laid him on his back, and dragged him along as well as they could, for no persuasion would induce him to assist the transportation by any exertion of his own. He lay as silent and inactive in their hands, as the dead corpse itself, but in no way aiding their operations. When he was dragged into day-light, and placed erect upon his feet among three or four assistants, who had remained without the cave, he seemed surprised and dazzled by the sudden change from the darkness of his cavern. While others were superintending the removal of Meg Merrilies, those who remained with Hatternick attempted to make him sit down upon a fragment of rock which lay close upon the high-water mark. A strong shuddering convulsed his iron frame for an instant, as he resisted their purpose. "Not there!—Hazlewood!"

These were the only words he spoke; but their import, and the deep tone of horror in which they were uttered, served to show what was passing in his mind.

"When Meg Merrilies was carried into the cavern, with all the care for her safety that circumstances admitted, they consulted where she should be carried. Hazlewood had sent for a surgeon, and proposed that she should be in the nearest cottage. But the patient exclaimed with great earnestness, "Na, na, na! To the Kaim o' Derneleugh—the Kaim o' Derneleugh—the spirit will not free itself of her own body until it is laid on that very spot."

"You must indulge her, I believe," said Bertram; "her troubled imagination will otherwise aggravate the fever of the wound."

They bore her thither with reluctance to the vault. On the way her mind seemed to run more upon the scene which had just passed, than on her own approaching death. "There were three of them set upon him—berthing the twosome—but who was the third?"

"It would be himself, returned to work his sin vengeance!"

It was evident that the unexpected appearance of Hazlewood, whose person concealed the outline of Hatternick, had put the gipsy to no little task to recognize, had produced a strong effect on her imagination. She often recurrieth to it. Hazlewood accounted for his unexpected arrival to Bertram, by saying, that he had gone for some purpose of Mannerling, and that observing them disappear into the cave, he had crept after them, meaning to announce himself and give orders, which in the darkness encountering the leg of Dinmont, had nearly produced a catastrophe, which, indeed, nothing but the presence of mind and fortitude of the bold yeoman could have averted.

When the gipsy arrived at the hat, she produced the key; and when they entered, and were about to deposit her upon the bed, she said, in an anxious tone, "Na, na! not that way, the feet to the east;" and appeased the clergyman when they reversed her position, and placed her in what appeared most appropriate to a dead body.

"Is there no clergyman near," said Bertram, "to assist this unhappy woman's devotions?"

A gentleman, the representative of the parish, who had been Charles Hazlewood's tutor, had, with many others, caught the alarm, that the murderer of Kennedy was taken on the spot where the deed had been done so many years before, and of the two mortally wounded. From curiosity, or rather from the feeling that his duty called him to scenes of distress, this gentleman had come to the Kaim of Derneleugh, and appeared at the moment of the arrival of the party. It was about the same time, and was about to probe the wound; but Meg resisted the assistance of either.

It's no what man can do, that will heal my body, or save my spirit. Let me speak when I am willing, and then we may work your will."
derence.—But where's Henry Bertram?"—The assistant, to whom this name had been long a stranger, in whose current this peculiarity of pronunciation had never occurred, said, "Ye see, sir, he's stronger and harsher tone, "I said Henry Bertram of Ellangowan. Stand from the light and let me see him." He now turned towards Bertram, who approached the wretched couch. The wounded woman took hold of his hand. "Look at him," she said, "all that ever saw his father or his grandfather, who was acquainted with Sir Charles on a horse chest at some distance—let him deny what I say, if he can. That is Henry Bertram, son to Godfrey Bertram, unmindful of Ellangowan; that young man is the very man that Dick Hatterrack cut off from Warroch, and the man that he murdered the gazer.—I am there like a wandering spirit—for I longed to see wood that we left the country. I saved the barn's life, and hardships, he might, but he was no more to be moved to dote on till that day came—I kept that oath which I took to it, and I have made another vow to myself, that I am far off and not often seen by the way of the dead man. I have kept that oath too, and I will be at my post—He (pointing to Hatterrack) will soon be another, and there will be another yet.

The clergyman, now interposing, remarked it was a pity that deposition was not regularly taken and written down, and the surgeon urged the necessity of examining the wound, previously to exhausting her by questions. When she saw them removing Hatterrack, in order to clear the room and leave the surgeon to his operations, she called out aloud, raising herself at the same time upon the couch, "Dick Hatterrack, you and I will never meet again until we are before the judgment seat. We will remain to what I have said, or will you deny it?" He turned his hard-ened brow upon her, with a look of dumb and in-flexible defiance. Dick Hatterrack, dare ye deny, with your hands upon your hands, one of what my dying breath is uttering?"—He looked at her with the same expression of hardihood and dogged stubbornness, and moved his lips, but uttered no sound. "No, no," said the surgeon, "never. I forgive you, for you have sealed my evidence. —When I was in life, I was the mad racy gipsy, that had been scourged, and banished, and branded—that had begged from door to door, and been hounded by a like fate, from parish to parish—who would have minded her tale?—But now I am a dying woman, and my words will not fall to the ground, any more than the earth will cover them.

She here paused, and all left the but except the sur- geon and two or three women. After a very short examination, he shook his head, and resigned his post by the dying woman's side to the clergyman. An chase returning empty to Kippletringan had been stopped on the high-road by a constable, who forewarned it would be necessary to convey Hatterrack to jail. The driver, understanding what was going on at Dernecleugh, left his horses to the care of a blackguard boy, confiding, it is to be supposed, rather in the years and discretion of the cattle, than in those of their keeper, and set off full speed to see, as he expressed it, "whether it be a large man or not." He arrived just as the group of tenants and tenants, whose numbers increased every moment, stilled with grazing upon the rugged features of Hatterrack; and the posterior, being upon his horse, and set off full speed to see, as he expressed it, "whether it be a large man or not." He arrived just as the group of tenants and tenants, whose numbers increased every moment, stilled as they saw the law with a long face, " will not come death!"

And, sinking back upon her couch of straw, she expired without a groan. The clergyman and the surgeon carefully noted down all that she had said, now deeply regretting they had not examined her more minutely, but both remaining morally convinced of the truth of her disclosure.

Having finished the first compliment Bertram upon the near prospect of his being restored to his name and rank in society. The people around, who now learned from Jables that Bertram was the person who had wounded him, were struck with amazement, and added his name to Bertram's in their exulting acclamations. Some, however, demanded of the postilion now he had not recognised Bertram when he saw him the first time before at Kippletringan to which he gave the very natural answer,—"Hout, what was I thinking about Ellangowan then?—It was the cry that was raised by the young man in the street, that put me on finding out the likeness—There was none missing it once she was set to look for it." The obscurity of Hatterrack, during the latter part of this scene, was partly due to some slight injury to his head. He was observed to twinkle with his eyelids—to attempt to raise his bound hands for the purpose of pulling his hat over his brow—to look angrily and impatiently to the road, as if anxious for the vehicle which GOY MANNERING.

The news of their exploit had already flown far and wide, and the whole inhabitants of the vicinity met them on the lawn with shouts of congratulation. That you have seen new to Bertram to Lucy, first ran up to him, though Julia’s eyes even anticipated hers, “you must thank these kind friends.”

With a blush expressing at once pleasure, gratitude, and bashfulness, Lucy curtseyed to Hazlewood, but to Dinmont she frankly extended her hand. The honest farmer, in the extravagance of his joy, carried his freedom further than the hunt warranted, for he impressed his thanks on the lady’s lips, and was instantly shocked at the rudeness of his own conduct. “Lord save, Madame, I ask your pardon,” he said; “I forgot, but ye had been a hair of my aim—the Captain’s sake, he gars ane forget himself.” “Old Pleydell now advanced; “Nay, if fees like these are going,” he said.

“Stop, stop, Mr. Pleydell,” said Julia, “you had your fees beforehand—remember last night.”

“Why, I do contuse a retainer,” said the barrister; “but if I don’t deserve double fees from both Miss Bertram and you which, I shall, and I shall now, and I shall!”

He, taking the um, walked into the vault, and shut the silently after them. He gazed in silence upon the body of Meg Merrilies, as he remained there for several hours, retaining the stern and energetic countenance which of Dirk Hatterrack to-morrow—God, I will supply him!—You shall see, Colonel, and you, my saucy misses, though you may not, shall hear.”

“Ay, that’s if we choose to listen, counselor,” replied Julia.

“And you think,” said Pleydell, “it’s two to one you won’t choose that?—But you have curiosity that teaches you the use of your ears now.”

“I declare, counselor,” answered the lively damsel, “that such saucy bachelors as you teach us the use of our fingers now and then.”

“Reserve them for the occasion,” said Pleydell, “and my love,” said the counselor, “Better for all parties.”

While this idle chat ran on, Colonel Manner ing introduced to Bertram a plain good-looking man, in a gray coat and waistcoat, and a broad-brimmed hat.

“This, my dear sir, is Mr. Mac-Morlan.”

“Who is,” said Bertram, “to whom, embraced him cordially, “my sister was indebted for a home, when deserted by all her natural friends and relations.”

The Donniss then pressed forward, grinned, chuckled, made a diabolical sound in attempting to whistle, and finally, unable to stifle his emotions, ran away to empty the feelings of his heart at his eyes.

We shall not attempt to be the expansion of heart and glee of this happy evening.

CHAPTER LVI.

How like a hateful app.

Detected grinning ‘waist his plaid’ heard.

A cunning man appears whose secret Fraud.

Are open’d to the day! —

There was a great movement at Woodbourne early on the following morning, to attend the examination at Kipkletringan—Mr. Pleydell, from the investigation which he had formerly bestowed on the dark affair of Kennedy’s death, as well as from the general deference due to his professional abilities, was requested by Mr. Mac-Morlan, and Sir Robert Hazlewood, and another justice of peace who attended, to take the situation of chairman, and the lead in the examination. Colonel Manner ing was invited to sit down with them. The examination, being previous to trial, was private in other respects.

The counselor resumed and re-interrogated former evidence. He then examined the clergyman and surgeon respecting the dying declaration of Meg Merrilies. They stated that, she dinnae, positively, and repeatedly, declared herself an eye-witness of Kennedy’s death by the hands of Hatterrack, and two or three of her crew; that her presence was not accidental; that she believed she was present in the room, when they were in the act of losing their vessel through the means of his information, led to the commission of the crime; that she said there was one witness of the murder, but she never or never participat in it, still alive,—her nephew, Gabriel FaL and she had hinted at another person, who was not necessary, after not, before the fact; but her siste, there failed. They did not forget to mention her declaration, that she had saved the child, and that she was torn from her by the smugglers, for the purpose of carrying him to Holland. All these particulars were carefully reduced to writing.

Disregarding the crowd, he was led, and eyed him with a glance equally shrewd and sarcastic—"I'll teach him," he said aside to Manning, "the value of the old admonition, Ne accesseris in consuetudine antipomae recini."

"But perhaps it is a gentleman," said Glossin, who could not fail to observe the coldness of his reception. "Is this an open meeting?"

"For my part," said Mr. Pleydell, "so far from considering it an open meeting, I consider it as entirely private. Mr. Glossin, I was never so pleased in my life to meet with you; especially as I think we should, at any rate, have had occasion to request the favour of your company to-night, by your orders?"

"Soles remembered the circumstance perfectly. "Look at that paper—is that your note of the measurement?" Soles verified the memorandum."

"I say, the measurement of the foot-prints?"

"We shall prove," the councillor, assayed to Manning, "that these shoes, which were found in the ruins at Deneleigh, belonged to Brown, the fellow who shot you on the lawn at Woodbourne."

"Now, Soles, measure that prisoner's foot very accurately."

Manning observed Hatterrack strictly, and could notice a visible tremor. "Do these measurements correspond with any of the foot-prints?"

The man looked at the note, then at his foot-rule, and measured—then verified his former measurement by a second. "They correspond," he said, "within a hair-breadth, to a foot-mark broader and shorter than the former."

Hatterracks's genius here deserted him—"Dereyvyl!" he broke out, "how could there be a foot-print on the wall, when it was frost as hard as the heart of a Mornog's leg?"

"In the evening, I grant you, Captain Hatterrack," said Pleydell, "but not in the forenoon. Will you favour us with the intimation what shoes you were upon the day you remember so exactly?"

Hatterrack saw his blunder, and again screwed up his hard features for obstinate silence—Put down your observation, however," said Pleydell to the documenter.

At this moment the door opened, and, much to the surprise of most present, Mr. Gilbert Glossin made his appearance. He was the son of one of the ditzy of watching and caves-dropping, assisted from a knowledge of Terrieries dying declaration, a circumstance, certainly not unworthy of any favourable impression towards him, by the request of having her regular examination, and to the rapid approach of death. He therefore supposed himself safe from all evidence but such as might arise from Hatterrack's confession; to prevent which he resolved to push a bold face, and join his brethren of the bench during his examination—"I shall be able, he thought, to make the rascal serve himself."

Mr. Glossin entered with a profound salutation to Sir Robert Hazlewood. Sir Robert received the stranger in a kinder spirit, to suspect that his plebeian neighbour had made a cat's paw of him, inclined his head softly, took snuff, and bestowed another look.

"Mr. Cornelius Glossin," to the other yoke-fellow of justice, "your most humble servant."

"Your humble servant, Mr. Glossin," answered Mr. Cornelius, "composing his countenance regis ad aspicere, that is to say, after the fashion of the Baronet."

"Mac-Morlan, my worthy friend," continued Glossin, "how do you do—always on your duty?"

"Gulp," said honest Mac-Morlan, with little respect either to the compliment or salutation. "Colonel Manning (a low bow slightly returned) and Mr. Pleydell, (another low bow,) I dare not have hoped for your assistance to poor country gentlemen at this period of the session."

Mr. Pleydell, left, and eyed him with a glance equally shrewd and sarcastic—"I'll teach him," he said aside to Manning, "the value of the old admonition, Ne accesseris in consuetudine antipomae recini."

"But perhaps it is a gentleman," said Glossin, who could not fail to observe the coldness of his reception. "Is this an open meeting?"

"For my part," said Mr. Pleydell, "so far from considering it an open meeting, I consider it as entirely private. Mr. Glossin, I was never so pleased in my life to meet with you; especially as I think we should, at any rate, have had occasion to request the favour of your company to-night, by your orders?"

"Well, then, gentlemen," said Glossin, drawing his chair to the table, and beginning to bustle about among the papers, "where are we—how far have we got?—where are the declarations?"

"Clerk, give me all these papers," said Mr. Pleydell. "I have an odd way of arranging my documents, Mr. Glossin, another person touching them, puts me out of sorts. You shall have occasion for your assistance by and by."

Glossin, thus reduced to inactivity, stole one glance at Dirk Hatterrack, but could read nothing in his face. He was not so easy to mislead, and the mance of dignity and affectation which he assumed in conversation impressed a touch of respect to his listeners. "But, gentlemen," said Glossin, "is it quite right to keep this poor man so heavily ironed, when he is taken up merely for examination?"

This was a meeting of a kind of friendly signal to the prisoner. "He escaped me before," said Mac-Morlan drily, and Glossin was silenced.

Bertram was now introduced, and, to Glossin's confusion, was given all the most friendly manner and respect by all present, even by Sir Robert Hazlewood himself. He told them his recollections of the visit, and the effects of that confident and assured expression which afforded the best warrant for his good faith. This seems to be rather a civil visit than a criminal question, said Glossin, rising; "and as you cannot be ignorant, gentlemen, of the effect which this young person's pretended parentage may have on my patrimonial interest, I would rather beg leave to ask you."

"No, my good sir," said Mr. Pleydell, "we can by no means spare you. But why do you call this young man's claims pretended? I don't mean to fish for your defence, but I should like to know, if you have anything to say, what it is."

"Mr. Pleydell," replied Glossin, "I am always disposed to act above-board, and I think I can explain the matter at once. This young fellow, whom Sir Robert Hazlewood is to look after, has had a hard time of it. He has gone about the country for some weeks under a different name, caballing with a wretched old woman, who, I understand, was shot in a late scuffle, and with other tinkers of the same description, and a great brute farmer from Liddesdale, stirring up the tenants against their landlords which, as Sir Robert Hazlewood knows, is not to interrupt you, Mr. Glossin," said Pleydell, "I ask who you say this young man is?"

"Why, I say," replied Glossin, and I believe that gentleman (looking round the room) is my young friend, the young man's a natural son of the late Ellangowan, by a girl called Janet Lighthooe, who was afterwards married to Hew the shipwright, that lived in the neighbourhood of Annan. His name is Godfrey Bertram, by whom he has been entered on board the royal Caroline excise yacht."

"Ay!" said Pleydell, "that is a very likely story!—but, not to pass upon some difference of eyes, complexion, shall be pleased to be informed."

"A young seafaring man came forward—"H'm," procedure the counsellor, "is the real Simoom?—here's Godfrey Bertram Hewit, arrived last night from the island of the most ancient, mated to a chief Indian, and in a fair way of doing well in the world, although he came somewhat irregularly into it."

While some conversation passed between the other justices and this young man, Pleydell listened from.
among the papers on the table Hatterrask's old pocket-book. A peculiar glance of the smuggler's eye indicated what he wanted. He turned it over, some thought, but the occasion of interest. He therefore continued the examination of the papers, laying the book on the table, but instantly perceived that the prisoner's interest in it. He then asked about the book, whatever it was, thought Playdell, and again applied himself to the pocket-book, until he discovered, on a narrow scrutiny, a slit between the pasted board and leathern covering he drew from the slips of paper.

Playdell now, turning to Glossin, requested the favour that he would tell him if he had assisted the search for the body of Kennedy, and the child of his, but the prisoner could not discover it.

"I did not—that is I did," answered the conscience-struck Glossin.

"It is remarkable enough," said the advocate, "that, connected as they were, the Ellangowan family, I don't recall your being examined, or even appearing before me, while that investigation was proceeding.

"I was called to London," answered Glossin, "on most important business, the morning after that sad affair."

"Clerk," said Playdell, "minute down that reply."

"I am not in the habit of giving, Mr. Glossin," said the witness, "to take these bills, drawn by Messrs. Vanbeest and Vanbruggen, and accepted by one Mr. Hatterrask in their name on the very day of the murder. I congratulate you on their being regularly paid. We never thought they had escaped."

"The piece of real evidence," continued Mr. Playdell, "makes good the account given of your conduct on this occasion by a man called Gabriel Dias, whom we have now in custody, and who witnessed the whole transaction between you and that worthy prayer. Have you any explanation to give?"

"Mr. Playdell," said Glossin, with great composure, "I presume, if you were my counsel, you would not advise me to answer upon the spur of the moment to a charge, which the basest of mankind seem scarcely fit to institute."

"My advice," said the counsel, "would be regulated by my opinion of your innocence or guilt. In your case, I believe you take the wildest course; let me assure you, you must stand committed."

"Committed? for what, sir?" replied Glossin.

"Upon a charge of murder?"

"No, only as an art and part of kidnapping the child."

"Pardon me," said Playdell, "it is plagium, and plagium is felony."

"Forgive me, Mr. Playdell; there is only one case upon which this charge can be made, and that is the abduction of the child of some young woman. Being upon honour to their employers, rather than grasp at heaven's blessing, the child is alive, murdered and sold, the body for three shillings and sixpence. They were hanged, but for the murder, not for the plagium;* your evil law has carried this a little too far."

"Well, sir; but in the meantime, Mr. Mac-Morlan must commit you to the county jail, in case this young man repeats the same story. Officers remove Mr. Glossin to Hatterrask, and guard them in different apartments."

Gabriel, the gipsy, was then introduced, and gave a distinct account of his deserting from Capt. Pritchard's vessel and joining the smugglers in the action, detailed how Dick Hatterrask set fire to his ship when he found her disabled, and under cover of the smoke escaped with his crew, and so much goods as they could secure into the cove, there they proposed to lie till night-fall. Hatterrask himself, his mate Vanbeest Brown, and three others, of whom the declarant was one, went into the adjacent woods to commit the strange crime with some of the pack in the neighbourhood. They fell in with Kennedy unexpectedly, and Hatterrask and Brown, aware that he was

CHAPTER LVII.

The next day the depositions were read. After him, fellows, dog to the block. Murther for Murder.

The jail at the county town of the sheriff's, was one of those old-fashionedæmuries which the small dark lantern. He said softly to Glossin, "Slip your shoes off, and follow me." When Glossin was out of the door, Mac-Guffog, as if in the execution of his ordinary duty, and speaking to a prisoner who was in the condemned ward, called to him, "Haggie! " and locked the door, clattering the bolts with much ostentatious noise. He then guided Glossin up a steep and narrow stair, at the top of which was the door of the cell in which the condemned prisoner was detained and unlocked it, and, giving Glossin the lantern, made a sign to him to enter, and locked the door behind him with the same affected security.

In the large dark cell in which he was thus introduced, Glossin found the light for some time enabled him to discover nothing. At length he could dimly distinguish the pallet-bed stretched on the floor beside the great iron bar which traversed the room, and on that pallet reposed the figure of a man. Glossin approached him. "Dirk Hatterrack!"

"Donner and Angel; this is his voice," said the prisoner, sitting up, and clasping his letters as he rose, "then my dream is true; Beggone and leave me to myself—it will be your best."

"What! my good friend," said Glossin, "will you allow the prospect of a few weeks' confinement to depress you?"

"Yes," answered the ruffian sullenly—"when I am only to be released by a halter!—Let me alone—go about your business, and turn the lamp from my face."

"Feath! I have been directed to take you to the condemned ward," said Glossin; "I have a glorious plan to make all right."

"To the bottomless pit with your plans!" replied his accomplice, "you have planned me out of ship, cargo, and life; and I dream of this moment that Meg Merrilies dragged you here by the hair, and gave me the longclasped knives she used to wear—you don't know what she said. Storm wetter! it will be your wisdom not to insult me!"

"But, Hatterrack, my good friend, do but rise and speak to me," said Glossin.

"I will not!" answered the savage, dolefully; "you have caused all the mischief; you would not let Meg keep the boy; she would have returned him after he had forgot all."

"Why, Hatterrack, you are turned drivelver!"

"Wetter! will you deny that all that cursed attempt at Portanberry, which lost both sloop and crew, was your device for your own job?"

"But the goods, you know!"

"Cursed goods! I said them," said the smuggler; "we could have got plenty more; but, dear me! I lost the ship and the fine fellows, and my own life, for a cursed coward villain, that always works his own mischief and lets one hold the bag. Speak to me no more—I'm dangerous."

"But, Dirk—but, Hatterrack, hear me only a few words."

"Hagel! rein!"

"Only one sentence.

"Tausand curses—men!"

"At least get up, for an obstinate Dutch brute!" said Glossin, losing his temper, and pushing Hatterrack with his foot."

"Donner and blitzen! said Hatterrack, springing up and grappling with him; "you will have it then?"

Glossin struggled and resisted; but, owing to his surprise at the fury of the assault, so indifferently, that he fell under Hatterrack, the back part of his neck coming full upon the iron bar with stunning violence. The death-grapple continued. The room immediately below the condemned ward, being that of Glossin, was, of course, empty; but the inmates of the second apartment beneath felt the shock of Glossin's heavy fall, and heard the noise as of wriggling and groans. But all sounds of horror were too congealed to this place to excite much curiosity or interest.

In the morning, faithful to his promise, Mac-Guffog came—"Mr. Glossin," said he, in a whispering voice—

"Call louder," answered Dirk Hatterrack.

"Mr. Glossin, if God's hand come away,"

"He'll hardly do that without help," said Hatterrack.
CHAPTER LVIII.

To sum the whole—the close of all. Dean Swift.

As Glossin died without heirs, and without payment of the price, the estate of Ellangowan was again thrown upon the hands of Mr. Godfrey Bertram's creditors, the right of most of whom was however not very clear. There were distinct marks of supernatural interference, that they might fill up the cup of their guilt and receive its meed by murder and suicide.

What are you chattering there for, Mac-Guflog? called out the captain from below.

Come away, for God's sake, Mr. Glossin! repeated the turnkey.

At this moment the jailor made his appearance with Mr. Glossin. Great was his surprise, and even horror, to observe Glossin's body lying doubled across the iron bar in a posture that excluded all idea of his being alive. Hatterack was quietly stretched upon his pallet within a yard of his victim. On lifting Glossin, it was found that he had been dead for some hours. His body bore uncommon marks of violence. The spine where it joins the skull had received severe injury, and the fall. The wounds were distinct marks of strangulation about the throat, which corresponded with the blackened state of his face. The head was turned backward over the shoulder, as if the neck had been broken with despair of violence. So that it would seem that his invertebrate antagonist had fixed a fatal grip upon the wretch's throat, and never quitted it while life lasted. The lantern, crushed and broken to pieces, lay beneath the body.

Mac-Morlan was in the town, and came instantly to examine the corpse. What brought Glossin here? he said to Hatterack.

The turnkey replied, I don't know. And what did you do to him?

Sent him to hell before me!—replied the turnkey.

Wretch, said Mac-Morlan, you have crowned a life spent without a single virtue with the murder of your own miserable acquaintance?

Virtue! exclaimed the prisoner; donner! I was about to marry Miss L—ynne!—always a dangerous matter—what would you think of me if you knew?—I shall take away that piece of cotton, donner, wotter?

Mac-Morlan deemed it the best way to humour the savages he was furnished with writing materials and a pen, he laid his hand upon the door. It was found that this determined villain had anticipated justice. He had adjusted a cord taken from the rudder, and attached it to a bone, the relic of his yesterday's dinner, which he had contrived to drive into a crevice between two stones in the wall at a height as great as he could reach standing upon the bar. Having fastened the noose, he had the resolution to drop his body as if to fall on his knees, and to retain the position until the execution was no longer necessary. The letter he had written to his own affairs, though chiefly upon the business of their friend—Mr. W—ynne—contained many allusions to the younger of Ellangowan, whom he believed to be the author of the late catastrophe. The turnkey had delivered him a message about a subscription to the library; and close beside was a sung well-proportioned chamber, entitled Mr. Sampson's apartment. Prodigious, prodigious, pro-di-go! shouted the wretch, as his letter was taken in.

Mr. Pleystall had left the party for some time; but he returned, according to promise, during the Christmas recess of the courts. He drove up to Ellangowan when all the family were abroad, but the Colonel, who was busy with plans of buildings and pleasure grounds, in which he was well skilled, and took great delight.

Ah ha! said the counsellor, so here you are! Where are the ladies? where is the fair Julin?—Walking out with young Harwood, Bertram, and Captain Delsarte, a friend of his, who is with us just now. They are gone to plan out a cottage at Berneghulch. Well, have you carried through your law business?

With a wet finger, answered the lawyer; got our youngest's special service restored into Chancery. We had him serve her before the nuncup.

Maccers, who are they?

Why, it is a kind of judicial Saturnalia. You must know, that one of the requisites to be a maccer, or officer in attendance upon our supreme court, is, that they shall be men of no knowledge.

Very well.

Now, our Scottish legislature, for the joke's sake, I suppose, has constituted those men of no knowledge into a peculiar court for trying questions of relationship and descent, such as this business of Bertram, which often involve the most nice and complicated questions of evidence.

The devil they have? I should think that rather inconvenient, said Manmerring.

O, we have a practical remedy for the theoretical absurdity. One or two of the judges act upon such occasions as prompters and assessor to our own doorkeepers. But you know what Cucjus says, Multa sunt in moribus disentientia, multa sine ratio. I mean this. How can you say our business; and a glorious batch of clar will have afterwards at Walker's. Mac-Morlan will stare when he sees the bill.

The singular inconsistency hinted at is now, in a great degree, removed.
“Never fear,” said the Colonel, “we'll face the shock, and entertain the county at my friend Mrs. Mac-Candlish's to boot.”

“And choose Jock Jabos for your master of horse?” replied the lawyer.

“Perhaps I may.”

“And where is Dandie, the redoubted Lord of Lid death?” demanded the advocate.

“Returned to his mountains; but he has promised Julia to make a descent in summer, with the good-wife, as he calls her, and I don’t know how many children.”

“O, the curly-headed varlets! I must come to play at Blind Harry and Hy Spy with them.—But what is all this?” asked Pleydell, taking up the plans—

“tower in the centre to be an imitation of the Eagle Tower at Caernarvon—corps de logis—the devil—wings—wings? why, the house will take the estate of Ellangowan on its back, and fly away with it!”

“Why then, we must ballast it with a few bags of Sicca rupees,” replied the Colonel.

“Aha! sits the wind there? Then I suppose the young dog carries off my mistress Julia?”

“Even so, counsellor.”

“These rascals, the post-nati, get the better of us of the old school at every turn,” said Mr. Pleydell.

“But she must convey and make over her interest in me to Lucy.”

“To tell you the truth, I am afraid your flank will be turned there too,” replied the Colonel.

“Indeed?”

“Here has been Sir Robert Hazlewood,” said Mannerling, “upon a visit to Bertram, thinking, and deeming, and opining”—

“O Lord! I pray spare me the worthy Baronet’s triade!”

“Well, sir,” continued Mannerling; “to make short, he conceived that as the property of Singleside lay like a wedge between two farms of his, and was four or five miles separated from Ellangowan, something like a sale, or exchange, or arrangement might take place, to the mutual convenience of both parties.”

“Well, and Bertram”—

“Why, Bertram replied, that he considered the original settlement of Mrs. Margaret Bertram as the arrangement most proper in the circumstances of the family, and that therefore the estate of Singleside was the property of his sister.”

“The rascal!” said Pleydell, wiping his spectacles, “he'll steal my heart as well as my mistress—Et puis?”

“And then, Sir Robert retired after many gracious speeches; but last week he again took the field in force, with his coach and six horses, his laced scarlet waistcoat, and best bob-wig—all very grand, as the good-boy books say.”

“Ay! and what was his overtture?”

“Why, he talked with great form of an attachment on the part of Charles Hazlewood to Miss Bertram.”

“Ay, ay; he respected the little god Cupid when he saw him perched on the Dun of Singleside. And a poor Lucy to keep house with that old fool and his wife, who is just the knight himself in petticoats?”

“No—we carried that. Singleside-house is to be repaired for the young people, and to be called hereafter Mount Hazlewood.”

“And do you yourself, Colonel, propose to continue at Woodbourne?”

“Only till we carry these plans into effect. See, here's the plan of my Bungalow, with all conveniences for being separate and sulky when I please.”

“And, being situated, as I see, next door to the old castle, you may repair Donagild's tower for the eternal contemplation of the celestial bodies? Bravo, Colonel!”

“No, no, my dear counsellor! Here ends the Astronomer.”

END OF GUY MANNERING.
ADDITIONAL NOTE TO GUY MANNERING.

EGIAN LOCALITIES AND PERSONAGES WHICH HAVE BEEN SUPPOSED TO BE ALLUDED TO IN THE NOVEL.

English proverb says, that more know Tom Fool than old man; and the inference of the said story is, that the habit of taking the old man's advice is not a common one. The proverb is pretty much a truth, as it is very difficult to find a person who has been so fortunate as to hear it spoken by an old man himself.

The story is supposed to be true, and is, in fact, a very good story. It is related by an old man, who has been known to be a very wise man, and is, therefore, entitled to be believed.

In his youth he occasionally took an evening walk on the highway, with the purpose of assisting travelers by relieving them of the weight of their purses. On one occasion, the Cairl of Brunston robbed the Laird of Bargay, at a place between Carphairn and Dalmally. His purpose was not achieved without a severe struggle, in which the Gipsey lost his bonnet, and was obliged to escape, leaving it on the road. A respectible farmer happened to be the next passenger, and seeing the bonnet, alighted, took it up, and rather imprudently put it on his own head. At this juncture a young woman came up and took the bonnet off, and recognizing the bonnet, charged the farmer of Dalmally with having robbed it, and took him into custody. There being some likeness between the parties, Bargay persisted in his charge; but, in the absence of the respectability of the farmer's character, was proved or admitted, and the case was brought before the Circuit Court on the following day. The bailiff lay on the table of the court; Bargay swore that it was the identical article worn by the man who robbed him; and he and others likewise deposed that they had found the accursed on the spot where the crime was committed, with the bonnet on his head. The case looked ghastly for the prisoner, and the opinion of the judge seemed unfavourable. But suddenly the prisoner turned to a woman who knew well both who did, and who did not, commit the crime. This was the Cairl of Brunston, who had himself put the bonnet on the table, near the place where Bargay was standing, suddenly seized on the bonnet, put it on his head, and looked into the Laird full in the face, with a terrible expression, which attracted the attention of the Court and crowded audience.

"Look at me, sir, and tell me, by the oath, you have sworn, Am I not the man who robbed you between Carphairn and Dalmally?" Bargay replied, in great astonishment. "By Heaven! you are the very man." You see what respect for memory this gentleman has," said the volunteer pleader; "he never forgot our meeting. If you yourself, my Lord, will put it on your head, he will be willing to swear that your Lordship was the party who robbed him between Carphairn and Dalmally. Deuce take me, the man was recognized at once; Bargay was unvanquished, and thus Willie Marshal was acquitted. To prevent any misunderstanding, it is worth observing that the Gipsey, who had been convicted of the crime, was acquitted without incurring any himself, since Bargay's evidence must have seemed to every one too flattering to be relied upon.

While the King of the Gipseys was thus fraudulently occupied, his royal consort, Flora, contrived, it is said, to steal the hood which was on the head of the Judge's gown; and, for the offence, was fined ten pounds. The prisoner was a presumptuous gait, a gipsey, she was banished to New England, whence she never returned.

"Now, I cannot grant that the idea of Meg Merriles was, in the first confection of the character, derived from Flora Marshal, seeing I have already said she was identified with Jean Gordon, and as I have not the Laird of Bargay's apology for charging the same fact on two several individuals. Yet I am quite content that Meg should be considered as a representative of her sect and class in general—Flora, as well as others.

The other instances in which the Gallovian readers have obliged me, by assigning to shall also be sanctioned so far as the Author may be entitled to do so. I think the facetious Joe Miller records a case pretty well preserved in a nice point; where the name of Mike, a kilowatt showing, as he said, the very sword with which Balsam was about to kill his ass, was interrupted by one of the villagers, who reminded him that Balsam was not possessed of a sword, but only wished for one.

"True, sir," replied the ready-witted Cicero: "but this is the very sword he wished for." The Author, in application of this story, has only to add, that though ignorant of the coincidence between the story of Willie Marshal and some of the circumstances, he is contented to believe he must unconsciously have thought or dreamed of the last, while engaged in the composition of Guy Manners.

"Item, to Dr. Young, the last day of Juni to Doctor Young, Dean of Winchester, Edimmay, forty to his Majesty, twelve to the purses, to be given to the pair in the way in his Majesty's progress, Ind. xxvi b. viii l."

I have only to add, that although the institution of King's Bedesmen still exists, they are now seldom to be seen on the streets of Edinburgh, of which their peculiar dress made them an object of curiosity.

Having given this account of the garments to which Edimmay appertains, the author may add, that the individual he has in his eye was Andrew Gemmell, an old resident of the character described, who was many years since well known, and must still be remembered, in the value of George Trodd, colours that have made him last. He is still resident at the Palace, and is said to have offered his hat, but with the least possible degree towards each individual who passed. This man's knowledge of the extant and vanished appearances from a remote country, the same tribute which was paid to Andrew Gemmell's superior knowledge of the present.

He was understood to be able to maintain a son in a theological college of the University, at the gate of whose father was a mendicant. The young man was modest and learned, so that a student of the same age, parents were rather on the other hand, the Hall, could understand how to accept his passages. The scholar drew out a halfpenny, he concluded was the beggar's object, when he went to receive his thanks for the kindness he had shown, and at the same time a cordial invitation to dine with the scholar, the next day, a subscription of sixpence. "Yes, I'll eat on your clean war," I have company," I would strongly recommend him to the house of the hospital, a many in his place would probably have done; but, the more time he had been engaged of a mendicant, it was most prudent, considering the character and circum-stance the old man, to decline the invitation.

Such are a few traits of Scottish mendicancy, designed light on a Novel in which a character of that sort descries a prominent part. We conclude, that we have with Mr. Cheal's right to the importance assigned him shown, that we have known one beggar take a list with a person of distinction, and another give almost every penny that was asked. I know not if it be worth while to observe, that this character was so well regarded on its first appearance of its predecessors, in course of time it rose to some readers, superior popularity.
THE ANTIQUARY.

CHAPTER I.

"Go call a coach, and let a coach be called, And let the man who calleth be the caller; And in his calling let him utter nothing call, But Coach! Coach! Coach! 0 for a coach, ye gods!"

Carus-Walsingham.

It was early on a fine summer's day, near the end of the eighteenth century, when a young man, of genteel appearance, journeying towards the north-east of Scotland, provided himself with a ticket in one of those public carriages which travel between Edinburgh and the Queen's Ferry, at which place, as the name implies, and as is well known to all my northern readers, there is a passage-boat for crossing the Frith of Forth. The coach was calculated to carry eight regular passengers, besides such interlopers as the coachman could pick up by the way, and intrude upon those who were legally in possession. The tickets, which conferred right to a seat in this vehicle of old date, were dispensed by a sharp-looking old dame, with a pair of spectacles on a very thin nose, who inhabited a "leigh shop," angles, a celler, opening to the High-street by a steep and steep stair, at the bottom of which she sold tape, thread, needles, skirts of worsted, coarse linen cloth, and such feminine gear, to those who had come from towns and skill devoted to the pro-

The written hand-bill, which, posted on a projecting board, announced that the Queen's Ferry Diligence, or Hawes Fly, departed precisely at twelve o'clock on Tuesday, the fifteenth July, 17--, in order to secure for travellers the opportunity of passing the Frith with the flood-tide, was put on the present occasion like a bulletin; for although that hour was passed from Saint Giles' steeple, and repeated by the Tryon, no coach appeared upon the appointed stand. It is true, only two tickets had been taken at all, and possibly the lady of the subterranean manse might have an understanding with her Automo-

The young gentleman, who began to grow somewhat impatient, was now joined by a companion in this petty misery of human life—the person who had taken out the other place. He who is bent upon a journey is usually easy to be distinguished from his fellow-citizens. The boots, the great-cost, the umbrella, the little bundle in his hand, the hat pulled up over his resolved brows, the determinate shake of his pace, his brief answers to the salutations of lounging acquaintances, are all marks by which the experienced traveller in mail-coach or diligence can distinguish, at a distance, the companion of his future journey, as he pushes onward to the place of rendezvous. It is then that, with worldly wisdom, the first comer hastens to secure the best birth in the coach for himself and his goods, and the most convenient arrangement for his baggage before the arrival of his competitors. Our youth, who was gifted with little prudence of any sort, and who was, moreover, by the absence of the coach, deprived of the power of availing himself of his priority of choice, amused himself, instead, by speculating upon the occupa-

He was a good-looking man of the age of sixty, perhaps older, but his hair complexion and firm step announced that years had not impaired his strength or health. His countenance was of the true Scottish cast, strongly marked, and rather harsh in features, with a shrewd and penetrating eye, and a countenance in which habitual gravity was enlivened by a cast of ironical humour. His dress was uniform, and of a colour becoming his age and gravity; a wig, well dressed and powdered, surmount-

He arrived with a hurried pace, and casting an alarmed glance towards the direct-post of the church, then looking at the place where the coach should have been, exclaimed, "Deil's in it—I am too late after all!"

The young man relieved his anxiety, by telling him the coach had not yet appeared. The old gentleman, now fully conscious of his own want of punctuality, did not at first feel courageous enough to censure that of the coachman. He took a parcel, containing apparently a large folio, from a little boy who followed him, and, putting him on the head, bid him go back and tell Mr. B——, that if he had known he was to have had so much time, he would have put another word or two to their bargain,—then told the boy to mind his business, and he would be as thriving a lad as ever dusted a duode-

At length, after one or two impatient glances at the progress of the minute-hand of the clock, having compared it with his own watch, a huge and antique gold repeater, and having twitched about his features to give due emphasis to one or two peevish peahaws, he hailed the old lady of the cavern.

"Good woman,—what is the d—— is her name?—" Mrs. Macleuchar?"

"Mrs. Macleuchar, aware that she had a defensive part to sustain in the encounter which was to follow, was so busy to hasten the discussion by returning a ready answer.

"Mz. Macleuchar—Good woman," (with an elevated voice)—then apart, "Old doited hag, she's as desit as a postbox, no more, my dearn, Mrs. Macleuchar!"

"I am just serving a customer.—Indeed, binny, it will no be a boddy cheaper than I tell ye,"

"Woman," retorted the traveller, "do you think we can stand here all day till you have cheated that poor servant wench out of her half-year's fee and bounth?"

"Cheated!" retorted Mrs. Macleuchar, eager to take up the quarrel upon a plausible sound; "I scorn your words, sir; you are an uncivil person, and I desire you will not stand there to slander me in public!"
"The woman," said the senior, looking with an arch glance at his destined travelling companion, "does not understand the words of action,—Woman, more especially to the vulgar and ignorant not very well character, but I desire to know what is become of thy coach?"

"What's your will?" answered Mrs. Macleuchar, relating such a case. "We have taken places, ma'am," said the younger stranger, "in your diligence for Queenferray."

"Which should have been half-way on the road before we went off, and the other impatient traveller, rising in wrath as he spoke: "and now in all likelihood we shall miss the tide, and I have business of importance on the other side—and your cursed coach!"

"The coach?—guide us, gentlemen, is it no on the stand yet?" answered the old lady, her shrill tone of expostulation sinking into a kind of apologetic hint. "Is it the coach ye has been waiting for?"

"What else could have kept us broling in the sun by the side of the gutter here, you—you faithless woman! Eh?"

Mrs. Macleuchar now ascended her trap stairs, (for such it might be called, though constructed of stone,) until her nose came upon a level with the pavement; then she took the reins, looked some time at which she well knew was not to be found, she exclaimed, with well-feigned astonishment, "Guide us—saw everbody the like of that?"

"The coach, the coach!" the old traveller replied. "The world is a wondrous place for the man who searches it. He would bring me where he would, if only the coach were a little more punctual."

"Many have seen the like of it, and all will see the like of it, that have any thing to do with the trollopising sex,"—then, pacing with great indignation before the door of the shop, still as he passed and espoused, like a vessel which gives her broadside as he comes abreast of a hostile fortress, he shot down complaints, threats, and reproaches, on the embarrassed Macleuchar. He would take a good deal of chasing—he would call a hackney-coach—he would take four horses—he must—he would be on the north side to-day—and all the expense of his journey, besides damages, direct and consequential, arising from delay, should be accumulated on the devoted head of Mrs. Macleuchar.

There was something so comic in his pettish resentment, that the younger traveller, who was in such pressing hurry to depart, could not help being amused with it, especially as it was obvious, that every now and then the old gentleman, though very angry, did not know how to hold his own venge ance. But when Mrs. Macleuchar began also to join in the laughter, he quickly put a stop to her ill timed merriment.

"Of course, the 'advertisement thing,'" showing a bit of crumpled printed paper: "Does it not set forth, that, God willing, as you hypocritically express it, the Hawes Fly; or Queenferray Diligence, would set forth to-day at twelve o'clock, and is it not, thou fullest of creatures, now a quarter past twelve, and no such fly or diligence to be seen?—Doth thou know the consequence of seducing the lieges by false reports?—Doth thou know it might be brought under the statute of: leasing-making? Answer; and for once in thy long, useless, and evil life, let it be in the words of truth and sincerity—hast thou no sense of nature, or is this base announcement a mere swindle on the incautious, to beguile them of their time, their patience, and three shillings of sterling money of this realm?—Hast thou, I say, such a coach? ay or no?"

"O dear, yes, sir; the neighbours kon the diligence well, green picked out wi' red—three yellow wheels and a black ane."

"Not so fast, not so fast, woman—will three shillings transport me to Queenferray, agreeable to thy advertisement program?—or will it return the damage—"

I may sustain by leaving my business undone, a repay the expenses which I must discharge, if I am obliged to tarry a day at the South Ferry for lack of tide?—Well, sir, I say, a programme, for which alone the regular price five shillings,

Here his argument was cut short by a tumultuous noise, which proved to be the advance of the expected vehicle pressing forward with all the despatch in which the broken window rendered it could possibly be urged. With malleable pleasure, Mrs. Macleuchar saw her tormentor deposited in the vehicle, with the letters of impatience, the words drowned amid the rumbling of the wheels, that, if the diligence did not attain the Ferry in time to save that nuisance, she, Mrs. Macleuchar, should be held responsible for all the consequences that might ensue.

The coach had continued in motion for a mile or two before the stranger had completely possessed himself of his equanimity, as was manifested by the doleful ejaculations, which he made from time to time, on the too great probability, or very certainty, of their missing the flood-tide. By degrees, however, his wrath subsided; he winked his blue brow, relaxed his frown, and, undoing the parcel in his hand, produced his folio, on which he gazed from time to time with great veneration, admiring its height and condition, and ascertaining for a minute and individual inspection of each leaf, that the volume was uninjured and entire from title-page to last leaf. We are here, indeed, respecting the subject of his studies. He lifted up his eyes with something of a sarcastic glance, as if he supposed the young querist would not relish, or perhaps understand, the volume of quadrupeds, and pronounced the book to be Sandy Gordon's Itinerarium Scotiae, a book illustrative of the Roman remains in Scotland. The querist, unappalled by this learned title, profoundly assented, which indicated that he had made good use of a good education, and, although not possessed of minute information on the subject of antiquities, had yet acquaintance enough with the classics to render him an interested and intelligent auditor when they were enlarged upon. The elder traveller, observing with pleasure the capacity of his temporary companion to understand and answer him, plunged, nothing loth, into a sea of discussion concerning urns, vases, votive altars, Roman camps, and the rules of cartomancy.

The pleasure of this discourse had such a dullifying tendency, that although two causes of delay occurred, each of much more serious duration than that which had drawn down his wrath upon the unluckily Macleuchar, our hero, so far as to stow the delay the honour of a few quid pro quo pools and peashaws, which rather seemed to repair the interruption of his dissertation than the retardation of his journey.

The first of these stops was occasioned by the breaking of a spring, which half an hour's labour hardly repaired. To the second, the Antiquary was himself necessary, if not the principal cause of it, for, observing that one of the horses had cast a forefoot shoe, he apprised the coachman of this important deficiency.

"It's Jamie Martin's that furnishes the nails on twitter"—answered Macleuchar, our hero, and the coachman, after a brief pause, stowed the delay the honour of a few quid pro quo pools and peashaws, which rather seemed to repair the interruption of his dissertation than the retardation of his journey.

And when you go to—I mean to the place you deserve to go to, you scoundrel,—do you think that will uphold you on contract? If you don't, you'll be five shillings too poor brute to do the next spring, I'll have you punished, if there is a woman or a man in Mid-Lothian, and, opening the coach door, set he jumped, while the coachman obeyed his orders, without uttering a word, and the gentleman, who lost the five shillings, could not say it was their fault, since he was willing to get on."

I like so little to analyze the complication of the causes with the incidence actions, as I will not venture to ascertain whether our Antiquary's honestly..."
to the poor horse was not in some degree aided by his desire of showing his companion a pilot's camp, or round-about, a subject of which he had been eloquent, but the host of the inn, who was the gentleman in the sober suit, with powdered wig and slouched hat. I should say, that although he certainly would not in any case have employed the coachman to proceed while the horse was unfit for service, and likely to suffer by being urged forward, yet the man of whipcord escaped some severe abuse and reproach by the agreement, which the traveller found out to pass the interval of delay.

So much time was consumed by these interludes of their journey, that when they descended the hill above the Hawes, (for so the inn on the southern side of the Queensberry is designated,) the experienced eye of the Antique at once discerned, from the extent of wet sand, and the number of footprints, and rocks, covered with sea-weed, which were visible along the skirts of the shore, that the hour of tide was past. The young traveller expected a burst of indignation; but, whether, as Socrates might say, Good mildly, or, as one who had exhausted himself in fretting away his misfortunes beforehand, so that he did not feel them when they actually arrived, or whether he found the situation of the case too interesting, and could not bear to have indulged in such repining at any thing which delayed his journey, it is certain that he submitted to his lot with much resignation.

The diligence and the old bag it belongs to—Diligence, quoth I? Thou shouldst have called it the Sloth—Fly!—quoth she? why, it moves like a fly through a blue-gout, as the Irishman says. But a less genuine, and yet a more natural inquiry of the history of the Hawes, had so, my young friend, we'll have a stack here at the Hawes, which is a very decent sort of a place, and I'll be very happy to finish the account I was giving you of the difference between the modes of intertreating castra stationes and castra saxo, things confounded by too many of our historians. Lackaday, if they had taken the pains to satisfy their own eyes instead of following each other's blind guidance!—Well, we shall be pretty comfortable at the Hawes; and besides, after all, we must have dined somewhere, and it will be pleasant sailing with the tide of the day.

In this Christian temper of making the best of all occurrences, our travellers alighted at the Hawes.

CHAPTER II.

Sir, they do scandal me upon the road here! A poor squalid rack of mustaves roasted dry to be grated! and that driven down with beer and better-milk, mingled together. Where is the word that glads the heart of man, and makes the house of wise? Such says my bash, do marry and drink tarry, that's my epistle.

New Jomson's New Men.

As the senior traveller descended the crazy steps of the diligence at the inn, he was greeted by the master of the inn, Mr. Roderick, Roderick, with a similitude and respect which the Scotch innkeepers of the old school used to assume towards their more abundant customers.

"Have a care o' us, Monkbars, (distinguishing him by his territorial epithet, always most agreeable to the ear of a Scottish proprietor,) is this you? I think safe to have seen your honour here till the time of your departure."

"Ye donnard auld deevil," answered his guest, "is Scottish accent predominating when in anger, though otherwise not particularly remarkable—ye connard said stupid idiot that have I to do with session, or the gueese that flock to it, or the aweke that pick their pinions for them?"

"True, and that's true," said mine host, who, in, not, only spoke upon a very general recollection of the provest of the town during that ill-fated year, and had exerted himself with much spirit in favour of King George himself, and the new monarch was on his score, which, according to the liberal conduct of the existing government towards their friends, had never been repaid him. By dint of solicitation, however, and of a present he got to be a place in the customs, and, being a frugal, careful man, had found himself enabled to add considerably to his paternal fortune. He had only two sons, of whom, as he owns, he was more attached to the younger, and two daughters, one of whom still flourished in single blessedness, and the other, who was greatly more juvenile, made a love-match with a captain in the navy; and, as he says, 'is happy.' But his commission and a Highland pedigree. Poverty disturbed a union which love would otherwise have made happy, and Captain McIntyre, in justice to his wife and two children, a boy and girl, had found himself obliged to seek his fortune in the East Indies. Being ordered upon an expedition against Hyder Ali, the detachment to which he belonged was cut off, and no news ever reached his unfortunate wife whether he fell in battle, or was murdered in prison, or survived, in what the habits of the Indian tyrant rendered a hopeless captivity. She sunk under the accumulated weight of grief, and left a son and daughter to the charge of her brother, the existing Laird of Monkbars.

The history of that proprietor himself is soon told. Before his elevation to a second son, his father destined him to a share in a substantial mercantile concern, carried on by some of his paternal relations. Thus Jonathon's first ambition was realized in the most irreconcilable manner. He was then put apprentice to the profession of a writer, or attorney, in which he profited so far, that he made himself master of the whole forms of feudal investitures, and showed such pleasure in reconciling their incongruities, and tracing their origin, that his master had great hope he would one day be an able conveyancer. But he had not很长 to push in the way he acquired some knowledge of the origin and system of the law of his country, he could never be persuaded to apply it to lucrative and practical purposes. It was not from any inconsiderate neglect of the advantages attending the possession of money that he thus deceived the hopes of his master. "Were he, thoughtless or light-hearted, or res se profigus," said his instructor, "I would know what to make of him. But he never pays away a shilling without looking anxiously after the change, makes his sixpence go farther than another lad's half-crown, and will postpone the pleasure of being clothed to the necessity of the change for days, rather than go to the golf or the change-house; and yet he will not bestow one of these days on a little business of routine, that would put twenty shillings in his pocket—a strange mixture of frugality and industry, and negligent indolence—I don't know what to make of him.

But in process of time his pupil gained the means of making what he pleased of himself; for his father having died, was not long survived by his eldest son, an arrant fisher and fowler, who departed this life, in consequence of a cold caught in his vacation, while shooting ducks in the swamp called Little-fitting-moss, notwithstanding his having drunk a bottle of brandy that very night to keep the cold out of his stomach. Jonathan, therefore, succeeded to the estate, and with it to the means of subsisting without the hatted drudgery of the law. His wishes were more moderate; and as the rent of his small property rose with the improvement of the country, it soon greatly exceeded his wants and expenditure; and though too indolent to make money, he was by no means insensible to the pleasure of beholding it accumulate in the family coffers. It is a saying which he regarded him with a sort of envy, as one who affected to divide himself from their rank in society, and whose studies and pleasures seemed to them alike incompatible: a sort of hereditary respect for the Laird of Monkbars, augmented by the knowledge of his being a ready-money man, kept up his consequence with this class of his neighbours. The country gentlemen generally above him in fortune, and beneath him a not insconsiderable number, with other pursuits and pleasures, in being in correspondence with most of the virtuous of his time, who, like himself, measured decayed entertainments, made plans of round the town in pursuit of his lady, and a share in the essays on medals in the proportion of twelve pages to each letter of the legend. Some habits of hasty irritation he had contracted, partly, it was said in the Joseph's Green, partly from his breeding in love, in virtue of which he had commenced a mystic, as he called it, but yet more by the obsequious attention paid to him by his maiden sister and his orphan niece, whom he had trained to consider him as the greatest man upon earth, and whom he used to boast of as the only women he had ever seen who were well broke in and biddt to obedience; though, it must be owned, Miss Grizzy Olduck was sometimes apt to jibb when he pulled the reins to tight. The rest of his character must be gathered from the story, and we dismiss with pleasure the "Eumaeus tas arcas aris aris libatur, ut gregem suum nutrire.

During the time of dinner, Mr. Olduck, actuated by the same curiosity which his fellow-traveller had entertained on his account, made some advances which his host said he would communicate with more direct manner, towards ascertainment the name, destination, and quality of his young companion.

"His name, the young gentlemen said, was Lovel. "What! the cat, the rat, and Lovel, our dog. Was he descended from King Richard's favourite?"

"He had no pretensions," he said, "to call himself a whelp of that litter; his father was a north-of-England gentleman. He was at present travelling near to Fairport, a town near to which Monkbars was situated, and, if he found the place agreeable, might perhaps remain there for some weeks."

"Was Mr. Lovel's excursion solely for pleasure?"

"Not entirely."

"Perhaps on business with some of the commercial people of Fairport?"

"It was partly on business, but had no reference to commerce."

Here he paused; and Mr. Olduck having pushed his inquiries as far as good manners permitted, was obliged to seek his seat at the table, and was suffered to remain there, unobliged to the company of the table. He laid his hand upon the bell to order the materials. But Mackitchin had, in his own mind, settled their beverage otherwise, and appeared bending in his hand an immense double quartz bottle, or magnum, as it is called in Scotland, covered with saw-dust and cobwebs, the warrant of its antiquity.

"Punch!" he said, catching that generous sound as he entered the parlour, "the deil a drop punch ye've get here the day, Monkbars, and that ye mar lay your account with."

"What do you mean, you impudent rascal?"

"Ay, ay, it's nae matter for that—but do ye mind the trick ye served me the last time ye was here?"

"I trick you!"

"Ay, just yourself, Monkbars. The Laird o' Tamlowrie, and Sir Gilbert Grizzleleugh, and Auld Roseball, and the Bain, we're just setting it to make an end, and ye, and yon, ye o' the old-world stories, that the mind o' man cantna resist, whir'd them to the back o' beyond to licht at the auld Roman camp—Ah, sir!" turning to Lord
CHAPTER III.

He had a youth o' said nick-mackets,
Rusty rim caps, and jaunty jackets,
With a capacious tobacco pouch and tobacco
A towedom guide;
And partridge-patch, and red neckerchiefs,
Afore the rudes.

After he had settled himself in his new apartments at Fairport, Mr. Lovel betook himself of paying the requested visit to his fellow-traveller. He did not make so much of the old gentleman's good humour and information, there had sometimes glanced forth in his language and manner towards him an air of superiority, which his companion could not bear, and which he bore fully by what the diffERENCE of age warranted. He therefore contrived the arrival of his baggage from Edinburgh, that he might arrange his dress according to the fashion of the day, and make his exterior corresponding to the rank in society which he supposed or felt himself entitled to hold.

It was the fifth day after his arrival, that, having made the necessary inquiries concerning the road, he went forth to pay his respects at Monkbarns. A path leading over a healthy hill, and through two or three meadows, conducted him to this mansion, which stood on the opposite side of the hill aforesaid, and commanded him a prospect of the town and shipping. Secluded from the town by the rising ground, which also screened it from the north-west wind, the house had a solitary and sheltered appearance. The exterior looked antique, and very recommendable.

A regular old-fashioned building, some part of which had belonged to a grange, or solitary farm-house, inhabited by the beflor, or steward, of the monastery.
When the place was in possession of the monks,
it was here that the community stored up the grain, which they received as ground-rent from their vass-ales; for, with the prudence belonging to their order, all their other revenues were swallowed up like that kind, and hence, as the present proprietor loved to tell, came the name of Monkbarns. To the remains of the beflor's house, the succeeding lay inhabitants had made various additions in proportion to the accommodation required by their families; and, as this was done with an equal contempt of convenience within and architectural regularity without, the whole bore the appearance of a hamlet which had suddenly stood still when in the act of leading down one of Amphon's or Orpheus's country dances. It was surrounded by broken hedges of lavender and holly, some of which still evidenced the skill of the topiarist,* and presented curious arm-chairs, towers, and the figures of Saint George and the dragon. The mansion of the old beflor was, however, as ancient as the first; and, on a garden seat beneath its shade, Lovel beheld his old friend with spectacles on nose, and pouch on side, bustily employed in perusing the London Chronicle, soothed by the summer breeze through the rustling leaves, and the distant dash of the waves as they rippled upon the sand.

Mr. Oldbuck immediately rose, and advanced to greet his travelling acquaintance. He was a hearty shake of the hand, from "by my faith," said he, "I began

THE ANTIQUARY.

call it, for, except two idle husies of womankind, (by this contemptuous phrase, borrowed from his brother antiquary, the cynic Anthony a Wood, Mr. Old buck was used to denote the sex in general, and his sister and niece in particular,) that on some idle person's delusion, these three and themselves in my premises, I live here as much a Cenobite as my predecessor, John o' the Gurnell, whose grave I will allow you by and by. Thus far, my dear sir, I continued to be, as Mr. Lovel, the time and trouble that these mouldering traces of letters have cost me! No mother ever travailed so for a child—and all to no purpose—although I am almost positive that these two last marks imply the figures, or letters, I.V. and may give us a good guess at the real date of the building, since we know, ifinde, that it was founded by Aubbot Waldrimbir about the middle of the fourteenth century, and, I profess, I think that centre ornament might be made out by better eyes than mine.

"I think" answered Lovel, willing to humour the old man, "it has something the appearance of a metre."

"I protest you are right! you are right! it never struck me before—see what it is to have younger eyes—and a different sort of a taste."

The resemblance was not much nearer than that of Polonius's cloud to a whale, or an owl; it was sufficient, however, to set the antiquary's brains to work. A mind, my dear sir, continued to be, as he led the way through a labyrinth of convenience and dark passages, and accompanied his disquisition with certain necessary cautions to his guest. A mind, my dear sir, continued to be, as a bishop—he was a mitred abbot, and at the very top of the roll—take care of these three steps—I know Miss Cribb denies this, but it is as certain as that he too will be indicated—by the name of the Abbot of Trottoisey, Abbás Trottocesius, at the head of the rolls of parliament in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries—there is very little right here, and these cursed womankind always leave their tubs in the passage—now take care of the corner—ascend twelve steps, and ye are safe!"

Mr. Old buck had, by this time, attained the top of the gallery, where he seated himself and opened a door, and pushing aside a piece of tapestry with which it was covered, his first exclamation was, "What are you about here, you slut?" A little terrapin, from down her dungeon, detected in the heinous fact of arranging the sanctum sanctorum, and fled out of an opposite door from the side of an incensed master. A gentle-looking young woman, who was conducting the operation, stood her ground, but with some timidity.

"Indeed, uncle, your room was not fit to be seen, and I just came to see that Jenny laid everything down where she took it up."

"And how dare you, or Jenny either, presume to meddle with my private matters? (Mr. Old buck hated putting to rights as much as Dr. Orkborne, or any other professed student.) Go sew your sampler, you monkey, and do not let me find you here again, as you value your ears—" I assure you, Mr. Lovel, the eyes of these professed friends to cleanliness was almost as fatal to my collection as Hudibras's visit to that of Sidrophel; and I have ever since missed

"My opposite, with almanacs
Gazed upon't, and other knacks;
My moon-dial, with Napier's bones,
And several constellation stones.
By etc., my monopanol, and possibles,
I purchased for my proper case.

And so forth, as old Butler has it."

And the lady, after curtseying to Lovel, had taken the opportunity to make her escape during this enumeration of losses. "You'll be poisoned here with the volumes of dust they have raised," continued the Antiquary; "but I assure you the dust was very ancient, peaceful, quiet dust, about an hot these gases disturbed it, as they do every in the world."

It was, indeed, some time before Lt. through the thick atmosphere, preserved it of den his friend had constructed his rette a lofty room of middling size, obscurely high narrow latticed windows. One or the other occasionally by book-shees, with sufficient space for the number of volumes placed which were, therefore, drawn up in ranks three feet deep, while numberless others floor and table and cabinet and book-cases, rugs, scap, of parchment, bundles of paper old armour, swords, dirks, helmets, and targets. Behind Mr. Old buck's seat, (wh ancient leather-covered easy-chair, worn constant use,) was a huge oaken cabinet at each corner with Dutch chests, having duck-wings displayed, and great jolter-heat placed between them. The top of this covered with busts, and Roman lampes intertwined, with one or two bronze fig walls of the apartment were partly clothed old tapestry representing the meeting of Owain Gwawne's wedding, in which full justice to the ugliness of the Lothely Lady; al judges from his own looks, the gentle knight reason to the disparity of outward favour, than the rox given to us to understand. The rest of the panelled, or wainscotted, with black painted, or which hung two or three portraits of characters in Scottish history, favourites buck, and as many in tie-wags and in stars representing of his own ancestor, old-fashioned table was elegantly dressed by a decision of papers, parchments, books, and trinkets and gow-gaws, which seemed to recommend them, besides rust and the which it filled with ancient books and utensils, with a gravi Marius among the ruins of Carthage, a black cat, which, to a superstitious eye, presented the genius loci, the tutelar der apartment. The floor, as well as the table was overflowed by the same mægal cellaneous trumpery, where it would ha impossible to find and off a single article to put to it any use when discovered.

Amid this medley, it was no easy matter to find a chair to sit down in, without stumbling traverse over the objects, without danger of overturning some piece of Roman or anci pottery. And, when the chair was attained be discerned, with a careful hand, of which might have received daring degradation spurs and buckles, which would certainly consigned it to any sudden occupant. (Antiquary made Lovel particularly aware that his friend, the Rev. Doctor Henry the Low Countries, had sustained much sitting down suddenly and incalculably ancient castrum, or cross-face, which had dug up in the bog near Bannockburn, dispersed by Robert Bruce to lacerate the English chargers, came thus in process for and damage the sitting part of a learned \textit{ps Utrecht.}

Having at length fairly seated himself, nothing loath to make inquiry concerning objects around him, whose history was far as possible, to explain, Lovel was to a large club, or bludgeon, with an iron end of it, which, it seems, had been lately field on the monk's grave property, and accordin burying ground. It had mightily the air stick the Highland reapers use to wa their standing pergurations from their n but Mr. Old buck was strongly that, as its shape was singular, it might one of the clubs with which the monks a peasants in lieu of more martial weapon
"Even, I, sir," he went on, "though far inferior in industry, and discernment, and presence of mind, to that great man, can show you a few, a very few collected observations, which I have made in my time; and, as much as any wealthy man might,—although, as my friend Lucian says, he might chance to throw away his coin only to illustrate his ignorance,—but gained from a manner that I know better than the matter. See this bundle of ballots, not one of them later than 1700, and some of them a hundred years older. I wheeled an old woman out of these, who loved them better than her snuff, and the Complete Statesman, were the equivalent. For that mutilated copy of the Complaynt of Scotland, I sat out the drinking of two dozen bottles of strong ale with the late learned proprietor; who, in gratitude, bequeathed it to me by his last will. These little Elzevirs are the memoranda and trophies of many a walk by night and morning through the Cowgate, the Canongate, the Bow, Saint Mary's Wynd,—whenever, in fine, there were to be found brokers and takers, those miscellaneous dealers in things rare and curious. How often have I stood haggling on a halfpenny, lest, by a too subtle essence in the dealings of first price, she should be led to suspect the value I set upon the article,—now have I trembled, lest some passing stranger should drop in between me and the prize, and regarded each poor student of divinity, who stoppered up in the books at the stall, as a rival amateur, or prowling bookseller in disguise! —And then, Mr. Lovel, the sly satisfaction with which one pays the consideration, and pockets the article, not considering, as you, while the hand is trembling with pleasure!—Then to dazzle the eyes of our wealthier and emulous rivals by showing them such treasure as this,—(displaying a little black smoked book about the size of a primer)—to enjoy their surprise and envy, shrouding meanwhile, under a veil of mysterious consciousness as my own superior. In this my young friend, these are the white moments of life, that repay the toil, and pains, and sedulous attention, which our profession, above all others, so peculiarly demands!"

Lovel was not a little amused at hearing the old gentleman run on in this manner, and, however incapable of entering into the full merits of what he beheld, he admired, as much as could have been expected, the various treasures which Oldbuck exhibited. Here were editions esteemed as being the first, and there stood those scarcely less regarded as being the last and best, and to this day had not the author's final improvements, and there another which (strange to tell!) was in request because it had then not. One was precious because it was a charm, and, another because it was short; the merit of this lay in the title-page, of that in the arrangement of the letters in the word Fina. There was, it seemed, no peculiar distinction, however trifling or minute, which might not give value to a volume, providing the indispensable quality of scarcity, or rare occurrence, was attached to it.

Not the least fascinating was the original broadside,—the Dying Speech, Bloody Murder, or Wonder-ful Wonder of Wonders, in its primary state, for it was hawking at the cheap and easy price of one penny, though now worth the weight of that penny in gold. On these the Antiquary dilated with transport, and read and re-read the same proportion to the contents that the painted signs without a showman's booth do to the animal within. Mr. Oldbuck, for example, in a postcard, in a unique broadside, entitled and called 'Strange and Wonderful News from Chipping-Norton, in the County of Oxon, of certain dreadful Apparitions, which were seen upon the 30th of July, 1610, at Half an Hour after Nine o'clock; and continued till Eleven, in which Time was seen Appearances of several flaming Swords, strange Motion of the superior Oy, and the usual Spangling of the Stars, with their an is, which of us was so rude and barbarous as to remain unmoved at the death of the great Roscius, whose advanced age was so far from preparing us for his death, that we rather hoped one so graceful, so expert, so masterly, so skilful at the common lot of mortality? So the Prince of Orators spoke of the stage and its professors.

The words of the old man fell upon Lovel's ears, but not unfelt. The man, whose art ought to have entered into his mind, which was then occupied in thinking what means the old beggar, who still continued to regard him with a certain air of haughtiness, had contrived to thrust himself into any knowledge of his affairs. He put his hand in his pocket as the readiest mode of intimating his desire of secrecy, and took a sovereign out of the pouch at which he was addressed; and while he bestowed him an alms, the amount of which rather bore proportion to his fears than to his charity, looked at him with a marked expression, which the mendicant, a phycnomyst by profession, seemed perfectly to understand. — "Never mind me, sir, I am no tale-tyet; but there are more sick men in the world than nine, answered he, as he pocketed Lovel's good. You must be heard by him alone, and with an expression which amply filled up what was left unspoken. Then turning to Old- buck: "I am awa to the manse, your honour. Has you a good man here, curst be the day and age, for I'll come in by Knockwinnoch Castle again e'en?"

OIdbuck started as from a dream; and, in a hurried tone, where vexation strove with a wish to conceal it, passed on. "Who is the gentleman's name, sir?" "An honest, grossly unlined, hat he said, "Go down, go down to Monkbarne—let them give you some dinner—or stay; if you do go to the manse, or to Knockwinnoch, ye need say nothing among your story of yours."

"Who, I?" said the mendicant. "Lord bless your honour, nabody saul ken a word about it free me, mair than if the bit bocock had been there since Noah's flood. But Lord bomb-a, your honour has given me Johnnie Howie aker for seas of the laigh crofts for this heathery know! Now, if he has really imposed the bocock on ye for an ancient war, it's my real opinion the bargain will never haud gude, if you would just bring down your heart to try it at the law, and say that he beggared ye."

"Provoking accoucher," muttered the indigent Antiquary between his teeth, — "I'll have the hangman's lash and his back acquainted for this! — And then in a louder tone, — "Never mind, Edie—it is all a mistake."

"Truth, I am thinking saw," continued his tormentor, who seemed to have pleasure in rubbing the gullied wound, "truth, I say thou saw; and it's no sae lang since I saw my compeer Language think of it. Luckily," said he, that his honour, Monkbarne, would have done sae a dast-like thing, as to gie grund weel worth fifty shillings an a' for a maling that would be dear o' a pund Scotia. Na, na, quo I; I depened upon the laird's been imposed up wi' that wily doo- little devill, Johnnie Howie. — But Lord hand a care o' us, sirs, how can that be, quo' she again, when the laird's sae book-learned, there's no like o' him in the country side, and Johnnie Howie has hardly sense enough to ca' the cows out o' his kale-yard?"

"Awel, awel, Lady Crichton's circumstantial, vanishing with some of his said-wad-stories, for ye ken, laird, o' yer own tongue about the bodile that ye thought was an auld crin." "No, no, no!" said Oldbuck; and then in a more mild tone, as one that was conscious the reputation lay at the mercy of his antagonist, he added: — "Away with you down to Monkbarne, and when I come back, I'll send ye a bottle of ale to the kitchen."

"Heaven reward your honour!" This was uttered with the true mendicant whine, as setting his pikewal staff before him, he began moving towards the direction of old Knockwinnoch Castle, — "But your honour," turning round, "ever get back the silver ye gae to the travelling packman for the bodile?"

"Conceive thee, what about thy business?" "Aweel, aweel, sir, God bless your honour!— I hope we'll ding Johnnie Howie yet, and that I'll live to see il." And so saying, the old beggar moved off, relieving that Mr. Oldbuck of recollections which were any thing rather than agreeable.

"Who is this familiar old gentleman?" said Lovel, when the mendicant was out of hearing. — "O, one of the plagues of the country—I have been always against poor rates and a workhouse—I think I'd vote for them now, to have that accosted slut. O, your old remembered guest of a beggar becomes, I think, well acquired to you as he is to his dish—as intimate as one of the beasts familiar to man, which signify love, and with which his own trade is especially convivial. Was he perhaps a soldier, a player, a singer, a vagabond, or a ballad singer, travelling about?" He is spoiled by our folk, he said, who laugh at his jokes, and rehearse the Ode Chalhute of his good things, but who have, he said, no idea of them.

"Why, he uses freedom apparently, which is the secret of wit," answered Lovel.

"O ay, freedom enough," said the Antiquary; "it generally invents some damnable impossible story to provoke you, like that nonsense he takes just now—not that I'll publish my tract till I have examined the thing to the bottom."

"In England," said Lovel, "such a mendicant would get a speedy check."

"Yes, your churchwardens and dog-wagons would make stouter allowance for his vein of humour; but here, cursed be the hour when I am a sort of privileged witness to the last specimen of the old-fashioned Scotch mendicant, who kept his rounds within a particular space, and was the news-carrier, the minstrel; and sometimes the historian of the district. That man, now, knows more old ballads and traditions than any other man in this and the four next parishes. And after all," continued he, softening as he went on, "nothing is more fashionable in the West of Scotland than the dog and the humour. He has borne his hard fate with unconquerable spirits, and it's cruel to deny him the comfort of a laugh at his betters. The pleasure of having quizzed me is over; and if you say good-bye, your honour has given me Johnnie Howie acre for acres of the laigh crofts for this heathery know! Now, if he has really imposed the bocock on ye for an ancient war, it's my real opinion the bargain will never haud gude, if you would just bring down your heart to try it at the law, and say that he beggared ye.

CHAPTER V.

Launcelot Gobbo. Mark me now: Now will I raise the veil Merchant of

The Tag theatre at Fairport had opened, but no Mr. Lovel appeared on the boards, nor was there anything in the habitations of any character named, which authorized Mr. Oldbuck's conjecture that his fellow-traveller was a candidate for the palm of favour. Regular were the Antiquary's inquiries at an old-fashioned barber who dressed the only three employes whom fashion had left him, regularly, I say, were Mr. Oldbuck's inquiries at the unction concerning the news of the little theatre at Fairport, expecting every day to hear of Mr. Lovel's appearance, which he occasionally determined to put himself to charges in honour of his young friend, and not only to go to the play himself, but to carry his companion along with him. But old John Caxton conveyed no information whatever, but was taking so decisive a step as that of securing a bet

He brought information on the contrary, that there was a young man residing at Fairport, of whose name (by which he meant all the more because there was no business of his own, fill up his leisure moments by attending to that of other people) could make nothing. He saw nothing of the society, but rather avoided it, and the young man was endowed with some degree of curiosity, induced to offer his services. Nothing could be more regular, or lose resembling adventure in the mode of living, which was so well so completely well arranged, and in transactions with him were loud in their approval.
THE ANTIQUARY

These are not the virtues of a stage-struck hero, right Oldbuck to himself; and, however habitually they might be, in the end he had come to abandon that which he had formed in the past instance, but for a part of Caxton's communion.

"The young gentleman," he said, "was sometimes kind and yet too original, apt in his room, just as if he were one of the players—nothing, however, excepting this single circumstance.

"It is remained a high and doubtful question, what a learned young man, without friends, connected, or employment of any kind, could have to do as a student; and he, clerk, with a name apparently any charms for him. He declined the mess of the volunteer concert, which I lately imbibed, and shunned joining the rival parties of either of the two parties which then used Fairport, as they did more important places.

"There was too little of an aristocrat to join the club of true Blues, and too little of a democrat to fraction with an affiliated society of the so-called Friends of the People, which the borough had also the happiness of possessing. A room was his detestation; as he said, he knew nothing with the Edinburgh Press, as in novel-writing, and that is a quite a different thing, as was never a master of none who so little post was known, and who so universally described himself as a negative, however, was important—nobody was ever in the least degree of self-satisfaction.

"And indeed, had such existence, would have been so much made public; for the real descent of a professional character must have been checked by no feelings of sympathy for a being so unsociable. On one account he fell somewhat under suspicion. As he made use of his pencil in his solitary walks, and had seen several views of the harbour, in which a tower, and even the four-gun battery, were reduced, some zealous friends of his opinion had a whisper, that this mysterious stranger was certainly a French spy. The sheriff paid respect to Mr. Lovel accordingly, but in the interview which followed, it would seem, that he had barely removed that magistrate's suspicions, since not only suffered him to remain undisturbed in his reversion, but, as it was credibly reported, sent him on a journey and offered his own support under the pen name, which were fully declined. But what the nature of the explanation was, the magistrate kept a profound secret, not from the public at large, but from his substitute, clerk, who would have, as a matter of consequence, been known in the county and on all the courts of official duty.

"If these particulars were faithfully reported by Caxton to his patron at Monkburn, tended much in the opinion of his former connexion with this resident here.

"A decent sensible lad," said he to himself, "who scorns to enter into the follies and nonsense of these idiot people at Fairport. I must do nothing for him—must give him a dinner—and I write Sir Arthur to come to Monkburn to meet me—must consult my womankind.

"By the way, this correspondence has been for the last some time in the hands of Sir Arthur and of Caxton himself, ordered to prepare for a letter to Knockwinnoch Castle with a letter, "Honoured Sir, Arthur Wardour, of Knockwinnoch, Bart."

DEAR SIR ARTHUR,

On Tuesday the 17th curt, stilo novis, I hold a council at Monkburn宾馆 to see you this afternoon at four o'clock precisely. If my enemy, Miss Isabel, can and will honour us by coming you, my womankind will be too old with me to suffer in this case of resistance to lawful rule and right supremacy. If not, I will send the womankind to the race for the day. I have a young acquaintance to confer with you, and it is a matter of habit with Sir Arthur, that, even after his father's death, the non-juring chaplain used to pray regularly for the preservation of the right to the throne, for the downfall of the younger house, and for deliverance from their cruel and bloodthirsty enemies, although all idea of serious opposition to the of Hanover had long smothered away, and this tenebrous and hungry was kept up rather by a man of form than as conveying any distinct meaning. So much was this the case, that, about the year 1770, upon a disputed election occurring in the county, the whole matter was suddenly pulped down with the help of abbreviation and allegories, in order to serve a candidate in whom he was interested:—thus renouncing the heir for whose restoration he weekly petitioned Heaven, and acknowledging the usurper, whose de- tronement he had never ceased to pray for. And to add to this melancholy instance of human in-sistency, Sir Arthur continued to pray for the house of Stewart even after the family had been extirpated, and when, in truth, though in his theoretical loyalty he pleased to regard them as alive, yet, in all actual service and practical exertion, he was a most zealous and dogmatic Jacobite.

In other respects, Sir Arthur Wardour lived like most country gentlemen in Scotland—hunted and fished—gave and received dinners—attended races and county meetings; was a deputy-tenant and trustee upon turnpike acts. But, in his more advanced years, as he became too lazy or unwieldy for field-sports, he supplied them by new and then reading; and gradually acquired a taste for antiques, though neither very deep, nor very correct, he became a cronv of his neighbour, Mr. Oldbuck of Monkbar, and a joint inhabitant of the Antiquary's. There were, however, points of difference between these two humorists, which sometimes occasioned discord. The faith of Sir Arthur, as an antiquary, was, that of Oldbuck and Lord Grant (on the affair of the Prentorium at the Kain of Kinprunes) was much more scrupulous in receiving legends as current and authentic coin. Sir Arthur would have believed that any crime the crime of the late-majesty had been doubted; the existence of any single individual of that formidable beadle-roll of one hundred and four kings of Scotland, received by Burghers' writ and regarded as a thing of history, by Sir Arthur, was not always willing to lend. Mr. Oldbuck, on the contrary, always wished to be repaid with regularity; Sir Arthur was not always, nor indeed often, prepared to gratify this wish. For this reason they often had a fan-arrangement between tendencies to oppose, which little mists would occasionally take place. Sir Arthur, there was a spirit of mutual accommodation up the whole, and they bragged of like dogs in couples, with some difficulty and occasional snarling, but without absolutely coming to a stand still, or thun- tering each other.

Some little disagreement, such as we have men- tioned, arising out of business or politics, had divided the houses of Knockwinnock and Monkbar, when the emissary of the latter arrived to discharge his obligations. Sir Arthur, in the course of the business, went on one side and looked out upon the restless ocean, and, on the other, upon the long straight avenue was the Baronet seated, now turning over the leaves of a folio, now casting a glance anywhere; where his sun quivered on the dark-green foliage, and some trunks of the large and branching trees, with which the avenue was planted. At length, sight of joyl moving object is seen, and it gives rise to the usual inquiries, 'Who is it?' and what can be his errand? The old whitish gray coat, the hobbling gait, its half-sloshed, half-cocked, announced the fore- maker of periwigs, and left for investigation of the second figure. Mr. Oldbuck, in these words, entering the portrait,—'A letter from Mr. Oldbuck,
Sir Arthur.'

Sir Arthur took the epistle with a due assumption of consequential dignity.

"Take the old man into the kitchen, and let him get some refreshment," said the young lady, who compassionate eye had remarked his thin gray hair and weary look. 'But,' she added, 'if you have for your person and your conversation: nothing

The elderly lady rustled in silks and satins, and bore upon her head a structure resembling the fashion in the ladies' memorandum-book for the year 1770—a superb piece of architecture in the path of the modern Gothic castle, of which the curls might represent the turrets, the black pins the chevets de frize, and the lappets the banners.
The face, which, like that of the ancient statues of Vesta, was thus crowned with towers, was large and long, and peaked at nose and chin, and bore, in other respects, such a ludicrous resemblance to the resemblance, and8875; but which, that Lovel and they not appeared at once, like Scheherazade and Viola in the last scene of the "Twelfth Night," might have supposed that the figure before him was his old friend masquerading in female attire. An antique flowered silk gown graced the extraordinary person whom belonged this unaperceived figure, whose brother was wont to say was fitter for a turban for Mahommed or Turgutkan, than a head-scarf for a rea-sorable creature, or Christian gentlewoman. Two long and bony arms were terminated at the elbows by triple blond ruffles, and, being folded sattire-ways in front of her person, and decorated with long gloves of a bright vermilion colour, had no hind resistance to a pair of gigantic lobsters. High-heeled shoes, and a short silk cloak, thrown in easy negligence over her shoulders, completed the exterior of Miss Griselda Oldbuck.

Her niece, the same whom Lovel had seen transiently during his first visit, was a pretty young woman, gentry dressed to the occasion of that \ud{383}day, with an air of aspic eteueeiue which brought her very well, and which was perhaps derived from the caustic humour peculiar to her uncle's family, though softened by transmission.

Mr. Lovel paid his respects to both ladies, and was answered by the elder with the prolonged courtesy of 1769, drawn from the righteous period,

When folks conceived a grace
Of half an hour's space,
And rejoiced in a Friday's eonon, and by the younger with a modern reverence, which, like the festive benediction of a modern divine, was of much shorter duration.

While this salutation was exchanging, Sir Arthur, with his fair daughter hanging upon his arm, having dismissed his chimney, appeared at the garden door, and in all due form paid his respects to the ladies.

Sir Arthur," said the Antiquary, "and you, my fair Joe, let me make known to you my young friend Mr. Lovel, a gentleman who, during the scarlet-fever which is epidemic at present, you see, has prevented the vicinity and decay to appear in a coat of a civil complexion. You see, however, that the fashionable colour has maturated in his cheeks which appears not in his garments. Sir Arthur, let me present to you a young gentleman, whom your further knowledge will find grave, wise, courtly, and scholar-like, well seen, deeply read, and thoroughly grounded, in all the hidden mysteries of the green-room and stage, from the days of Dave Lindsay down to those of Dibdin—he bleshe against, which is a sign of grace."

"My brother," said Mr. Lovel, addressing Lovel, "has a humorous way of expressing himself, sir; nobody thinks any thing of what Monkburns says—so I beg you will not be so confud for the matter of his nonsensical but you must have had a warm walk beneath this broiling sun—would you take any thing?—a glass of balm, wine?"

Ere Lovel could answer, the Antiquary interposed.
"Among these, Sir Arthur, I could not take the liberty to surprise you with any infernal deceptions—Dost thou not remember how it fared with the clergyman whom you condembed to partake of that deceitful beverage?"

"Oh, fly, brother—Sir Arthur, did you ever hear the like?—he must have been a true blueman of war, or we will invent such stories—But there goes Jenny, ringing the old bell to tell us that the dinner is ready.

Rigid in his economy, Mr. Oldbuck kept an ab-servant. This he disguised under the pretext that masculine sex was too noble to be employed in those sublunary rites, when the female sex of society, were uniformly imposed on the female. "Why," would he say, "did the boy, Tom Rintneruth, whom, at my wise sister's instigation, I, with equal white and black eyes, to the amazement of all, for apply daily in the parlour, take birds' nests, break glass, and ultimately steal my spectacles, except that he felt that noble emulation which swells in the bosom of the masculine sex, which makes a simple player in a mushroom, dance, gesticulate and thump on his shoulder, and doubtless will promote him to a glorious half-bred, or even to the gallows? And why does this girl, her full sister, Jenny Rintneruth, move in the same social orbit, with sameless steps, shod, or unshe—Why? but because she is in her votive. Let them minister to us, Sir Arthur,—let them minister. I say,—it is the only thing they are fit for. All ancient legislators from Lycurgus to Mahommed, corruptly called Mahomet, agree in putting them in their proper and subordinate rank, and it is only the crazy heads of our old chivalrous ancestors that created their Dulcinées into despotic princesses.

Miss Wardour protested loudly against this ungalantist doctrine; but the bell now rung for dinner. "Let me do all the offices of fair courtesy to so fair an antagonist," said the old gentleman, offering his arm to Miss Oldbuck. Miss Wardour (vulgarly Mahomet) had some hesitation in all the modes of summoning her Moslema to prayer. He rejected bells as used by Christians; trumpets as the most suitable; and candles were rejected by the Buddist as repugnant to human voice. I have had equal doubt concerning my dinner-calling. Gongs, now in present use, seemed a newfangled and heathenish invention, and the voice of the female wankind I rejected as equally shrill and diabolical; wherefore, contrary to the said Mahommed, or Mahomet, I have resumed the bell. It has a local propriety, since it was the conventual signal broadsounding the repast in their refectory, and it has the advantage over the tongue of my sister's prime minister, Jenny, that, though not quite so loud and shrill, it ceases ringing the instant you drop the bell-ropes; when we know, by sad experience, that any attempt to silence Jenny, only wakes the sympathic chime of Miss Oldbuck and Mary Mintry, to join in chorus.

With this discourse he led the way to his dining parlour, which Lovel had not yet seen; it was wainscotted, and contained some curious paintings. The dining-table was attended by Jenny; but an old superintendent, representing the board, and underwent the burden of bearing several reproofs from Mr. Oldbuck, and innuendoes, not so much marked, but not less cutting, from his sister. Miss Oldbuck, who is very particular about the antiquary, comprehending many savoury speciments of Scotch viands, now dinned at the tables of those who affect elegance. There was the relishing Solan goose, whose smell is so powerful that he is never cooked within doors. Blood-raw he proved to be on this occasion, so that Oldbuck half-threatened to throw the greasy sea-fowl at the head of the neglegent housekeeper, who acted as priestess in presenting this odiferous offering. But, by good-hap, he had been most fortunate in the hotch-potch, which was unanimously pronounced to be intolerable. I knew not what to advise Mr. Oldbuck in his execrable rage, "for Davie Bibble, the gardener, (an old bachelor like myself,) takes care the rascally women do not disoblige our vegetables. And here is fish and the rump, which are acceptable;—woman-kind excel in that dish—it procures them the pleasure of scolding, for half an hour at least, twice a week, with ajud Maggy Mucklebackit, our fish-wife. The same pie, Mr. Lovel, made after a recipe bequeathed to me by my departed grandmother of happy memory—and if you will venture on a glass of scotch, it is good. And it was pretty good, he who professed the title of King Alphonse of Castile—Old wood to burn—old books to read—old wine to drink—and old friends, Sir Arthur—ay, Mr. Lovel, and young friends too, to converse with."

"And what news do you bring us from Edmundsburgh, Miss Oldbuck?" said Sir Arthur; "how wage the world in Auld Reekie?"

"Mad, Sir Arthur, mad—irretrievably frantic—far beyond dipping in the sea, shaving the crown, or drinking the dear claret, or a mugful of spirit in a glass. You or I, a military frenzy, hath possessed man, woman, and child."

"And high time, I think," said Miss Wardour, "when we are threatened with invasion from abroad, and insurrection from home. Of standing armies and German oppression?"

"Why, I say, Mr. Oldbuck," replied the knight, "that, so far as I am capable of judging, we ought to resist the toto corporis regni,—as the phrase is, unless I have altogether forgotten my Latin—as an enemy who comes to propose to us a Whiggish sort of government, a republican system, and who is aided and abetted by a sort of fanatics of the worst kind in our own bowels. I have taken some measures, I assure you, such as become my rank in the community; for I have directed the constables to take up the first accursedly beggar, for spreading disaffection against church and state through the whole parish. He said plainly to old Caxton, that Willie Howie's Kilmarrock cowl covered more than the one parson—I think it is easy to make out that innuendo—But the rogue shall be taught better manners."

"O no, you dear sir," exclaimed Miss Wardour, "not old Edin,—we have known too long a time that you no constable shall have my good graces that executes such a warrant."

"Ay, there it goes," said the Antiquary: "you to do a staunch Tory, Sir Arthur, have nourished a fine spring of Whiggery in your bosom—Why, Miss Wardour is alone sufficient to control a whole quarter of the congregation, ay, a general assembly of the people, or conversation to boot—a Boudicca, she—an Amazon, a Zenobia."

"And yet, with all my courage, Mr. Oldbuck, I am glad to hear our people are getting under arms."

"Under arms, Lord love thee! didst thou ever read the history of Sister Margaret, which flowed from a head, that, though now old and somewhat gray, has more sense and political intelligence than you find now-a-days in a whole synod? Dost thou remember the Nurse's dream in that exquisite work, which she recounts in such agony to Hubble Bubble?

When she saw the miller's son in her vision, lo! it exploded like a great iron cannon; when she put out her hand to save a pirt, it perked up in her face in the form of a pistol. My own vision, however, is a mere farcical dream. I called to consult my lawyer; he was clothed in a dragoon's dress, belted and casqueed, and about to mount a charger, which his writing-clip (habeted as a sharp-shooter) walked into and to his door—I went to scold my agent for having sent me to advise with a madman; he had stuck into his head the plume, which in more sober days he wielded between his fingers, and figured as an army officer. My mercer had his spontoon in his hand, as if he measured his cloth by that implement, instead of a legitimate yard. The Banker's clerk, who was next to my mother, disdained it twenty times, being disorders by the recollection of his military tellings-off at the morning drill. I was ill, and sent for a surgeon—drunk, sir, for three and forty weeks; and such a forehead glittered on his head, that, by the gods, with such a load of steel, I thank heaven I am not made to murder."

I had recourse to a physician, but he also was practicing a more wholesome mode of slaughter than that which his profession had been supposed at all times to open to him. And now, since I have returned here, I am happy to learn that they have caught the same valiant humour. I hate a gun like a hurt wild-duck—I detect a drum like a quacker;—and they thunder and rattle out yonder upon the town's common, so that every volley and roll goes to the very heart of that middle-aged populace. "Dear brother, dinna speak that gate o' the gentlemen voluntiers—I am sure they have a most becoming uniform—While I was, we have been out to the Strand, but it is an ill wind that blows in terribly dookit, an' mony a sair hoast was among them—And the trouble they take, I am sure it claims our gratitude."

I am sure, said Miss M'Intyre, "that my uncle sent twenty guineas to help out their equipage."

"It was to buy liqueur and sugar-candy," said the Baronet, "as his place, and to refresh the throat of the officers who had bawled themselves hoarse in the service of their country."

"Take care, Monkbrans! we shall set you down among the black-nebs by and by."

"No, Sir Arthur, a tame grumbler. I only claim the privilege of croaking in my own corner here, without uniting my throat to the grand chorus of the mob—Ni quiu Roy, ni pungo Roy—I neither make king nor mar king, as Sancho says, but pray heartily for our own sovereign, pay scot and lot, and grumble at the exciseman—but here comes the ewe- milk in good time; it is a better digestive than politics."

"When dinner was over, and the decanters placed on the table, Mr. Oldbuck proposed the King's health in a toast, which was readily acceded to both by Lovel and the Baronet, the Jacobitism of the latter being now a sort of speculative opinion merely,—the shadow of a shade."

After the ladies had left the apartment, the landlord and Sir Arthur entered into several exquisite discussions, in which the younger guest, either on account of the abstruse erudition which they involved, or some other hour, look but a slender share, till at length he was suddenly started out of a profound reverie by an unexpected appeal to his judgment."

I will stand by what Mr. Lovel says: he was born in the north of England, and may know the very spot." Sir Arthur thought it unlikely that so young a gentleman should have paid much attention to matters of that sort."

"I am advised of the contrary," said Oldbuck."

"How say you, Mr. Lovel!—speak up, for your own credit."

Lovel was obliged to confess himself in the ridiculous situation of a man, like ignorant of the subject of discussion and controversy which had engaged the company for an hour."

"I must help the lad, his head has been wool-gathering! I thought how it would be when the woman and the man was separated. Sir Arthur, I met the Piets out of a young fellow for six hours after. Why, man, there was once a people called the Piets.""

"More properly Piets," interrupted the Baronet."

"I say the Piets, Phiar, Picoilar, Piahtar, or Piatlar," vociferated Oldbuck; "they spoke a Gothic dialect."

"Genuine Celtic," again asserted the knight."

"As Religion, Sir, I'll go to death upon it!" counter-asserted the squire."

"Why, gentlemen," said Lovel, "I conceive that is a dispute which may be easily settled, by philologists; if there are any remains of the language,"

"There is but one word," said the Baronet, "but, in spite of Mr. Oldbuck's pertinacity, it is deceptive of the question."

"Yes, in my favour," said Oldbuck: "Mr. Lovel, you shall be judge—I have the learned Pinkerton on my side."

"I, on mine, indefatigable Advocate Chalmers."

"Gordon comes into my opinion."

"Sir Robert Ribbald holds mine."

"Incase is with me!" vociferated Oldbuck.

"There has no doubt!" shouted the Baronet.

"There is a common saying, said Lovel, before you must use your forces and overwhelm me with authorities, I should like to know the word in dispute."

"Penmial," said both the disputants at once.

"Which side is outside rifal?" asked Sir Arthur.

"The head of the wall," echoed Oldbuck.

"There was a deep pause—"It is rather a narrow foundation to build a hypothesis upon," observed the baronet.

"Not a whit, not a whit," said Oldbuck: "men fight best in a narrow ring—an inch is as good as a mile for a home-throw."

"It is described," said the Baronet; "every hill in the Highlands begins with Ben."

"But what say you to Pol, Sir Arthur—is it not decidedly the Saxon wall?"

"It is the Piets," said Sir Arthur; "the Piets borrowed that part of the word."

"No such thing; if they borrowed any thing, it must have been your Ben, which they might have from the neighbouring Britons of Strath Cloyd."

"The Pits, or Piets," said Lovel, "must have been singularly poor in dialect, since, in the only remaining word of their vocabulary, and that consisting only of two syllables, they have been confessedly obliged to borrow one of them from another language; and methinks, gentlemen, with submission, the controversy is not unlike that which the two knights fought, concerning the shield that had an eagle on the one side, and a dog on the other. Each of you claim one-half of the word, and seem to resign the other. But what strikes me most, is the poverty of the language which has left sunlight out of 'sunlight'."

"You are in an error," said Sir Arthur; "it was a copious language, and they were a great and powerful people—built two steeples—one at Brechin, one at Abernethy. The Piets and insulins of the holy royal were kept in Edinburgh Castle, thence called Castrum Pictiarum."

"A childish legend," said Oldbuck, "invented to give consequence to trumpery woman-kind. It was called the Maiden Castle, queal lucans a non lucendo, because it resisted every attack, and women never do."

"There is a list of the Piets kings," persisted Sir Arthur, "well authenticated, from Cremnemarcherius (the date of whose reign is somewhat uncertain) down to Drostenstone, whose death concluded their dynasty. Half of them have the Celtic patronymic Mac prefixed—Mac iaidest filius—what do you say to that, Mr. Oldbuck? There is Druis Macmorachair, Trynel Macnasconach, first of that ancient line, as it may be judged, and Sir Gormac Macnasconach, Alpin Macnasconach, Druis Macallargan, there he was interrupted by a fit of coughing, ugh, ugh, Dugall Macnasconach, ugh, ugh, Gollarge Macnasconach, ugh, ugh, Ninian Macnasconach, ugh, ugh, Kenneth—sigh, ugh, ugh, Macfereich, Easach Macnasconach, twenty and twenty, decidedly Cельtic names, which I could repeat, if this damned cough would let me."

"Take a glass of wine, Sir Arthur," said Lovel, "and, by God, there end all bad dreams of unprofitable jargon, that would choke the devil—why, that last fellow has the only intelligible name you have repeated—they are all of the tribe of Macfrenach—mushoushish monarchs every one of them; sprung up from the fumes of concord, folly, and falsehood, marinating in the brains of some mad Highlanders."

"I am surprised to hear you, Mr. Oldbuck; you know, or ought to know, that the list of these potentates was copied, by Henry Maule of Melgum, from the Chronicles of Loch-Bev and Saint Andrews, and put forth by his short but factious history of the Piets, printed by Robert Frewan of Edinburgh, and sold by him at his shop in the Parliament-close, in the year of God seventeen hundred and five, or six, I am not precisely certain, in which the Grant of arms of the bonfire, which stands next to my twelfth copy of the Scots Acts, and ranges on the shelf, with them very well. What say you to that, Mr. Oldbuck?"

"Say! Why Maule at Harris Muir and his history," answered Oldbuck, "and thereby cump with his request, of giving it entertainment according to its merit."

"Do not laugh at a better man than yourself," said Sir Arthur, somewhat scornfully.

"I do not conceive I do, Sir Arthur, in laughing either at him or his history."
“Henry Maudle of Melgun was a gentleman, Mr. Oldbuck.”

“One must have had advantage of me in that particular,” replied the Antiquary, somewhat tartly.

“Permit me, Mr. Oldbuck—he was a gentleman of high character, according to my father.”

“The descendant of a Westphalian printer should speak of him with deference!—Such may be your opinion, Sir Arthur—it is not mine. I conceive that my father was right in denouncing the publisher, and that he was to have been the author of the great Chronicle of Nuremberg.”

“I conceive, I say, that my descent from that great restorer of learning is more creditable to me as a man of letters, than if I had numbered in my genealogy all the brawling, bullet-headed, iron-fated, old Gothic barons since the days of Cretnichmaurchy—none of whom, I suppose, could write his own name.”

“If you mean the observation as a sneer at my ancestry,” said the knight, with an assumption of dignified superiority and composure, “I have the pleasure to inform you, that the name of my ancestor, Garth, is entitled to an equal standing with his own hand in the earliest copy of the Rag-man-roll.”

“Which only serves to show that he was one of the earliest who, by the mean example of committing to the public what was written for the exclusive loyalty of your family, Sir Arthur, after such a backsliding as that?”

“Of course, enough,” said Sir Arthur, starting up fiercely, and rushing back his chair; “I shall hereafter take care how I honour with my company, one who shows himself so ungrateful for my condescension.”

“In that you will do as you find most agreeable, Sir Arthur; I hope, that, as I was not aware of the extent of the obligation which you have done me, by visiting my poor house, I may be excused for not having carried my case a step further out of severity.”

“Mighty well—mighty well, Mr. Oldbuck—I wish you a good evening—Mr. a—a—a Shovel—I wish you a very good evening.”

“Out of the parlour door flounced the incensed Sir Arthur, as if the spirit of the whole Round Table inflamed his single bosom, and traversed with long strides the labyrinth of passages which conducted to the drawing-room.”

“Did you ever hear such an old top-headed ass?” said Oldbuck, briefly reproaching Lovel; “but I must not let him go in without saying something to him.”

Sir Arthur had now got involved in darkness, of which the negative effect is well known to nurses and governesses who have to deal with pettish children. It retarded the pace of the irritated Baronet, if it did not quite halt his resentment; and, Mr. Oldbuck, better acquainted with the locale, up with him as he had got his grasp upon the handle of the drawing-room door.

“Stay a minute, Sir Arthur,” said Oldbuck, opposing his abrupt entrance; “don’t be quite so hasty, my good friend—I was a little too rude with you about Sir Gamelyn—why, he is an old acquaintance of mine, and such a fine fellow! he keeps company with Bruce and Wallace—and, I’ll swear on a black-letter Bible, only subscribed the Rag-man-roll with the legitimate and justifiable intention of circulating the truth of the matter, and not, like that noble knight—hundreds of whom came—I come, come, forget and forgive—confess we have given the young fellow here a right to think us two old fools.”

“Indeed, Mr. Jonathan Oldbuck,” said Sir Arthur, with much majesty.

“A—will—will—a willful man must have his way.”

With that the door opened, and into the drawing-room marched the tall gaunt form of Sir Arthur, followed by Lovel and Mr. Oldbuck, the countenances of all three a little discomposed.

“I have been waiting for you, sir,” said Miss Wardour, “to propose we should walk forward to meet the carriage, or at any rate to ascend on the wall.”

Sir Arthur readily assented to this proposal, which suited the angry mood in which he found himself; and having, agreeably to the established custom in cases of pet, refused the refreshment of tea and coffee, he tucked his daughter under his arm; and, after taking a ceremonious leave of the ladies, and a very dry one of Sir Arthur, he marched.

“I think Sir Arthur has got the black dog on his back again,” said Miss Oldbuck.

“Black dog!—black devil!—he’s more absurd than woman-kind—What say you, Lovel?—Why, the lad’s gone too.”

“He took his leave, uncle, while Miss Wardour was putting on her things; but I don’t think you observed him.”

“The devil’s in the people! This is all one gets by fussing and bustling; and putting one’s self out of one’s way in order to give dinners, besides all the charges they are put to.—O Seged, Emperor of Ethiope!—I wish I had one hand, and a volume of the Rambler in the other, for it was his regular custom to read while he was eating or drinking in presence of his master, being a practice which served once to excuse his contempt for the society of woman-kind, and his resolution to lose no moment of instruction.—O Seged, Emperor of Ethiope! I well hast done spoken—No man should presume to say, ‘This shall be a day of happiness.’”

Oldbuck proceeded in his studies for the best part of an hour, uninterrupted by the ladies, who each, in profound silence, pursued some female employment. At length, a light and modest tap was heard at the parlour door.

“That is you, Cazon?—come in, come in, man.”

The old man opened the door, and, thrusting in his meager face, thatched with thin gray locks, and one sleeve of his white coat, said in a subdued and mysterious tone of voice, “I was wanting to speak to you sir.”

“Come in then, you old fool, and say what you have got to say.”

“I’ll maybe frighten the ladies,” said the ex fresieur.

“Frighten! answered the Antiquary, “What do you mean?—never mind the ladies. Have you seen another gawizt at the Humlock-knower?”

“Na, sir,” replied Cazon—“but I’m no easy in my mind.”

“Did you ever hear of any body that was?” answered Oldbuck; “what reason has an old battered poultice-sack like you to be easy in your mind—more than all the rest of the world besides?”

“It’s no for myself, sir; but it threatens an awful night; and Sir Arthur, and Miss Wardour, poor things.”

“Why, man, they must have met the carriage at the head of the lomming, or thereabouts; they must be home long ago.”

“Na, sir; did they gang the road by the turnpike to meet the carriage, they said by the sands.”

“The word operated like electricity on Oldbuck.”

“The sands!” he exclaimed; “impossible!”

“On, sir, that’s what I said to the gardener; but he says he saw them turn down by the Musselcrack—in truth, says I to him, an that be the case, Davie, I’m mis-reporting—An almanack! an almanack!” said Oldbuck, starting up in great alarm—“not that bauble! flitting away a little pocket almanack which his second officer, the postillion, or rather the Isabella!—Fetch me instantly the Finnieport Almanack!”

“It was brought, consulted, and added greatly to his agitation.”

“I’ll go myself—call the gardener and roughboy—he’ll bring ropes and ladders—but bid them raise more help as they come along—keep the top of the cliffs, and halloo down to them—I’ll go myself.”
"What is the matter?" inquired Miss Oldbuck and Miss McIntyre.

"The tide!—the tide!" answered the alarmed Antiquary.

"Had not Jenny better—but no, I'll run myself," said the younger lady, partaking in all her uncle's anxiety. "I'll run myself to Sandybanks, and make him dance out of his boat." "Thank you, my dear, that's the wisest word that has been spoken yet—run! run! To go by the sands!" seizing his hat and cane; "was there ever such madness heard of?"

CHAPTER VII.

Pleased awhile to view
The watery waste, the prospect wide and new;
The now receding waters gave them space,
On other side, the growing shores to trace;
And then, returning, they contract the scene,
Till small and smaller grows the walk between.

The information of Davie Dibble, which had spread such general alarm at Monkbarrows, proved to be strictly correct. Sir Arthur and his daughter had set out, according to their first proposal, to return to Knocknawoonck by the turnpike road; but, when they reached the height of the gallop they were to have called, or great lane, which on one side made a sort of avenue to the house of Monkbarrows, they discerned a little way before them, Lovef, who seemed to linger on the road behind them, and, for the safety of his party, to join them. Miss Wardour immediately proposed to her father that they should take another direction; and, as the weather was fine, walk home by the sands, which, as Sir Arthur was informed, was a ridge of rocks, afforded at almost all times a pleasant passage between Knocknawoonck and Monkbarrows than the high-road.

Sir Arthur acquiesced willingly. "It would be unpleasant," he said, "to be joined by that young fellow, whom Mr. Oldbuck had taken the freedom to introduce them to." And his old-fashioned politeness had none of the case of the present day, which permits you, if you have a mind, to cut the person you have associated with for a week, the instant you feel or suppose yourself in a situation which makes it disagreeable to own him. Sir Arthur only stipulated, that a little ragged boy, for the guide of one penny sterling, should run to meet his coachman, and turn his equipage back to Knocknawoonck.

When this was arranged, and the emissary dispatched, the knight and his daughter left the high-road, and, following a wandering path among sandy hills, partially covered with sand-wort and the long grass called bent, soon attained the side of the ocean. The tide was by no means so far out as they had computed; but this gave them no alarm; there were seldom ten days in the year when it approached so near the cliffs as not to leave a dry passage. But, nevertheless, at periods of spring-tide, or even when the ordinary flood was accelerated by high winds, this road was altogether covered by the sea; and tradition had recorded several fatal accidents which had happened on such occasions. Still, such dangers were considered as remote and improbable; and rather served as a means of exciting the hand-to-hand fight between Knocknawoonck and Monkbarrows by the sands.

As Sir Arthur and Miss Wardour paced along, enjoying the pleasant footing afforded by the cool moist sand, Miss Wardour could not help observing, that the last tide had risen considerably above its ordinary level, and that the sands, on the same observation, but without its occurring to either of them to be alarmed at the circumstance. The sun was now resting his huge disk upon the edge of the level ocean, and filled the accumulation of towering clouds through which he had travelled, like a moving day, and which now assembled on all sides, like misfortunes and disasters around a sinking empire, and falling monarch. Still, however, his dying splendour gave a sombre magnificence to the massed congregation of vapours, forming out of their unsubstantial gloom, the show of pyramids and towers, touched with gold and purple, through the vapoury fumes, some with a hue of deep and dark red. The distant sea, stretched beneath this varied and gorgeous canvas, lay almost perfectly still, reflecting back the dark outlines of the distant land, and the Aurora's lamp, and the splendid cloudings of the colours amidst which he was setting. Nearer to the beach, the tide rippled onward in waves of sparkling silver, that impeded not the rapid, graceful advances made upon the sands.

With a mind employed in admiration of the romantic scene, or perhaps on some more agitating topic, Miss Wardour advanced in silence by her father's side, whose inarticulate and offended dignity forbade her to open any conversation. Following the windings of the beach, they passed one projecting point or headland of rock after another, and now sounded themselves under a huge and continued extent of the precipices by which that iron-bound coast is in most places defended. Long projecting reefs of rock, extending under water, and only evoking their existence by here and there a peak entirely bare, or by the breakers which foamed over those that were partially covered, rendered Knocknawoonck bay dreaded by pilots and ship-masters. The crags and points on which rocks jutted forth, the height of two or three hundred feet, afforded in their crevices shelter for unnumbered sea-fowl, in situations seemingly secured by their dizzy height, and from the sunlight, from the prying eyes of the tribes, with the instinct which sends them to seek the land before a storm arises, were now winging towards their nests with the shrill and dissontant clang which announces the approach of food. The disk of the sun became almost totally obscured ere he had set altogether sunk beyond the horizon, and an early and faint shade of darkness obliterated the scene. The wind was of the evening. There was no dark sound to arise; but its wild and moaning sound was heard for some time, and its effects became visible on the bosom of the sea, before the gale was felt on shore.

They came to a cape, which the quick eye of experience discerned; the flat horizon, without the least projection of rock, and the smoothness of the sea, which was as calm as possible, gave in every view evidence of a contrary wind on the land.

With the sudden change of weather, Miss Wardour drew close to her father, and held his arm fast. "I wish," at length she said, "but almost in a whisper, he need not have exclaimed to express his apprehensions, "I wish we had kept the road we intended, or waited at Monkbarrows for the carriage." Sir Arthur looked round, but did not see, or would not acknowledge them. "No," she added, "I could hardly keep pace, indicating a feeling that some exertion was necessary to accomplish his consolatory prediction.

They were now near the centre of a deep but narrow bay, or recess, formed by two projecting capes of high and inaccessible rock, which shot out into the sea like the horns of a crescent; and neither durst communicate the apprehension which each began to entertain, that, from the unusually rapid advance of the tide, the whole of the promontory might be deprived of the power of proceeding by doubling the promontory which lay before them, or of retracing by the road which brought them thither.

As they thus pressed forward, longing doubtless to exchange the easy curving line, which the sinuosities of the bay compelled them to adopt, for a straighter and more expeditious path, though less conforming to the general intention, Miss Wardour observed a human figure on the beach advancing to meet them. "Thank God," he exclaimed, "we shall get round Hanketi-head; that person must have passed it." This exclamation was sent to the feeling of hope, though he had suppressed that of apprehension.

"Thank God indeed!" echoed his daughter, half audibly, half internally, as expressing the sensations which she strongly felt.
The figure which advanced to meet them made many steps while the bow of the canoe now disturbed by wind and by a drizzling rain, prevented them from seeing or comprehending distinctly. Some time before they met, Sir Arthur could recognize the excited and half-despairing voice of Ochitree. It is said that even the brute creation lay aside its animosities and antipathies when pressed by an instant and common danger. The beach under Halket-head, rapidly diminishing in extent by the encroachments of a spring-tide and a north-west wind, was in like manner a neutral field, where even a justice of peace and a strolling mendicant might meet upon the same footing of mutual forbearance.

"Turn back! turn back!" exclaimed the vagrant; "why did ye not turn when I waved to you?"

"We thought," replied Sir Arthur, in great agitation, "we thought we could get round Halket-head.

"Halket-head! The tide will be running on Halket-head, by this time, like the Fall of Fyres. It was a thing we did not dream of sixty minutes since—it was coming in three feet already. We will maybe get back by Bally-burgh Nees Point yet. The Lord help us, it's our only chance. We can die another day.

"My God, my child!"—"My father, my dear father!" exclaimed the parent and daughter, as, fearing them strength and speed, they turned to return and advance towards the double tide point, the projection of which formed the southern extremity of the bay.

"I heard ye were here, frae the bit callant ye sent to me," said the man, and the lassie, as she teigned stoutly on a step or two behind Miss Wardour, and could indubitably think of the dainty young leddy's peril, that has aye been kind to ilk forlorn heart that cast a look at the tide and the rim of the tide, till I settled that it oan get down ye or me warning, we was wad Guildie! for what mortal can jaunty sic a race as the tide is running e'en now? See, yonder's the Ratten's Skerry—he says his neb abune the water in my day—but he's aneath it now.

Sir Arthur cast a look in the direction in which the old man pointed. A huge rock, which in general, even in spring-tides, displayed a hull like the keel of a large vessel, was now quite under water, and its place only indicated by the boiling and breaking up of waves which encountered sub-marine resistance.

"Mak haste, mak haste, my bonny leddy," continued the old man, "mak haste and they may do ye! They can hae nane o' frail arm if it's now, but it's been in as sair stress as this is yet. Take haud o' my arm, my winsome leddy! D'ye see we're black speck among the wallowing waves yonder? This morning it was as high as the mast o' a brig—it's ab m'much e'en now—but, while I see as muckle black about us as the crown o' my hat, I wu'nna believe ye but we'll get round the Bally-burgh Nees for that's come and gone yet.

Isabella, in silence, accepted from the old man the assistance which Sir Arthur was less able to afford him. The waves had now encroached so much upon the beach that not a step or two near where they had hitherto had on the sand must be exchanged for a rougher path close to the foot of the cliff, and in some places even raised upon its lower ledge. It would have been utterly impossible for Sir Arthur Wardour, or his daughter, to have found their way along these shelves without the guidance and encouragement of the beargar, who had been thrown before high tides, though never, he acknowledged, "in sae awesome a night as this."

It was indeed a dreadful evening. The howling of the storm mingled with the shrieks of the sea to cast a cold, and often as the thunder rolled, with a voice, which, pent between two of the most magnificent, yet most dreadful objects of nature—a raging tide and an insurmountable precipice—toilet alit before the night, he has never been able to say that other stane—we ca' it the Cat's-lug—there was higher on the beach than those that had preceded it. Each day they did their best to keep it acceptable upon them. Still, however, loath to relinquish the last hopes of life, they bent their eyes on the black rock pointed out by Ochitree. It was yet farther on the south, the signal of safety and comfort to be seen, until they came to a turn in their precarious path, where an intervening projection of rock hid it from their sight. Deprived of the view of the beacon on which they had relied, they now perceived the double agony of terror and suspense. They struggled forward; however; but when they arrived at the point from which they ought to have seen the crag, it was no longer visible. The signal of safety and comfort a thousand white breakers, which, dashing upon the point of the promontory, rose in prodigious sheets of snowy foam, as high as the mast of a first-rate man-of-war, against the dark brow of the projection.

The countenance of the old man fell. Isabella gave a faint shriek, and, "God have mercy upon us!" which her guide solemnly uttered, was piteously echoed by Sir Arthur—"My child! my child!—to die such a death!"

"My father! my dear father!" his daughter exclaimed, clinging to him,—and you too, who have lost your home, and your kindred suffering together."

"That's not the worth the counting," said the old man. "I hae lived to be weary o' life; and here or yonder—at the back o' a's dike, in a wreath o' snow, or in the wame o' a wave, what signifies how the auld gaberlunzie dies?"

"Good man," said Sir Arthur, "can you think of nothing—of no help?—I'll make you rich—I'll give you a farm in the south."

"Our riches will be soon equal," said the beggar, looking out upon the strife of the waters—they are sea already; I for hae nee land, and you would give your fair boundand for a square yard of rock that would be dry for twa hours.

While they exchanged these words, they paused upon the highest ledge of rock to which they could attain; for it seemed that the further attempt to move forward could only serve to accelerate their fate. Here, then, they were to await the sure though slow, progress of the ebbing element, something in the situation of the martyrs of the early church, exposed by heathen tyrants to be slain by wild beasts, were compelled for a time to witness the impatience and rage by which the animals were agitated, while awaiting the signal for unloosing their graces, and letting themselves upon the wild beasts, to rend their flesh and bone. The mists and clouds which had invested the crag, making it appear as if it had been raised above the height above the tide, when we could remain till morning, or till help comes! They must be aware of our situation, and will raise the country to relieve us!"

Sir Arthur, who heard, but scarcely comprehended, his daughter's question, turned, nevertheless, instinctively and eagerly to the old man, as if his lives were in his gift. Ochitree paused, "I was a bauld cragman," he said, "once in my life, and losen a kitty. Brack's and laird, my man, you hae harned down the crag, and yon very black rocks; but it's lang, lang syne, and nae mortal could speel them without a rope—and if I hae ane, my re-sight, and my footstep, and my hand-grin, hae a' failed mony a day since—now how could I save you?—but there was a path here once, though maybe, if we could see it, ye would rather bide where we are. His name be praised—that he executed sudden, there's ane comin down the crag e'en now!—Then, exalting his voice, he hollaid out to the daring adventurer such instructions as his former practice, and the remembrance of local cir- cumstances, and of the dead men, he could see right—ye're right—that gate, that gate!—fasten the rope well round Crammies's–that's the muckle black stane—eastwa plies round it—that's it!—now, ye wreeze your step toward it, and then—by the spray of some giant bellow, which threw itself to be the root o' an alk-tree there—that will do!—
canny now, laddie—canny now—take rent and taketime—Lord bless ye, tak time.—Very well!—Now ye maun get to Besoy's Apron, that's the muckle braid flit that stands under the tow, ye ken? w' me, we'll see that the tow is over the bank, I'll win at ye, and then we'll be able to get up the young leddy and Sir Arthur.

The adventurer, following the directions of old Edwin, took his, way toward the end of the rope, which he secured around Miss Wardour, wrapping her previously in his own blue gown, to preserve her as much as possible from injury. Then, availing himself of the rope to pull her up, he began to ascend the face of the crag—a most precautious and dizzv y undertaking, which, however, after one or two perilous escapes, placed her safely on the flat stone beside our friend. Their joint strength was able to raise Isabella to the place of safety which they had attained. Loved then descended in order to assist Sir Arthur, around whom he adjusted the rope; and again mounting to their place of refuge, with the assistance of old Ochiltrie, and such aid as Sir Arthur himself could afford, he raised him beyond the reach of the falls.

The sound of water from approaching and appartently inevitable death, ind it. Lowest effect. The father and daughter threw the stones into each other's arms, kindled the fire, laddies, the escape was connected with the prospect of passing a tempestuous night upon a precipitous ledge of rock, which afforded footing for the four shivering beings in doubt as to what would happen to them. They clung there in hope of some shelter from the devouring element which raged beneath. The spray of the fallows, which attained in fearful succession the foot of the precipice, overflowing the boulder on which the spen ately stood, flew as high as their place of temporary refuge; and the thunderous sound with which they dashed against the rocks beneath, seemed as if they sought to fill the fugitives in accents of thunder as their destined prey. It was a summer night doub-tles; yet the probability was slender, that a frame so delicate as that of Miss Wardour should survive till morning the drenching of the spray; and the dashing of the rains, which now burst in full violence, accompanied with deep and heavy gusts of wind, added to the constrained and perilous circumstances of their situation.

"The lassie—the pur sweet lassie," said the old man; "mony such a night have I weathered at hame and aroad, but, God guide us, how can she ever weather this with us?"

His apprehension was communicated in sobhoreted accounts to Lovel; for, with the sort of free-masonry by which bold and ready spirits correspond in moment. He had been the means of introducing an acquaintance with the author of that which he had established a mutual confidence. "I'll climb up the cliff again," said Loved. "I'm bad—daylight enough left to see my footing: I'll climb up, and call for more assistance.

Do so, do so, for heaven's sake." said Sir Arthur cagily.

"Are ye mad?" said the mendicant. "Francie o' Fowlishead, and he was the best篡man that ever speld hough, (minr by token, he brake his neck upon the Dunby of Slaines) wadna has ventured upon the Halket-head crags after sun-down—It's (tis good a grand wonder besides, that ye ain't not in the middle o' that roaring sea; wi' what ye have done already—I didna think there was the man left alive who was able to come down the crags as ye did. I qualmly thought ye did it yourself, at this hour, and in this weather, in the youngest and yallest of my strength—But to venture up again—it's a mere and a clear temptng o' Providence.

He answered Loved. "I marked all the stations perfectly as I came down, and there is still enough left to see them quite well—I am sure I can do it with perfect safety. Stay here, your good lady's service, and the doings o' the houkit.

"Deil be in my feet then," answered the besedeine madly; "if ye gang, I'll gang too; for between the two o' us, we'll hae mair than work enough to get to the top o' the houkit,"

"No, no—stay you here and attend to Miss Wardour—you see Sir Arthur is quite exhausted.

"Stay yourself then, and I'll gae," said the old man. "Let death spare the green corn and take the ripe."

"Both yon of you, I charge you," said Isabella, finnally. "I am well, and can spend the night very well here—l feel quite refreshed." So saying, her voice failed her—she sunk down, and would have fallen from the crag, had she not been supported by Lovel and Ochiltrie who placed her in a posture half sitting, half reclining beside her father, who, exhu-asted by fatigue of body and mind so extreme and unusual, had already sat down on a stone in a sort of suppor-

"It is impossible to leave them," said Lovel—
"What is to be done?—Hark! hark!—Did I not hear a hallow?"

"The shriek of a Tamnie Norie," answered Ochiltrie. "I ken the girl well."

"No, by Heaven," replied Loved, "it was a human voice.

A distant hail was repeated, the sound plainly distinguishable, among the various elemental noises and the clang of the sea-mews by which they were surrounded. The mendicant and Loved exerted their voices in a loud hallow, the former waving Miss Wardour's handkerchief, and the latter end of his staff to make them conspicuous from above. Though the shouts were repeated, it was some time before they were in exact response to their own, leaving the unfortunate sufferers uncertain as to which of them they should attend. In addition, the growing twilight, and increasing storm, they had made the persons who

The shout of human voices from above was soon augmented, and the gleam of torches mingled with those lights of evening which still remained amidst the darkness of the storm. Such a spectacle was able to hold communication between the assistants above, and the sufferers beneath, who were still clinging to their precarious place of safety; but the howling of the tempest, the temperature, the twilight, and the articulation as those of the winged dieters of the crag, which shrieked in chorus, alarmed by the reiterated sound of human voices, where they had seldom been heard.

On the verge of the precipice an anxious group had now assembled. Oldbuck was the foremost and most earnest, pressing forward with unwonted determination to the very brink of the crag, and extending his head (his hat and wig secured by a handkerchief under his chin) over the dizzy height, with an air of determination which made his more timid assistants tremble.

"Haud a care, haud a care, Monklarne," cried Caxon, clinging to the skirts of his patron, and withholding him from danger as far as his strength permitted—"God's sake, haud a care!—Sir Arthur's drowned already, and an ye fa' over the cleugh too, there will be no wig left in the parish, and that's the minister's."

"Mind ye speak there," cried Mucklebackit, an old fisherman and smuggler—"mind the peak—Steenie, Stewie Wils, bring up the tackle—I' se warrant we'll come hevem them on board, Monklarne, wad ye but stand out till the lady's come."

"I see them," said Oldbuck. "I see them low down on that flat stone—Hilli-hillen, hilli-foo!—
"I see them myself well enough," said Mucklebackit. "They are sitting down under the

... crane's in a mist; but J'd ye think ven' they w'd skirlin' that mate like an auld skirl a little for a flaw o' weather—Binna hae it, he aye brings up the most—Och! the best yer made it, aye, nae redness in it, nae keen hand, nae brandy lang synge—Get up the pick-axe, make a stop for the mast—make the chair fast with the rattlin'—haut taught and bley! The whiskers with the mast of a boat, and half of the country fellows about had now appeared, either out of zeal or curiosity, it was soon sunk in the ground, and sufficiently secured. A strong man might have been, and no rope stretched among it, and reaed through a block at each end, formed an extrimore crane, which afforded the means of lowering an arm-chair, well secured and fastened, so that should the end of the chair have been hoisted. Their joy at hearing the preparations going on for their delivery was considerably qualified when they beheld the precarious vehicle, by means of which they were to be conveyed to upper air. It swung about a yard free of the spot which they occupied, obeying each impulse of the tempest, the empty air all around it, and depending upon the security of a rope, which, in the increasing darkness, had dwindled to an almost imperceptible thread. Besides the hazard of committing a human being to the vacant atmosphere in such a slight means of conveyance, there was the task of lowering the chair of the captain and his occupant being dashed, either by the wind or the vibrations of the cord, against the rugged face of the precipice. But to diminish the risk as much as possible, a pole was stretched down within the chair another line, which, being attached to it, and held by the persons beneath, might serve by way of gy, as Mucklebackit expressed it, to render inaccessible some means steady and uncertain. Still, to commit one's self in such a vehicle, through a howling tempest of wind and rain, with a beetling precipice above, and a raging abyss below, required that courage which despair alone can inspire. As wild as the sounds and sights of danger were, both above, beneath, and around, and doubtful and dangerous as the mode of escape appeared to be, Lovel and the old mendicant agreed, after a moment's consultation, and after the formers, by a sudden strong pull, had, at his own imminent risk, ascended the security of the rope, that it would be best to secure Miss Wardour in the chair, and trust to the tenderness and care of those above for her being safely craned up to the top of the crag.

"No, no," explained Isabella; "for God's sake, my friends, place him first in safety."

"It cannot be, Miss Wardour," said Lovel; "your life must be secured—the rope which bears your weight—"

"I will not listen to a reason so selfish!"

"But ye maun listen to it, my bonny lassie," said Ochiltree, "for 't our lives depend on it—besides, when ye get on the top o' the heugh yonder, ye can get there and mae guess o' what's a' going on in this Patmos o'ours—and Sir Arthur's far by that, as I am thinking."

Struck with the truth of this reasoning, she exclaimed, "True, most true; I am ready and willing to undertake the first risk—What shall I say to your traffic then?"

"Just to look that their tackle does not graze on the face o' the crag, and to let the chair down, and draw it up hoyly and fairly—we will hallow when we are able."

With the sedulous attention of a parent to a child, Lovel bound Miss Wardour with his handkerchief, buckcloth, and the mendicant's leathern belt, to back that of the chair, avertin' accordingly the security of each knot, while Ochiltree kept Sir Arthur quiet. "What are ye doing wi' my bairn?—What are you doing?—She shall not be separated from me then, with me, I command you."

"Lordsawe, Sir Arthur, haul your tongue, and be thankful to God that there's a-wiser folk than you to manage this job," cried the beggar, turning out by the under-margin of his button."

"Farewell, my father," murmered Isabella—"farewell, my—my friends!" and, shutting her eyes, as Edie's experience recommended, she gave the sign to Lovel, and he to those who were above. Sir Arthur, who had just sat on the crag, was carried away by the gale, up the side of the hill, and down the fast face by the line which Lovel managed. With it he hauled a boat, which he watched the flutter of the white dress, until the vehicle was on a level with the brink of the crag.

"Canny now, lads, canny now!" exclaimed the Mucklebackit, who acted as commodore; "we've the yard a bit—Now—there! there she sits safe on dry land out of the dale.

A loud shout announced the successful experiment to her fellow-sufferers beneath, who replied with a ready and cheerful hallelujah. Monkams, in his ecstasy of joy, attempted to get up to the waiting lady, and would have pulled off his coat and waistcoat for the same purpose, had he not been withheld by the cautious Caxton. Hand a cap o' us, ye gee-r, honour will be killed wi' the hoast—ye'll no get out o' your night-cowl this fortnight—and that will suit us unco ill. —Na, na, there's the chariot down by, it twa o' the folk carry the young leddy there."

"You right," said the Antiquary, adjusting the sleeves and collar of his coat, "you're right, Caxton; this is an emergency night to swim in—Miss Wardour, let me bid you to the chariot!"

"Not a bit of it," answered the old man."

In a few distinct words, evincing how much his resolution had surmounted even the mortal fear of an agitating a hazard, she explained the nature of the situation beneath, and the wishes of Lovel and Ochiltree.

"Right, right, that's right too—I should like to see the son, Sir Gamelyn de Guardover on dry land myself—If I had a son I would be the almoner, oath, and the ragman-roof to boot, and acknowledge Queen Mary to be nothing better than she should be to get alongside my bottle of old port that lies away from me, and keep sweet between. But she's not here now, and here a' comes—for the chair was near lowered, and Sir Arthur made fast in it, without much consciousness on his own part—here a' coach—bowes away, my boys—canny wi' him— a piece of a hundred links is hanging on a temp'rnary tow—the whole barony of Knockwinnoch depends on three plies of hemp—respeces from here, respect from—look to your end—look to a rope's end. —Welcome, welcome, my good old friend, to firm land, though I cannot so to warm land or to dry land—a cord for ever again."

"No father, though not in the sense of the base proverb—a fico for the phrase—better us, per ser per car."

While Oldbuck ran on in this way, Sir Arthur was safely within the close under the observation who, assuming that authority which the circumstances demanded, ordered some of the assistants to convey him to the chariot, promising to follow in a few minutes. She lingered on the cliff, holding an old countryman's arm, to witness probably the safe of those whose dangers she had shared.

"What have we here?" said Oldbuck, as the vehicle once more ascended. "What patched and with better-beaten matter is this?" Then, as the torche illumined the rough face and grey hairs of old Ochiltree,—"What is it that?—come, old Muck, I must needs have a word with thee—but who the devil makes up your party besides?"

"Ane that's weel worth any two o' us, Monks—That's the young stranger lad they ca' Lovel—and he's believed for the last night, as I can't deny, to relyon, and was willing to waste them a' rather the than endanger tither folk's—A's body, sir, as ye weel was an auld man's bewailing—mind there's no laying now how we're to get there;— Nay, but that's the Cat's-eye corner—bide weel o' Crumming's horn."

"Have a care indeed," echoed Oldbuck; "What is it my rara arums—my black swan—my phrenology, with a post-chaise?—take care of him Mucklebackit."

"As muckle care as if he were a greybeard's brandy, and he can't take out it his hair waf eyes— John Uglow's—Yo, no, no, very well, were was with him!"
THE ANTIQUARY.

...non-fic-length. You are aware that the passage allotted for the passage of a salmon through a dam, dike, or weir, by statute, is the length within which a full-grown pig can turn himself round—now, I have a scheme to prove that, as terrestrial objects were thus appealed to for ascertaining submarime measurement, so it must be supposed that the productions of the water were established as cases of the extent of land.

Shathmont—salmon—you see the close alliance of the sounds; dropping out two a’s and t, and assuming an I, makes the whole difference—I wish, Heaven no antiquarian demand had demanded, heavier concessions.

“But, my dear sir, I really must go home—I am wet to the skin.”

“Shalt have my night-gown, man, and slippers, and catch the antiquarian fever as men do the plague, by wearing infected garments—nay, I know what you would be—at your are afraid to put the old bachelor to charges. But is there not the remains of that glorius chicken-pie—which, meo arbitrio, is better cold than hot—and that bottle of my oldest port, out of which the silly brain-sack Baronet (whom I cannot pardon, since he has escaped breaking his neck) had just taken one glass, when his infant noodle went a wool-gathering after Gamelyn de Guardover?"

So saying, he dragged Lovel forward, till the Palmer’s-port of Monkbarns was in view. Never, perhaps, had it admitted two pedestrians more needing rest; for Monkbarns’s fatigue had been in a degree very contrary to his usual habits, and his more than usual exertions had undermined all the agitation of mind which had harassed and wieded him even more than his extraordinary exertions of body.

CHAPTER IX.

"Be brave," she cried, "you yet may be our guest, our haunted room was ever best." If, then, your Vaccine contains the right spirit, I’ll give you the word, and show you the room.

They reached the room in which they had dined, and were clamorously welcomed by Miss Old buck.

"Where’s the younger womankind?" said the Antiquary.

"Indeed, brother, amang’s the steer, Maria was na be guided by me—she set away to the Hall’s crait-leadh—I wonder ye didn’ see her.

"Eh!—what’s—that’s ye say, sister?—did the girl go out in a night like this to the Hall’s crait-leadh?—Good God! the misery of the night is not ended yet?"

"But ye winna wait, Monkbarns—ye are so imperative and impatient."

"Titel-tattle, woman," said the impatient and agitated Antiquary, "where is my dear Mary?"

"Just where ye said be yourself, Monkbarns—upstairs, and in her warm bed."

"I could have sworn it," said Old buck, laughing, but obviously much relieved, "I could have sworn it—green monkey did not care if we were all drowned together—why did ye only speak with the cat?"

"But ye wadna wait to hear out my tale, Monkbarns—she gae out, and she came in again with the gardener sae aune as she saw that name o’ ye were in the room o’la.”

"I am afraid," said Miss Old buck, "I have been safe in the chariot—she was nane a quarter of an hour syne, for it’s nane ganging in—yan droukit was she, pair thing, see I e’en put a glass o’ sherry in her name, and the cat was able to catch it.
"The chicken—oh, dear brother—there was but a whom bane, and scarce a drop o' the wine!"

"The Antiquary's countenance became clouded, though he was too well bred to give way, in the presence of a stranger, to his displeased surprise at the disappearance of the bottles which had reckoned on for the day. If, indeed, he had been more certain, he might have understood those looks of ire. "Oh dear! Monkbars, what's the use of making a wark!"

"I make no wark, as ye call it, woman."

"But what's the use of lookin' sau glum and glum about a pickle bane?—an ye will has the truth, ye maun ken the minister came in, worthy man—nay, discuss ane o' the best, an' all my present situation, as he ca'ed it, (for ye ken how weel he's gied wit' words), and here he wad bide till he could hear wit' certainty how the matter was likely to gang wi' ye at—He said fine things on the duty of religion to Providence's will, worthy man! That did he."

Oldbuck replied, catching the same tone, "Worthy man—he cared not how soon Monkbars had de- complained on an heir female. Fye a notion—and while he was occupied in this Christian office of consolation against impending evil, I reckon that the chicken was now disposed of, at ye least, "Dear brother, how can you speak of sic frivolities when you have had an escape from the clutches of the devil?"

"Better than my supper has had from the minister's crock, Griztie—it's all discussed, I suppose?"

"Hoot, Monkbars, ye speak as if there was nae mair meat in the house—Wad ye no have had me offer the woman your dish, and the slight refreshment after his walk frae the manse?"

Oldbuck half-whistled, half-lumined, the end of the old Scottish ditty, "O, first they ate the white puddings, And while they eat the black And thought the gudeman unto himself, The deil dink down wi' that, O!"

His sister hastened to silence his murmurs, by proposing some of the relics of the dinner. He spoke of another bottle of wine, but recommended in preference a glass of brandy which was really excellent. As no entreaties could prevail on Lovel to indulge the velvet night-cap and branched moring—glasses of his host, Oldbuck, who pretended to a little knowledge of the medical art, insisted on his going to bed as soon as possible, and proposed to dispatch a messenger (the indefatigable Caxton) to Fairport early in the morning, to procure him a change of clothes.

This was the first intimation Miss Oldbuck had received that the young stranger was to be their guest for the night, and such was the surprise with which she was struck by a proposal so uncommon, that, had the superincumbent weight of her head-dress, such as we before described, been less preponderant, her gray locks must have started up on end, and hurried from its position.

"Lord haud a care o' us!" exclaimed the astounded maid.

"What's the matter now, Griztie?"

"Wad ye but just speak a moment, Monkbars?"

"Speak!—What should I speak about?—I want to get to my bed—and this poor young fellow—let a bed be made for him, and put on his own personal clothes.

"A bed?—The Lord preserve us," again ejaculated Griztie.

"Why, what's the matter now? are there not beds and rooms enough in the house? Was it not an ancient heritium, in which I am warranted to say, beds were nightly made down for a score of pilgrims?

"Oh dear, Monkbars! who kens what they might so lang syne?—but in our time—beds—aye, there's beds now sic as they are—and rooms now to keep on yourself, the beds has been slept in, Lord kens the time, nor the rooms aired. If I had kent, Mar! and me might has gone down to the manse—Miss Bockie is aye fond to see us (and see is the minister, brother)—But now, gude awa!"

"Is there not the Green Room, Griztie?"

"Truth be there, and it is in decent order too, though nobody has sleepeth there since Dr. Hysastery, and—"

"And we?"

"And what! I'm sure ye ken yourself what a clock he had—ye wadna expose the young gentleman to the like o' that, wad ye?"

Lovel interrupted, upon hearing this altercation, and protested he would far rather walk home than go them to the least inconvenience—that the exercise would be no harm to him—that he knew the road, and might direct himself, and thought the night was about, and so forth; adding that all that might suggest could be an excuse for escaping from a hospitality which seemed more inconvenient to him than be could possibly have anticipated. But the howling of the wind, and muttering of the rain against the windows, with his knowledge of the preceding fatigue of the evening, must have prohibited Oldbuck, even had he entertained less regard for his young friend than he really felt, from permitting him to depart. Besides, he was piqued in honour to shew that he himself was not governed by woman-kind.

Sit ye down, ye poor lassie, till ye can get your breath; and, after that, ye can move from here. And, although the old adventurer, Hysastery, dree'd pain and colour in the charmed apartment, it is no reason why a gallant knight like you, nearly twice as tall, and not half so leavy, should not encounter and break the spell.

"What! a haunted apartment, I suppose?"

"To be sure, to be sure—every mansion in the country of the slightest antiquity has its ghosts and its haunted chamber, and you must not suppose worse off than our neighbours. They are going indeed, somewhat out of fashion. I have seen the day when it was considered much better, in an old manor-house, you ran the risk of being made a ghost yourself, as Hamlet says—Yes, if ye had challenged the existence of Redcowl in the castle of Glenastane, or Sir Peter Fingal, or ye went out to his court-yard, milde ye betake yourself to your weapon, and if your trick of fences was not the better, would have stuck ye like a pakuikin. I was once stayed, as you may observe in my coat, in such an affair—but I humbled myself and apologized to Redcowl; for, even in my younger days, I was no friend to the manaechain, or duel, and would rather walk with Sir Piama than with Sir Knite, I care not who knows so much of my valour—thank God I am old now, and can indulge my irritability without the necessity of supporting them by cold steel."

Here Miss Oldbuck re-entered, with a singularly sage expression of countenance.

"Mr. Lovel's bed's ready, brother—clean sheets—well aired—a sunbeam in the room—Sir Piama (I am sure, if I may attempt (incom- plete him,) it's no for the trouble—and I hope you will have a good night's rest—But"

"You are resolved," said the Antiquary, "to do what you have conceived of it."

"Me?—I am sure I have said naething, Monkbars."

"My dear madam," said Lovel, "allow me to tell you the meaning of your obliging anxiety on my account."

"On, Monkbars does not like to hear of it, when he knows you have been in the room with an ill name; and so well mend it if that the room be as the rest. For, whenever the bellman was sleeping, he had that marvellous communication about the grand law-plays between about his legs, that poor Rab Tull, who was not a great scholar, was clean overwhelmed. Od, but he was a bauld body, and he minded the Latin name for the deed that was a habit in our province. I am writing about a cart I fancy, for the ghastly cried eye, cartier, cartier.

"Ca gira, you transformer of languages," cried Old- buck; "if my ancestor had learned no other language in the other world, at least he would not forget the Latinity for which he was so famous while in this."

"Well, well, cartie be it then, but they ca' t'cartier that's told o' that or he canna have got it. It can be no cartier that it was ca gira, and made a sign to Rab to follow it. Rab Tull keep a highland heart, and bang'd o' the bed, and till some of his restless clans— and he was a man to follow the tae an' braid, over the road and up the place we ca' the high-dow-cot, (a sort of a little tower in the corner of the auld house, where there was a rick o' usquebaugh, boxes an' truckens,) and there the ghastly gae Rab a kick wi' the foot and a kick wi' the tae the lot, to that very udder country tabernacle of a cabinet that my brother has standing beside his library table, and then disappeared like a puff o' tobacco, leaving Rab in a very pitiful condition."

"Tenues ascitis in aurea," quoted Old-buck. "Marry, sir, manna be it. But, sure enough, the deed was there found in a drawer of the same repository, which contained many other curious old papers, now properly labelled and arranged, and which seem to have belonged to my ancestor, the first possessor of Monkbarns. This has the number two and the year sixty-five, was the original Charter of Erection of the Abbey, Abbey Lands, and so forth, of Trotcuny, comprizing Monkbarns and others, into Lordship of Regality in favour of the first Earl. This is a favourite of James the Sixth. It is subscribed by the King at Westminster, the seventeenth day of January, A.D. 1606, one thousand six hundred and twelve years—thirteen. It is not worth while to repeat the witness names.

"I would rather," said Lovel, with awakened curiosity, "I would rather hear your opinion of the way in which the deed was discovered."

"Why, if I wanted a patron for my legend, I could find no less a one than Saint Augustine, who tells the story of a deceived person appearing to his son, when sure for a debt which had been paid, and directing him where to find the discharge."

The Legend of Mrs. Griessel Old-buck was partly taken from an extraordinary story which happened about seventy years since, in the South of Scotland, in the interests of that place, in which it merits being mentioned in this place. Mr. R—of Bowland, a gentleman of landed property in the vale of Gala, was prosecuted and convicted of an embezzlement, of several arrears of rent (or tithe) for which he was said to be indebted to a noble family of that place. Several months after day in court, Mr. R— was strongly impressed with the belief that his father had, by a form of process peculiar to the law of Scotland, purchased these lands from the tithe, and therefore that the present prosecution was groundless. But, after an indubitable search among his father's papers, an investigation of the public records, and a careful inquiry among all persons who had transacted law business for his father, no evidence could be recovered to support his defence. The period was now near at hand when he conceived the loss of his lawsuit to be inevitable, and he had formed his determination to ride to Edinburgh next day, and make the best bargain he could in the way of compromise. He went to bed with this resolution, and, with all the circumstances of the case fresh upon his mind, very much in the following purpose. His father, who had been many years dead, was supposed to have been highly indigent, and his father's mind was therefore apprised of the cause of his distress, adding the penalty of a considerable sum of money was the more unpleasant to him, because it had a strange consciousness that it was not due, though he was unable to recover any evidence in support of his belief.

You are probably aware that this is the manner of the law, that you are not required to prove the money is due, but only to show that you require to be paid, for payment of which you are now prosecuted. The papers relating to the transaction are in the hands of Mr. —, at present tenant of the property, who is at present professional business, and resident at Hayven, near Edinburgh. He will not, however, undertake to examine it for a particular reason, but who never on any other occasion transacted business on my account. It is very possible, pursued the vision, that he might be disposed to write me the information which is now of a very old date; but you may call it to his reollection by strengthening it that when he was young in the office there was difficulty in getting change for a Portuguese piece of gold, and that we were forced to drink out the wines of taverns."
Mr. R—awoke in the morning with all the words of the vision imprinted on his mind, and thought it worth while to visit the country to Lancaster, instead of going straight to Edinburgh. When he came there he waited on the gentleman mentioned in the dream, a very old man; without saying any thing of the vision, he inquired whether he remembered having conducted such a manner for his deceased father. The old gentleman could not at first bring the circumstances of the recollection, but on mention of the Portcullis piece of gold, which was returned under his memory; he made an immediate search for the papers, and recovered them, so that Mr. R—— came to Edinburgh the documents necessary to gain the cause which was afterwards recovered.

"The author has often heard this story told by persons who had the best means of knowing the facts, but who, from the recollection of such an event, but who, from the recollection of such an event, were not inclined to give themselves the credit of being deceived, and were certainly incapable of deception. He was not disposed to refuse the authority of the words, however extraordinary the circumstances may appear. The circumstantial character of the information given in the dream, takes it out of the great class of unproven circumstances of the kind which are occasioned by the fortuitous coincidence of actual events with the dream. On the other hand, few will suppose that the laws of nature were suspended, and a special communication from the dead to the living permitted, for the purpose of carrying on to another mind a certain number of the words of the dream. The author's theory is, that the dream was only the recapitulation of facts related by Dr. R——, which he had received from his father while in life, but which at first he never recollected as a general impression that the claim was settled. The author, however, is not disposed to receive this story without the thrill of ideas which they have lost during their waking hours."

THE ANTIQUA.

seemed as if the prolific and rich invention of old Chassey had animated the Flemish artist with its primalucia with the old legends of England caused the following verses, from that ancient and excellent poet, to be embroidered in Gothic letters, on a sort of border which he had added to the tapestry—:

Let her be oake's grove, straight as a lime,
Softly and loud the birds do sing, and free,
Both newly springing—at right foot or nine.
And all the freedom of the earth what hand can
From his forests, woods, and grass, so fair,
With branches broad laden with leaves new,
That saucers out against the spring sky,
Some golden red, and some a glad bright green.

And in another canton was the following similar legend:

And many an hay, and many as bind,
When by the sun, above me I beheld,
Of saws, sawders, backs and dogs
Full the wood, and many doors,
And many scissors that Yates
High on the trees and nuts ate.

The bed was of a dark and faded green, wrought to correspond with the tapestry, but by a more modern and less skilful hand. The large and heavy stuff-bottomed chairs, with black ebony backs, were embroidered after the same pattern, and a lofty chimney-piece, corresponding in its mounting with that on the old-fashioned toilet.

I 'heard,' muttered Love, as he took a cursory view of the room and its furniture,—that ghosts and phantasmagories of old, and absurd, they attached themselves, and I cannot disapprove of the taste of the disembodied printer of the Augsburg Confession. "But he found it so difficult to fix his attention on the vases of gold and jewel-work, which he saw in the apartment, with which they seemed so singularly to correspond, that he almost neglected the absence of those agitated feelings, half fear, half curiositv, which usually animate and unexpectly enter the chamber, and wonder, from which the anxious reality of his own hopeless passion at present detached him. For he now only entertained feelings like those expressed in the lines,—:

And here he stood changed
The tempest of my mind;
My heart, by thee from a stringed Became like time unkind.

He endeavored to conjure up something like the feelings which would, at another time, have been congenial to his situation, but his heart had no room for these vagaries of imagination. The recollection of Miss Warden, determined not to acknowledge him when compelled to endure his society, and evinced no purpose to escape from it, would have alone occupied his attention, had it been for a time. But this idea was succeeded by recollected more agitating if less painful—his hair-breath escape—the fortunate assistance which he had been able to render her—Yet, what was the real state of the case; the chance of his fate was yet doubtful, while it was uncertain whether her preserver had lost the life which he had exposed for so freely—Surely gratitude, at least, called for some little interest in his fate—But no—she could not be selfish or unjust—it was not part of her nature.

She only desired to shut the door against hope, and, even in compassion to him, to extinguish a passion which he could never return.

But this lover-like mode of reasoning was not likely to reconcile him to his fate since the more miserable his imagination presented Miss Warden, the more uncertain it was that he had been rendered by the extinction of his hopes. He was, indeed, conscious of possessing the power of removing her prejudices on some points; but, even in extremity, the most odious he had been. He did and remained witness which he had formed, of ascertaining that she desired an explanation ere he intruded one upon her. And turn the matter as he would, he could not regard his own feelings. To dispel the cloud of embarrasement as well as of grave surprise in her look when Oulduck presented him, and, perhaps, upon second thought, the other was assumed to cover the other. He would not relinquish a pursuit which had already cost him such pains. Plans, suit the romantic temper of the brain that entertained them, chased each other through his head, thick and irregular as the motes of the sun-beam, and long after he had laid himself to rest, continued to prevent the repose which he greatly desired. We are carried by the tale, of difficulties and difficulties with which each scheme appeared to be attended, he bent up his mind to the strong effort of shaking off his love, "like dew-drops from the lion's mane." And realizing the impossibility of that career of life which his unrequited affection had so long and so fruitlessly interrupted. In this last resolution, he endeavored to fortify himself by every argument, which the coldness and sarcasm of the title of his father, Miss Warden, had given him to think of; but he was not, as well as the grandest. "She shall not suppose," he said, "that, preparing on an accidental service to her or her father, I am desirous to intrude myself upon that notice, to which, perhaps, the conditions of the title of her father, or some other title, will see her no more. I will return to the land which, if it affords none fairer, has, at least many as air, and less naughty than Miss Warden. To-morrow I will bid adieu to the northern shores, and to her who is as cold and relentless as her climate." When he had for some time brooded over this sturdy resolution, exhausted nature at length gave way, and, besides of wrath, doubt, and anxiety, sunk into silence.

It is seldom that sleep, after such violent agitation, is either sound or refreshing. Love's was disturbed by a thousand and one dreams; he was a bird—he was a fish—or he flew like the one, and swam like the other—qualities which would have been very essential to his safety a few hours before. Then he found himself in Paradise; her father a triton, or a sea-gull; and Old-buck alternately a porpoise and a cormorant. These agreeable imaginations were varied by all the usual vagaries of a madman; and the vivid images of the visionary, the water seemed to burn him—the rocks felt like down-paddles as he was dashed against them—whatever he undertook failed in some strange and unlooked-for manner—and whatever he attempted, excited the attention, underwent, as he attempted to investigate it, some wild and wonder metaphors, while his mind continued all the while in some degree conscious of the frame, from which it was detached to free itself by awaking—fervish symptoms all, with which those who are haunted by the night-hag, whom the learned call Ephialtes, are but too well acquainted. At length these crude phantasms arranged themselves into something more regular, if indeed the imagination of Love, after he awoke, (for it was by no means the faculty in which his mind was least rich,) did not gradually, insensibly, and unintentionally, arrange in better order the scene, of which his sleep presented, it may be, a less distinct outline. Or it is possible that his feverish agitation may have been enough in manner to destroy the feeling of locality as to remember where he was, and the whole furniture of the Green Chamber was depicted to his slumbering eye. And here, once more, let me protest, that if there should be so much old-fashioned faith left among this shrewd and sceptical generation, as to suppose that what follows was an impression conveyed rather by the eye than by the imagination, I do not impugn their doctrine. He was then, or imagined himself, broad awake in the Green Chamber, gazing upon the flickering and occasional flames by which the smoke of the embers sent forth, as, one by one, they fell down upon the red embers, into which the principal part of the boughs to which they belonged had crumbled away. Intemperate and fancyish the eyes of the chamber, and his mysterious visits to the inmates of the chamber, awoke in his mind, and with it, as we often feel in dreams, an anxious and fearful expectation, which was gradually growing into some ghostly eye the object of our fear. Brighter sparks of light flashed from the chimney with such intense brilliancy, as to enlighten all the room. The tapestry before it had a vivid with which he was not surprised to become animated. The hunters blew their horns——then the stag seemed to fly, the boar to rustle, and the hounds to assail the one and pursue the other:

cry of dole, mangled by throttling dogs—the shouts of men, and the clatter of horses' hoofs, seemed to once surround him—while every group pursued, with the exception of him, the enjoyment of the chase, which the artist had represented them as engaged. Lovel looked on this strange scene devoid of wonder, (which seldom intrudes itself upon the sleeping figure,) and began to think that the dream appeared to alter. At length an individual figure among the tossed huntsmen, as he guessed upon them more fixated, seemed to leave the arena and to approach the bed of the sleeping figure. As he drew near, this figure appeared to alter. His bugle-horn became a brazen clapped volume; his hunting-cap changed to such a furred head-gear as graces the burgo-masters of Rembrandt; his red moustachio, which remained to his features, no longer agitated with the fury of the chase, were changed to such a state of awful and stern composure, as might best portray the first proprietor of Monmouth, such as he had been described to Lovel by his descendant in the course of the preceding evening. As this metamorphosis took place, the hubbub among the other personages in the arena disappeared from the imagination of the dreamer, which was now exclusively bent upon the simple figure before him. Lovel strove to interrogate this awful person in the form of exorcism proper for the occasion; but in vain. His usual dreamy dulness refused his voice, and clung, palsied, to the roof of his mouth. Aldobrand held up his finger, as if to impose silence upon the guest who had intruded on his apartment, and to indicate his desire to speak. The figure refused his volume with its left hand, pointed to a passage in the page which he thus displayed. Although the language was unknown to our dreamer, his eye and attention were both strongly caught by the line which the figure seemed to press upon his notice, the words of which appeared to blaze with a supernatural light, and remained riveted upon his memory. As the vision slunk his volume, a strain of delightful music seemed to fill the apartment—Lovel started, and became altogether awake. The music, however, was still in his ears, nor ceased till he could distinctly follow the measure of an old Scotch tune.

He sat up in bed, and endeavoured to clear his brain of the phantoms which had disturbed it during the preceding night. The morning sun streamed through the half-closed shutters, and admitted a distinct light into the apartment. He looked round upon the hangings, but the mixed groups of silken and worsted hangings were as stationary as tenter-hooks could make them, and only trembled slightly as the early breeze, which found its way through an open crevice of the lattice window, glided along their surface. Lovel leaped out of bed, and, wrapping himself in a morning-gown, that had been carelessly laid by his bedside, stepped towards the window, which commanded a view of the sea, the roar of whose billows announced it still disquieted by the storm of the preceding evening, although the morning was fair and serene. The window of a turret, which projected at an angle with the wall, and was covered with a species of arabesque ornament, was half open, and from that quarter he heard again the same music which had probably broken short his dream. With its visionary character it had lost much of the effect of the night before, and its time notes, though with an anchorage upon the harpsichord, tolerably well performed—such is the caprice of imagination as affecting the arts. A female voice sung, with some taste and great singularity, something between a song and a hymn; in words to the following effect:—

"Why sit'st thou there by that ruin'd hall? Thou art sad and stern and gray; As days doth run, the tide returneth. O'er wonder how it passed away?—"

"Know'st thou not me?" the Deep Voices cried;
"So long enjoy'd, so oft misused—
As Hamlet, Ophelia,ickle wret, Desired, neglected, and accused!"

While the vision was being yet singing, Lovel had returned to his bed; the train of ideas which the awakened was romantic and pleasing, such as a soul delighted in, and, willingly adjourning, till the next rain. But a brief task of determining on his line of conduct, he abandoned himself to the pleasing languor inspired by the music, and fell into a sound and refreshing sleep, from which he was only awakened by the late awakened, a late hour by Mr. Lovel, who came creeping into the room to render the office of a valet-de-chambre.

"I have brushed your coat, sir," said the old man, when he perceived Lovel was awake; "the collar brought it free Fairport this morning, for that ye had yesterday in scantly feasibly dry, though it be a'night at the kitchen fire—and I have cleaned your shoon—I doubt ye'll no want me to ring your hair, for (with a gentle sigh) the young gentlemens wear crops now—but I see the curling-tongs put by is a bit turn over the brow, if ye like, before ye go down to breakfast—"

Lovel, who was by this time once more on his legs, declined the old man's professional office, but accompanied the retinue with such a dourness as completely salved his venerable feelings. "It's a pity he dieria get his hair tied and powdered," said the ancient frizer, when he had got once more into the kitchen, in which, on one propped his head, and hung there in one fragment of time; he had, to say, of his whole time—"it's a great pity, for he's a comely young gentleman.

"Hout aye, ye said gowk," said Jenny Rimbout, "would ye creel his bonny brown hair of your nasty uly, and then mosty it like the lamister's wig?—Ye'll be for your breakfast, I warrant?—hoo, there's a soup parrtick for you—will ye set ye better to be alistering at than the lather milk than muddling wi Mr. Lovel's hair—the and spoil the main natural and beauteous hair in a Fairport, butth and county."

The poor barber sighed over the disrespect into which his art had so universally fallen, but Jenny was a person too important to offend by contradition; so she continued her operations with a dexterity that was most publicly at one's humiliation, and the contents of the tinker which held a Scotch pint of substantial oatmeal porridge.

CHAPTER XI.

Sometimes he thinks that Heaven be pensive, and ord'red all the presents as they went. Sometimes that only (was wild Fancy's play,—

The loose and scatter'd relics of the day.

We must now request our readers to adjourn to the breakfast parlour of Mr. Oldbuck, who, despising the modern slope of tea and coffee, was substantially regaling himself, more magnificum, with cold meat, and a plate of a sort of beef called bacon, and the infinite variety of these to a woman's taste. He was diffidently restrained from pronouncing it decent, but did refrain, as he saw he should otherwise get great offence to his host, who had the liquor annually prepared with great labour, and bitter bulk of which the present generation only know the taste by its occurrence in revenue acts of parliament. The cups filled with cider, perry, and other excisable concoction, in which Mr. Lovel was en-} time—I am certain he looks very pale, and when he came here, he was as fresh as a rose."

"Why, sister, consider this rose of yours has been knocked about by sea and wind all yesterday evening, as if he had been a bunch of hank or tangle, and no matter how you may have helped it to look well, it is certain to wither."

"I certainly do still feel somewhat fatigued," said Lovel, "notwithstanding the excellent accommodations with which your hospitality so amply supplied me."

"Ah, sir!" said Miss Oldbuck, looking at him with a knowling smile, or what was meant to be one, "you'll not allow of any inconvenience, out of civility to us."

"Really, madam," replied Lovel, "I had no disturbance; for I cannot turn such the music with which some kind fairy favoured me."

"I doubt Mary was wakened you with her skreeching; she didn't ken I had left open a chink of your window, for, being the ghastly, the Green Room diana very well in a high wind—but, I am judging ye heard, ma'am than Mary's lilies yeastren—wool, men are hardy creatures, they can gaze through'w'th' thing. I am sure I had been undergo any thing of that nature—that's to say that beyond nature—I would have been the last of all to raise the cry. A be- house, be the consequence what like—and, I dare say, the minister would have done as mickle, and sce I hae taahd him, I ken naebody but my brother. Monk- haws would have been at the back of the very look o'it, if, indeed, it binn you, Mr. Lovel."

"A man of Mr. Oldbuck's learning, madam," answered the questioned party, "would not be exposed to the insult of any party of the underdaughters of Gibbon, (meaning possibly Midian,) as Mr. Blattergowl says—only and wadna be uncivil to one's foremost though to be a ghastly—I am sure I will try that, the brother, the ye showed me in a book, if any body is to sleep in that room again, though, I think, in Christian charity, ye should rather fit up the-metted-room—it is a wee churn and dark, to be sure, but then we ha'e sune solemn occasion for a spare bed."

"No, no, sister; dampness and darkness are worse than spectres—ours are spirits of light—and I would not be so unkind."

"I will do that by blythely, Monkbars, as I ha'e the ingredients, as my cookery book ca's them—There was vervain and dill—I mind that—Davie Dibble w'll ken to think better than I, as for the root and get them Latin n a u, and pepercorn, we ha'e wealth o' them, for—"

"Hyson, thou foolish woman!" thundered Oldbuck, "if ye suppose ye're making a baggie—or do you think that a spirit, though he be formed of air, can be expelled by a receipt against wind? This wise Grizel of mine, Mr. Lovel, resolute (with what accuracy you may judge) a charm which I once mentioned to her, and which, happening to hit her superstitious nodde, she remembers better than any thing tending to a useful purpose I may chance to have said for ten years—But many an old woman besides herself!"

"Auld woman! Monkbars," said Miss Oldbuck, rossed something above her usual submissive tone, "ye really are less than civil to me."

"Not less than just, Grizel; however, I include in the same class many a sounding name, from Jambchus down to Aubrey, who have wasted their time in devising imaginary remedies for non-existing diseases—but I hope, my young friend, that, charmed or uncharmed—secured by the potency of Hyson, etc., etc., etc., etc.

With venom and with dill, That hither witches of their will, or left disarmed and defenceless to the inroads of the invisible world, you will give another night to the terrors of the unknown, and another day to your faithful and dear friends."

"I heartily wish I could, but—"

"Nay, but me no buts—I have set my heart upon it here."

"I am greatly obliged, my dear sir, but—"

"Look ye there, now—but again!—I hate but; I know no form of expression in which he can appear, that is amiable, excepting as a butt of some—but is to me a more detestable combination of letters than no itself. No is a surly, honest fellow, speaks his mind rough and round and once at once. But is a sneaking, evasive, half-bred, exceptions sort of a conjuration, which comes to pull away the cup just when it is at your lips—"

The antiquary. — chap. xi.

...he did so; the lid opened, and discovered a thin, waxed, and indelible stain of ink at once of more than shagreen flax. "Then, Mr. Love, there is the work I mentioned to you last night—the rare quarto of the Augsburg Confession, the foundation at once and the bulwark of the consistory, bought by the famous, variable, Melanchthon, defended by the Elector of Saxony, and the other valiant hearts who stood up for their faith, even against the front of a powerful and victorious enemy; and by the pen of a remarkably praiseworthy Aldobrand Oldenbuck, my happy predecessor, during the yet more tyrannical attempts of Philip II. to suppress at once civil and religious liberty, for the purpose of this work, that eminent man was expelled from his ungrateful country, and driven to establish his household gods even here at Monkbarns, among the ruins of papal superstition and domination. Look upon his venerable effigies, Mr. Lovel, and respect the honourable occupant in which it presents him, as labouring personally at the press for the diffusion of Christian and political knowledge. And see here his favourite motto, expressive of his independence and self-reliance, which seemed to owe any thing to patronage, that was not earned by desert—expressive also, of that fine and free judgment of the press, so highly recommended by Horace. He was, indeed, a man who would have stood firm, had his whole printing-house, press, fonts, forms, great and small paste, been shivered to cinders. His motto: —Hic in honorem meum —for each printer had his motto, or device, when that illustrious art was first practised. My ancestor's was expressed as you see in the Teutonic phrase, Kerst am Wort (Geeze) that is, skill, or prudence, in ascribing to ourselves of our natural talents and advantages, will commend favour and patronage, even where it is withheld from pre-ordained, or ignorant. The same motto, after a moment's thoughtful silence, "Then that is the meaning of those German words?"

Unquestionably—you perceive the appropriate application of such expressions of inward worth, and of eminence in a useful and honourable art. — Each printer in those days, as I have already informed you, had his device, his impress, as I may call it, in the same manner as the doughty chivalry of the age, who frequented tilt and tournament. My ancestor boasted as much in his, as if he had displayed it over a conquered field of battle, though it betokened the diffusion of knowledge, not the effusion of blood. And yet there is a family tradition which affirms to him to have chosen it from a more romantic circumstance.

And what is that said to have been, my good sir?—continued the young gentleman.

"Why, it rather encroaches on my respected predecessor's fame for prudence and wisdom. — Sed etiam in prudens et sapientissimo —ever has played his fool in their turn. It is said, my ancestor, during his apprenticeship with the descendent of old Fust, whom popular tradition hath sent to the devil, under the name of Faustus, was attracted by a pretty slip of womankind, his Master's daughter, calling Bertha. They broke rings, or went through some idiotic ceremony, as is usual on such like occasions as the plighting of a true-love troth, and Aldobrand, for the time, left the more eminent towns, before they finally settled themselves for life. It was a wise custom; for, as such travellers were received like brethren in each town by those of their faith, they were there, in the end, to have the means either of gaining or communicating knowledge. When my ancestor returned to Nuremberg, he is said to have found his old master newly overthrown, this taking a direful shape; also that they hal-starched spires of nobility forsooth, in pursuit of the Ynswe-Frauo Bertha, whose father was understood to have bequeathed her a dowry which possessed, to speak in a common vernacular, of the winged, astral character. Bertha, not a bad sample of womankind, had made a vow she would only marry that man who could work her father's press. The skill, at that time, was as rare as wonderful, besides that the expeditious rid her off this burden at once of most of her shagreen flax.
In her tyne lik wyre's hens clokeit.
Ike and manna horst wil bairins was stokit.
He deid a boile o' bear in frietit fivne,
Hed his shoon and clothe and ilke wise see krius and ane foyth bainess wyric.

"You see how modest the author of this sepulchral commendation was—he tells us, that honest John could make five fistoles, or quarters, as you would say, out of the horn, instead of four,—that he gave the fifth to the wives of the parish, and accounted for the other five hundred and twelve to the abbey and chapter—that in his time the wives' hens always laid eggs, and devil thank them, if they got one-fifth of the abbey rents; and that honest men's heathens were never ubehave with offspring,—and, by the way, well e'er they must have been considered perfectly unaccountable. But come on—you'll see the Ginnel, and let us log on to the yellow sands, where the sea, like a real-sense enemy, is now retreating from the ground on which he gave us battle last night."

Thus saying, he led the way to the sands. Upon the links or downsw close to them, were seen four or five huts inhabited by fishermen, whose boats, drawn high upon the beach, lent the odourous vapours of pitch melting under a burning sun, to contend with those of the offals of fish and other nuisances, usually collected on the sea-shore by the passage of the surf. These complicated, stinking, abominable, a middle-aged woman, with a face which had defied a thousand storms, sat mending a net at the door of one of the huts. She was old, had nothing about her head, and a coat, which had formerly been that of a man, gave her a masculine air, which was increased by her strength, uncommon stature, and harsh voice. "What are ye for the day, your honour?" said she, or rather screamed, to Oldbuck; "caller haldocks and whiting—a bannock-fluke and a cock-paddle." "How much for the bannock-fluke and cock-paddle?" demanded the Antiquary.

"Four white shillings and sixpence," answered the Naiad.

"Four devils and six of their imp!" retorted the Antiquary: "do ye think I am mad, Maggie?

"And div ye think," rejoined the virago, setting her arms a-kimbo, "that my man and my man's are o' gae to the sea in weather like yeestreen and the day—i' the sea as it's yet outy—and get nothing for their fish, and be mised into the barcans, Monkbarns! It's no fish ye're buying—it's men's lives."

"Well, Maggie, I'll be fair—" said Oldbuck, "I'll bid you a shilling for cock-paddle and your honour or expense separately—and if all your fish are as well paid, I think your man, as you call him, and your sons, will make a good voyage."

"Or we were knockit against the Bell-Rock rather! it wad be better, and the bonnier o' the two. A shilling for that twa bannocks finds you indeed!"

"Well, well, you old beldam, carry your fish up to Monkbarns, and see what my sister will give you for them."

"Na, Monkbarns, deal a fit—I'll rather deal wi' yourself; for, though you're near enough, yet Miss Grizel has an unco close grip—I'll gie yo tham (in a softened tone) for three-and-sixpence—"

"Eighteen-pence, or nothing!"

"Eighteen-pence!" (in a loud tone of astonishment, which declined into a sort of rueful whine, when the dealer turned as if to walk away)—"I'll no be for the fish—then (louder, as she saw him moving off) —I'll gie them—ah—and—and—a half-a-dozen o' pertans to make the sauce, for three shillings and a dram."

"Half-a-crown then, Maggie, and a dram."

"A half—a-crown? my man hae's your sin gate, mane doubt; but a dram's worth still now—the distilleries is no working."

"And I hope they'll never work again in my time," said Oldbuck.

"Ay, ay—it's easy for your honour, and the like o' you gentle-folks to see that, which has stout and rubbish, and fire and sending, and meat and clath, and all; but an honest man, like me, was content with an honest fire, and meat, and dry clothes, and being o' coud, and had a sair heart, whilst is worst aye, wi' just tipsiness in your pock, wadna ye be glad to buy a dram wi', to be eiling and claise, and a supper and heart's ease into the bargain, till the morn's morning?"

"It's even too true an apology, Maggie. Is your Goodman o' so soon this morning, after his exertions last night?"

"In troth is he, Monkbarns; he was aaw this morning by four o'clock, when the sea was working like barm wi' yesterday's wind, and our bit cable-dancing in't like a cork."

"Well, he's an industrious fellow. Carry the fish up to Monkbarns."

"That I will, sir; I'll send little Jenny, she'll rin faster; but I'll en' on Miss Grizly for the dram myself, and say ye sent me."

A non-descript animal, which might have passed for a mermaid, as it was paddling in a pool among the rocks, was summoned ashore by the shrill scream of its dam; and having been undressed, as her mother called it, which was performed by adding a short red cloak to a petticoat, which was at first her sole covering, and which reached scantily below her knee, the child was dismissed with the fish in a basket, and a request on the part of Monkbarns, that "she would not have been long," said Oldbuck, with much self-complacency, "were my woman kind could have made such a reasonable bargain with that old skin-flint, though he was an hour with her in the study window, like three seas-gulls screaming and squawling in a gale of wind. But, come, we went on our way to Knockwinnock."

But what they draw from their own ancient custom, or constitute themselves, yet they are no rebels.

ROME.

With our readers' permission, we will expatiate the slow, though sturdy pace of the Antiquary, whose halts, as he turned round to his companion at every moment to point out something remarkable in the landscape, or to enforce some favourite topic more emphatically than the exercise of walking permitted, delayed their progress considerably.

Nothing, however, could alarm him of the dangers of the preceding evening. Miss Wardour was able to rise at her usual hour, and to apply herself to her usual occupations, after she had first satisfied her anxiety concerning her sister; and a state of mind on one was no farther indisposed by the effects of great agitation and unusual fatigue, but these were sufficient to induce her to keep her bedchamber.

To look back on the events of the preceding day, was, to Isabella, a very unpleasing retrospect. She owed her life, and that of her father, to the very person by whom, of all others, she wished least to be obliged, because she could hardly even express common gratitude towards him without encouraging hopes which might be injurious to them both. "Why should it be my fate to receive such benefits, and reflected at so much personal risk, from one whom I have a romantic passion I have so unceasingly laboured to discourage? Why should chance have given him this advantage over me and why, oh why, should a half subdue feeling in my own bosom, in spite of my sober reason, almost rejoice that he has attained it?"

While Miss Wardour thus taxed herself with wayward caprice, she beheld advancing down the avenue, not her younger and more dreadless preserver, but the old beggar who had made such a capital figure in the melodrama of the preceding evening.

She rang the bell for her maid-servant. "Bring me old man back."

The servant returned in a minute or two. —He will come up at no rate, madam—he says his clouts shoes never worn on a carpet in his life, and that, please God, he never shall.—Must I take him into the servants' hall?"

"No, stay, I want to speak with him. —W:value he?" she had lost sight of him as he approached the house.

"Sitting in the sun on the stone-bench in the court, beside the window of the flagged parlour."

"What was your father, sir?" he asked.

"The old man and beggar as he was, had apparently some internal consciousness of the favourable impressions connected with his tall form, commanding features, and long white beard and hair. It used to be remarked of him, that he was seldom seen but in a posture which showed these personal attributes to advantage. At present, as he lay half-reclined, with his wrinkled eyelids resting on the sky, his staff and bag laid beside him, and a cast of homely wisdom and sarcastic irony in the expression of his countenance, while he gazed for a moment around the court-yard, and then resumed his former look upward, he might have been taken by an artist as the model of an old philosopher of the Cynic school, musing upon the frivolity of mortal pursuits, and the futility of human aspirations, while looking up to the sources from which sought permanently good can alone be derived. The young lady, as she presented her tall and elegant figure at the opening of the lattice, was charmed by her presence, and endeavored, with which, according to the fashion of ancient times, the lower windows of the castle were secured, gave an interest of a different kind, and more palpable effect on the spectator, an imprisoned damsel communicating a tale of her durance to a palmer, in order that he might call upon the gallantry of every knight whom he should meet in his wanderings, to rescue her from her oppressive thraldom.

After Miss Wardour had offered, in the terms she thought would be most acceptable, those thanks which were the natural feelings of her heart, and her mind, she began to express herself in a manner which she supposed would speak more feelingly to his apprehension. "She did not know," she said, "what her father intended particularly to do for their preservation, but certainly it would be something that would make him easy for life, if he chose to reside at the castle, she would give orders."

The old man smiled, and shook his head. "I wad be bah a grievance and a disgrace to your fine servants, my lady, and I have never been a disgrace to any body yet, that I ken of."

"You must go in strict orders—"

"Ye're very kind—I doubtna, I doubtna; but there are some things a master can command, and some he canna—I dare say he wad gan them keep hands at their work if they could. And then, if they canna keep them on that gate—a—and he wad gan them gie me my soupa' ritch and bit meat. But trow ye sir, what Sir Arthur's command could forbid the gie o' the tongue or the blink o' the ee, or gan them gie me my food wi' the look o' kindness that gies it digest sae weel, or that he could make them forbear a' the slight and taunts that hurt ane's spirit mair nor downright mistreatment."

"Besides, I am the idiest auld carle that ever lived; I downna be bound down to hours o' eating and sleeping; and, to speak the honest truth, I wad be a very bad example in any weel-regulated family."

"Well then, what do you think of a nest o' cottage and a garden, and a daily dole, and nothing to do but to dig a little in your garden when you pleased yourself?"

"And how often wad that be, trow ye, my lady? maybe no ane sae mean as Candlemas and Yule—and if a' thing were done to my hand, as if I were Sir Arthur himself, I could never bide the staying still in a nest, and get a wife and a couple o' wee ones a' aboon my head night after night. And then I have a queer humour o' my ain, that sets a strolling beggar weel enough, whose word naebody minds—but ye ken Sir Arthur has odd sorts o' ways—and I wad be jist o' doing or scorning at them—and ye wad be angry, and then I wad be just fit to hang myself."

"O you are a licensed man," said Isabella; "we shall give you all reasonable scope: So you had better be ried, and remember your age."

"But I am no that asair faird yet," replied the men's dicant. "Oo, ancie a gait a whee steepens ye, and it was as your mother said—sae ye wadna be no sae asair as ye do now, for I'll a' the country about do for want o' auld Edie Ochiltree, the brings news and country cracks frae farm-stands to minther, and gingerbread to the laisses, and bring folk to mend their fists and the gypsies wives to clout their pans, and plait rush swords and grenadier caps for the weans, and buys the lair's fleas, and has skil o' ewe-ller and horse-illa, and tennel o' fiddle-mains."

"Well, then, only promise me that you will let me know should you ever wish to settle as you turn old and more incapable of making your usual rounds; and as you go, I'll have a bob or two."

"Na, na, my lady! I douna take muckle siller at anes, it's against our rule—and though it's maybe no civil to be repeating the like o' that—they say that Sir Arthur's like Sir James's, as Sir Arthur himself, and that he's run himself o' thought wi' his houghs and minings for lead and copper yonder."

"Isabella has some anxious anticipations to the same effect, for she had been shocked to hear that, and her embarrassments were such public talk; as if scandal ever failed to stoup upon so acceptable a quarry, as the failings of the good man, the decline of the power."

"Well, Edie, we have enough to pay our debts, let folks say what they will, and requiring you is one of the foremost—let me press this sum upon you."

"That I might be robbed and murdered some night between town and town? or, what's as bad, that I might live in constant apprehension o' it?—I am no to lower his voice to a whisper, and looking keenly around him—I am no that clean unprotected for neither; and though I should die at the back of a dike, they'll find me as muckle quilled in this auld blue gown as he wad bury me like a laird, and the lads and laisses a' the lyke would come too; and there's the gaberlunzie's burial provided for, and I need nae mair. Were the like o' me ever to change a note, what would the laisser do? I canna think o' so much charity after that?—I wad flit through the country like wild-fire, that auld Edie said has done sicken's like thing, and then, I'm warrant, I might grane my heart out or any body wad gie me either a lane o' a bodie."

"Is there nothing, then, that I can do for you?"

"Ou ay—I'll aye come for my annum as usual, and whiles I wad be fan o' a pikkle anything, and ye maw speak to the constable and ground-officer just to overlook me, and maybe ye'll gie a gudder word for me to Sandie Netherlands, the Miller, that he may chance in his muckle dog—I wadna hes it in hurt the puir beast, for it just does its office in banking at a gaberlunzie like me. And there's a thing maybe mair, but ye'll think it's very bauld the like o' me to speak o' it."

"What is it, Edie?—if it respects you it shall be done, if it is in my power."

"It respects yourself, and it is in your power, and I mean Honour. I wadna be no sae yin a' ye too, thought ye sae o' me. Be canny wi' the lad, for he lasses ye, an it's to you, and no to any thing, I could have done for you, that Sir Arthur and you was never verra.
e uttered these words in a low but distinct tone of voice; and, without waiting for an answer, walked into a low door which led to the apartments of servants, and so entered the house.

Miss Wardour remained for a moment or two in a situation in which she had heard the old man's extraordinary and especially, against bars of the window, nor could she determine upon saying even a single word, relative to a subject so base, until the beggar was out of sight. It was, said she, a piece of curiosity. That her friend had an interview and private conversation with this young and unknown stranger, should be a matter of interest for a person of the last class, with millions of young ladies passing through the streets, and among the number of one who was by profession gossip-general to the whole neighbourhood, gave her acute agony. She now resolved, to suppose that the old man would cheerfully do any thing to hurt her feelings, much to injure her; but the mere freedom of speaking upon such a subject, showed, as might have expected, a total absence of delicacy; and what might take it into his head to do or say next, that was pretty sure so professed an admirer of liberty did not hesitate to do or say without scruple. This she said, and when she had slighted the officious assistance of Lovel and Ochil, had been absent upon the preceding evening. This was in the agitation of spirits, she judged, and as Lovel, or Ochil, courted instantly as far back from the window, she could, without being seen, observe how the party was in front of the building, and, pointed to the various scowls on the faces of the others, and the look of bewilderment on Lovel much was, and erudite information, which, from the first look of his auditor, Isabella might shrewdly enough was enough. However, she said, that should take some resolution became instant and firm—she rang, therefore, for a servant, and told him to show the visitors to the drawing-room, as the time was then. The love of her own company, to consider, ere she made her appearance, to such of them that fittest for her to pursue, agreedly to her instructions, were introduced into the room where company was usually used.

CHAPTER XIII.

—The time was that I hated thee, And yet it is not that I bear thee love, The love which erst was twice to me, I will confound—

But do not look for further recompense.

As you Live it.

Miss Wardour's complexion was considerably heightened, when, after the delay necessary to form her ideas, she presented herself in the ring-room.

"I am glad you are come, my fair foe," said the old lady, greeting her with much kindness, "for I had a most refractory, or at least negligent, audior in my young friend here, while I endeavoured to introduce him acquainted with the history of Knocktwint Castle. I think the danger of last night has been nothing. But you, Miss Isabel, why you, as if flying through the night air had been your real and most congenial occupation. Your colour is quite better than when you honoured my hospitability by your visit!—And Sir Arthur—how fares your good old friend?"

"Indifferently well, Mr. Oldbuck; but, I am afraid, quite able to receive your congratulations, or to say—Mr. Lovel thanks for his unparal- leled exertions."

"Dare say not—A good down pillow for his good head were more meet than a couch so cheerless was his house, and his lady."

"I had no thought of intruding," said Lovel, looking at the ground, and speaking with hesitation and traced emotion; "I did not—did not mean to come; but my dear Mrs. Wardour, who—nobody who—must necessarily be unwell—mooted I mean, with painful reflections."

"Do not think my father so unjust and ungrateful," said Miss Wardour, "at all, Mr. Lovel; do not say, I am certain—that my father would be happy to show his gratitude—in any way—that is, which Mr. Lovel could consider as proper to accept out."

"Why, the dear lady?" interposed Oldbuck. "What sort of a qualification is that?—On my word, it reminds me of our minister, who, choosing, like a formal old sap as he is, to clink to his situation, thought it necessary to add the saving clause, Provided, madam, they be virtuous. Come, let us have no more of this nonsense—"Dare say Sir Arthur will but be well pleased with the future instructions that will come from the kingdom of subterraneous darkness and airy hope?—what says the swart spirit of the mine?"

"Has Sir Arthur had any good intelligence of his adventure lately in Glen-Avithers?"

Miss Wardour shook her head—"But indifferently, I fear, Mr. Oldbuck; but there lie, some specimens which have lately been sent down."

"Ah! my poor dear hundred pounds, which Sir Arthur persuaded me to give for a share in that hopeful scheme, would have bought a porter's load of mineralogy—But let me see them."

And so saying, they walked to the table in the recess, on which the mineral productions were lying, and proceeded to examine them, grumbling and peering at each, which he took up and laid aside.

In the meantime, Lovel, forced upon him by this succession of Oldbuck, into a sort of tête-à-tête with Miss Wardour, took an opportunity of addressing her in a low and interrupted tone of voice. "I trust Miss Wardour, you, Mr. Lovel, will impute, to the insufficiency of our own susceptibilities, this intrusion of a person who has reason to think himself so unacceptable a visitor."

"Mr. Lovel," answered Miss Wardour, observing the same tone of anger, which you will not, I am sure you are incapable of abusing the advantages given to you by the services you have rendered us, which, as they affect my father, can never be sufficiently acknowledged. Certainly, at least, and except in a particular case, when I am left alone, without his own peace being affected—coulde see me as a friend—as a sister—no man will be—and, from all I have ever heard of Mr. Lovel, ought to be, more welcome; but—"

Oldbuck's anathema against the proposition but was internally echoed by Lovel—"Forgive me, if I interrupt you, Miss Wardour—you need not fear my intruding upon you in any way, in which I have any means of severely reproving, but do not add to the severity of my reprimand, the rigour of obliging me to disavow them."

"I am much embarrassed, Mr. Lovel," replied the young lady, "by your—I would not willingly use a strong word—your romantic and hopeless pertinacity—it is for yourself I plead, that you would consider the calls which the country has on you, that you will not waste, in an idle and fanciful indulgence of an ill-placed predilection, time, which, well rvedime by active exertion, should lay the foundation of future distinction—let me entreat you that you would form a manly resolution."

"It is enough, Miss Wardour; I see plainly that—"

"Mr. Lovel, you are hurt—and, believe me, I sympathize in the pain which I inflict—but can I, in justice to myself, in fairness to you, do otherwise?—Without my father's consent, I never will entertain the addresses of any one, and how totally impossible is it that he should countenance the partiality with which you honour me, you are yourself fully aware—and, indeed—"

"No, Miss Wardour," answered Lovel, in a tone of passionate entreaty, "do not go farther—is it not enough to crush every hope in our present relative situation?—do not carry your resolutions further—why urge what would be your conduct if Sir Arthur's objections could be overruled?"

"It is indeed vain, Mr. Lovel," said Miss Wardour, "because their removal is impossible; and I only wish, as your friend, and as one who is devoted to you and your own interest, that you would suppress this unfortunate attachment—\\n
In a country which affords no scope for your talents, and to resume the humble line of the profession which you seem to have abandoned."

"Well, Miss Wardour, your wishes shall be obeyed—have patience with me one little month, and if, in the course of that space, I cannot show you such respect, by allowing you to enter mydrawing-room, I will be so good as to take in the last letter of your name personally at the door of your father's house against the preservation of his life and mine—but the sooner Mr. Lovel can teach his mind to submit to the inevitable disappointment of wishes which have been so rashly formed, the more highly he will rise in my esteem—and, in the meanwhile, for his sake as well as mine, he must excuse my putting an internecine upon conversation on a subject so painful.

A servant at this moment announced, that Sir Arthur desired to speak with Mr. Old buck in his dressing-room.

"Let me allow you the way," said Miss Wardour, who apparently dreaded a continuation of her tête-à-tête with Lovel, and she conducted the Antiquary accordingly to her father's apartment.

While the two walked in whispered tones, stretched on the couch.

"Welcome, Mr. Old buck," he said;

"I trust you have come better off than I have done from the melancholy of yesterday evening?"

"My health, I am not so much exposed to it — I kept terra firma—you fairly committed yourself to the cold night-air in the most literal of all senses. But such adventures become a galant knight better than a humble usher—to rise on the wings of the night-wind—to dive into the bowels of the earth.—What news from our subterranean Good Hope? the terra incognita of Glen-Whithershame?" said Sir Arthur.

"Nothing," said the Baronet, turning himself hastily, as if stung by a pang of the gout; "but Doustrewuliv does not despair."

"Does he not?" quoth Old buck. "I do too, under his favour—Why, old Dr. H.—*n told me, when I was in Edinburgh, that we should never find copper enough, judgin from the specimens I showed him, to make a pair of sixteen knee-buckles—and I cannot think of anything so superior a sample on the table below differ much in quality."

"The learned doctor is not infallible, I presume?"

"Yes, but he is one of our first chemists; and this trumpery, this terrestrial Mr. H. is, I have a notion, one of those learned adventurers, described by Kircher, Artem habent sine arte, partem sine parte, quorum factum est mirabile, vita curum sui simulque terrae."

"It is unnecessary to translate," said Miss Wardour; "I comprehend your general meaning—but I hope Mr. Doustrewuliv will turn out a more trustworthy character."

"I doubt it not a little," said the Antiquary, "and we are a foul way out if we cannot discover this infernal sheet that he has prophesied about these two years."

"You have no interest in the matter, Mr. Old buck," said the Baronet.

"Too much, too much, Sir Arthur—and yet, for the sake of my fair foe here, I would consent to lose it all so you had no more on the venture."

There was a painful silence of a few moments, for Sir Arthur was too proud to acknowledge the depth of his golden dreams, though he could no longer disguise that such was likely to be the termination of the adventure. "I understand," he said at length, "that the young gentleman, to whom this prophecy referred, we were so much indited last night, has favoured me with a visit—I am distressed that I am unable to see him, or indeed any one, but an old friend like you, Mr. Old buck."

A declination of the Antiquary's stiff backbone acknowledged the preference.

* Probably Dr. Hutton, the celebrated geologist.

"You made acquaintance with this young gentleman in Edinburgh, I suppose?" Old buck told the circumstances of their becoming known to each other.

"Why, then, my daughter is an older acquaintance of Mr. Love's, you see," said the Baronet.

"Indeed! I was not aware of that," answered Old buck, somewhat surprised.

"I met Mr. Lovel," said Isaabella, slightly colouring, "when I dined this last spring with my aunt, Mrs. Wilmot."

"In Yorkshire?—and what character did he bear then, or how was he engaged?" said Old buck—and what did not you recognise him when I introduced you?"

Isaabella answered the least difficult question, and passed over the other. "He had a commission in the army, and had, I believe, served with reputations; he was much respected, as an amiable and promising young man."

"And pray, such being the case," replied the Antiquary, not disposed to take one reply in answer to two distinct questions, "why did you not speak to the lad at once when you met him at my house?—I thought you had lost the palpity of womankind about you, Miss Wardour."

"There was a reason for it," said Sir Arthur, with dignity; "you know the opinions—prejudices, perhaps, you will call them—of our house concerning the security of our name; and young gentlemen, the illegitimate son of a man of fortune; my daughter did not choose to renew their acquaintance till she should know whether, I approved of her holding any intercourse with this kind of a young man."

"If it had been with his mother instead of himself," answered Old buck, with his usual dry causticity of humour, "I could see an excellent reason for it. As poor lad! a dishonour that cause them he seemed so absent and confused while I explained to him the reason of the bond of bastardy upon the shield you'd put under the seclusion."

"True!" said the Baronet with complacency, "it is the shield of Malcolm the Usurer, as he is called. The tower which he built is termed, after him, Malcolm's Tower, but more frequently Macintosh's Tower, which I conceive to be a corruption for Macbeth. He is denominated, in the Latin pedigree of our family, Miculomus Notus; and his temporary seisin of our property, and most unjust attempt to establish his own as the legitimate line in the estate of Knock- wnock, gave rise to such family feuds and misfortunes, as strongly to found us in that horror and abasity to defile blood and illegitimacy, which has been hallowed down in the genealogy of our race."

"I know the story," said Old buck, "and I was telling it to Lovel this moment, with some of the wits and consequences which are wrought on young beings by such gardening policies. Poor fellow! he must have been much hurt; I took the wavers of his attention for negligence, and was somewhat perplexed at it, and it proves to be only an excess of feeling. I hope, Sir Arthur, you will not think the less of your life, because it has been preserved by such assistance?"

"Nor the less of my assistant either," said the Baronet; "my doors and table shall be equally open to him as if he had descended of the most established linesage."

"Come, it is glad of that—he'll know where he can get a dinner then, if he wants one. But what views can he have in this neighbourhood?—I must catechise him; and if I find he wants it—or, indeed, whether he'll want the thing at all—it will be service. As the Antiquary made this liberal promise, he took his leave of Miss Wardour and her father, to engage to commence operations upon Mr. Lovel. Sir Arthur informed him of a commission, expressed his compliments, and remained in attendance on her father, and then taking him by the arm, he led him out of the castle.

Knocknack still preserved much of the casual attributes of a baronial castle. It had its drawbridge, though now never drawn up, and its dry moat, the residue of which had been planted with rushes; only,..."
of the evergreen tribes. Above these rose the old building, partly from a foundation of red rock scarped down to the sea-beach, and partly from the steep greensward, which had swathed and been mentioned, and many others rose around of large size, as if to confute the prejudice, that timber cannot be raised near to the ocean. Our way lay through the gates of the castle, and then we turned to the right in front, from which, by the side of the auburn Perseverance, two great palms were planted, and the first of the trees, which-derived its food and nourishment from the roots, as the chameleon is said to live on the air, or upon the invisible insects which it contains, endeavored to conjecture which of the numerous windows belonged to the apartment now graced by Miss Wardour's presence. The speculations of the Antiquary were of a more melancholy cast, and were partly indicated by a dissertation of paeans, and by the heaving away from the prospect. Lovel, roused from his reverie, looked at him as if to inquire the meaning of an explanation so ominous. The old man shook his head, said "Eh, my young friend!"—"I doubt you greatly—and it wrings my heart to say it—this ancient family is going fast to the ground!"

"Indeed!" answered Lovel—"You surprise me greatly!"

"We harden ourselves in vain," continued the Antiquary, pursuing his own train of thought and feeling, "we harden ourselves in vain to treat with the indifference they deserve the changes of this trumpery wilderness. We strive ineffectually to be the self-sufficient, invulnerable beings, the teres aquae rudiadus of the poet—the stoical extremity which philosophers and sects and sects and sects of human life, is as imaginary as the state of mystical quietism and perfection aimed at by some crooked heretics."

"And Heaven forbid that it should be otherwise!" said Lovel warmly—"Heaven forbid that any process of philosophy were capable to so great and important a feeling, that nothing should agitate them but what arose instantly and immediately out of our own selfish interests! I would as soon wish my hand to be as callous as my feet, that it might escape an engagement or a fault; I would be ambitious of the stoicism which should render my heart like a piece of the nether mill-stone."

The Antiquary regarded his youthful companion with a look which seemed to sympathize with his shrug of shoulders as he exclaimed, "Well, young man, wait till your bark has been battered by the storm of sixty years of mortal vicissitude—you will learn by that time to reek your sails, that she may obey the helm—or, in the language of this world, you will find distresses enough, endured and to endure, to keep your feelings and sympathies in full exercise, without concerning yourself more in the fate of others than you cannot possibly avoid."

"Well, Mr. Oldbuck, it may be so; but as yet I resemble you more in your practice than in your theory, for I cannot help being interested in the fate of the family we have just left."

"And well you may," replied Oldbuck; "Sir Arthur's embarrassments have of late become so many and so great, that I am sure that you have not heard of them—and then his absent and expensive operations carried on by this High-German landlady, Dousterswivel."

"Doubtless! I have seen that person, when, by some rare chance, I happened to be in the coffee-room at Fairport—a tall, beetle-browsed, awkward-built man, who entered upon scientific subjects, as it appeared to me, with a certain air which, with the arrogance of his knowledge, was very arbitrary in laying down and asserting his opinions, and mixed the terms of science with a strange jargon of mysticism; a simple youth who could have turned a good service on an intercourse with the invisible world."

"O the same—the same—he has enough of practical knowledge to speak scholarly and wisely to those of whose intelligence he stands in awe; and, to say the truth, this man, you may be sure, I looked upon as a sort of oracle, of sympathies and antipathies—of the divining rod—and all the trumpery with which the Rosycrucians cheated a darker age, and which, it appears, are now making their way in the world of our own. My friend Heavysmear knew this fellow abrad, and unentionally (for he, you must know, is, God bless the mark, a sort of believer) let me into a good deal of the mystery of the magick art. I thought for a day, as honest Abon Hassan wished to be, I would scourge me these jugglers out of the commonwealth with rods of scorpions—They debuch the spirit of the ignorant and credulous with mystical trash as effectually as if they had bestowed their brains with gin, and then pick their pockets with the same facility. And now has this strolling blackguard and mountebank put the finishing blow to the ruin of an ancient and honourable family!"

"But how could he impose upon Sir Arthur to any ruinous extent?"

"Why, I don't know—Sir Arthur is a good honourable gentleman—but, as you may see from his loose ideas concerning the Pahkish language, he is by no means very strong in the understanding. His estate is strictly held, and he has always been an embarrased man. This razzapose promised him mountains of wealth, and an English company was found to advance large sums of money,—I fear on Sir Arthur's good name. Sir George—was I was en enough to be one—took small shares in the concern, and Sir Arthur himself made great outlay; we were trained on by specious appearances, and more specious lies, and we John Bunyan, we awoke, and beheld it a dream."

"I am surprised that you, Mr. Oldbuck, should have encouraged Sir Arthur by your example."

"Why," said Oldbuck, dropping his large grizzled eye-brow, "I am something surprised and ashamed at it myself; it was not the lure of gain—nobody cares less for money (to be a prudent man) than I do—but I thought I might risk this small sum. It will be expected (though I am sure I cannot see why) that I should give something to any one who will be kind enough to relieve that distress which is worse to me, than to many who might have been saved."

"Peace, Mdr Intry; and perhaps it may be thought I should do something to get that jackanapes, her brother, on the army. In either case, to trouble my adventure was an ill-advised prank."

"This country adventure was an ill-advised prank."

Here the conversation paused, until renewed in the next chapter.
"He had had the pleasure," Lovel answered, "to see her at Mrs. Wilmot's, in Yorkshire."

"I—I do not know," said Lovel, a good deal embarrassed, "it was the same lady, till we met; and then it was my duty to wait till she should recognise me."

"I am aware of your delicacy; the knight's a punctilious old fool, but I promise you her daughter is a greater—her father's at least."

And now, since you have found a new set of friends here, may I ask if you intend to leave Fairport as soon as you propose?"

"What if you should answer your question by another," replied Lovel, "and ask you what is your opinion of dreams?"

Of dreams, you foolish lad,—why, what should I think of them but as the deceptions of imagination when reason drops the reins?—I know no difference betwixt them and the hallucinations of madness—the unguided horses away with the carriage in both cases, only in the one the coachman is drunk, and in the other he slumbers. What says our Marcus Tullius—Si insanorum ritis fas non est habere, que mala sentiat perturbatione sunt, non intellectu."

"Yes, sir, but Cicero also tells us, that as he who passes the whole day in darts the javelin must sometimes lose its head in the cloud, and in my nightly dreams, some may occur consonant to future events."

Ay—that is to say, you have hit the mark in your own sage opinion. Lord! Lord! how this world is given to folly! Well, I will allow for once the Onece-sceatical science—I will give faith to the exposition of dreams, and say a Daniel hath arisen to interpret them. If you can prove to me that that dream of yours has pointed a prudent line of conduct."

"Tell me then," answered Lovel, "why, when I was hesitating whether to abandon an enterprise, which I have been so long meditating, I should unawares last night dream I saw your ancestor pointing to a motto which encouraged me to perseverance? Why should I have thought of those words which I cannot remember to have heard before, which are in a language unknown to me, and which yet conveyed, when translated, a lesson which I could so plainly apply to my own circumstances?"

I burst into a fit of laughing. "Excuse me, my young friend, but it is thus we silly mortals deceive ourselves, and look out of doors for meanings which originate in our own wilful will, or think I am capable of giving you a solution of this dream. You were so abstracted in your contemplations yesterday after dinner, as to pay little attention to the discourse between Sir Arthur and me until I fell upon the controversy concerning the Pikes which terminated so abruptly; but I remember producing to Sir Arthur a book printed by my ancestor, and making him observe the motto; your mind was bent elsewhere, but your ear had mechanically received and retained the sounds, and your busy fancy, stirred by Grizel's legend, I presume, had introduced this scrap of German into your dream. As for the waking wisdom which seized on so frivolous a circumstance as an apology for persevering in some course which it could find no better reason to justify, it is exactly one of those niggling tricks which the sagacity of us play off on now and then, to gratify our inclination at the expense of our understanding."

"I own it," said Lovel, blushingly deep; "I believe you must have loved Sir Arthur. It is the first time I felt a pang of shame at sinking your esteem for attaching a moment's consequence to such a frivolity; but I was tossed by contradictory wishes and resolutions, and you know how slight a line the billow of the billow, though a rable would hardly move her when pulled up on the bench."

Right, right," exclaimed the Antiquary, "fall in my opinion—not a whit,—I love thee the better, man—why, we have story for story against each other, and I can think with less shame on having exposed myself about that cursed Praetorium—though I am still convinced Agricola's camp must have been somewhere in this neighbourhood. And now, Lovel, my good lad, what say you of a visit to Wittenberg?—Why have you left your own country and professional pursuits, for an idle residence in such a place as Fairport? A truant disposition, I fear."

"Even so," replied Lovel, patiently submitting to an interrogatory which he could not well evade—yet I am so detached from the world, that have so few in whom I can really pretend any friendship. To be honest with you, in me, that my very state of destitution gives me independence. He, whose good or evil fortune affects himself alone, has the best right to pursue it according to his money."

"Pardon me, young man," said Oldbuck, laying his hand kindly on his shoulder, and making a full half bow—"a little patience if you please. I will suppose that you have no friends to share or rejoice in your success in life, that you cannot look back to those to whom you owe gratitude, or forward to those to whom you ought to afford protection—but it is no less incumbent on you to move steadily in the path of duty—for your active exertions are due not only to society, but in humble gratitude to the Being through the path of life, without jostling others or permitting myself to be jostled. I owe no man any thing—I have the means of maintaining myself with complete independence, and so moderate are my wishes in this respect, that even these means, however limited, rather exceed than fall short of them."

"Nay, then," said Oldbuck, mending his hand and turning it towards the road, "if you are so true a philosopher as to think you have money enough there's no more to be said—I cannot pretend to be entitled to advise you—you have attained the goal of the human race—the summit of society in your way. But if you wish to be the selected abode of so much self-sufficing philosophy? It is as if a worshipper of the true religion had set up his staff by choice among the multiform idolaters of the land of Egypt. There's not a man in Fairport who is not a devoted worshipper of the Golden Calf—the Mammon of unrighteous-ness—why, even I, am so infected by the profound philosophy that I feel inclined occasionally to become an idolater myself."

"My principal amusements being literary," answered Lovel, "and circumstance having given me no other amusement than the perusal of books, I have pitched on Fairport as a place where I might follow my pursuit without the inconvenience of the temptations to a more elegant circle might have presented to me."

"Ah a!" replied Oldbuck, knowingly,—"I begin to understand your application of my ancestor's motto—you are a candidate for public favour, though, as I see in the way I first suspected—you are ambitious to shine as a literary character, and you hope to meet favour by labour and perseverance."

Lovel, who was rather closely pressed by the unquietness of the old gentleman, concluded it would be best to let him remain in the error which he had gratuitously adopted."

"I have been sometimes foolish enough," he replied, "to nourish some thoughts of the kind."

"Ah, poor fellow! nothing can be more melancholy; unless, as young men sometimes do, you had fallen into the rapture of a dreamer, and these trumpet spectral women of womankind, which is, indeed, as Shakespeare truly says, pressing to death, whipping and hangng all at once."

He then proceeded with inquiries, which he was sometimes kind enough to answer himself. For the good old gentleman had, from his antiquarian researches, acquired a delight in building theories. Premises he had been often far too ter of fact or judgment, even by those who were principally interested in the subjects on which he speculated. He went on, therefore, chalking out Lovel's literary career for him.

"Why, then, do you propose—to commemorate your debut as a man of letters?—but I guess—poetry—poetry—the soft seducer of youth. Yes! there is an acknowledg- ing modesty of confusion in your eye and manner. Are you in- clined to soar to the higher regions of Parnassus, or to flutter about the base of the hill?"

"I have hitherto attempted only a few lyrical pictures—"

"Just as I supposed—pruning your wing, and hopping from spray to spray. But I trust you intend a broader flight—Observe, I would by no means recommend your persevering in this unpromising pursuit—but you may say you are quite independent of the public caprice!"

"Entirely so," replied Lovel.

"And that you are determined not to adopt a more active course of life?"

"For the present, such is my resolution," replied the youth.

"Why, then, it only remains for me to give you my best advice and assistance in the object of your pursuit. I have myself published two essays in the Antiquary;—two essays written without an author's experience. There was my Remarks on Hearne's edition of Robert of Gloucester, signed Scrutator;—and the other signed Indagator, upon a passage in The Hymn of Pan. But, as our acquaintance is in the first instance, at this time, and that is my paper in the Gentleman's Magazine, upon the inscription of Cellia Lelia, which I subscribed Eclipso—So you see I am not an apostle in the mysteries of author-craft, and must necessarily understand the taste and temper of the times. And now once more, what do you intend to commence with?"

"I am not in the thoughts of publishing."

"Ah! that will never do; you must have the fear of the public before your eyes in all your undertakings. Let us see now—a collection of fugitive pieces—but no—your fugitive poetry is apt to become statio- nary with the bookseller. It should be something at once solid and attractive—none of your romances or saucy novels—I would have you take high ground at once. Let me see:—What think you of a real epic?—the grand old-fashioned historical poem which moved through twelve or twenty-four books—would you have it so?—I will supply you with a subject—The battle of Prod and the Black Heath—The Caledonian; or, Invasion Repelled—Let that be the title. It will suit the present taste, and you may throw in a little of the times."

"But the invasion of Agricola was not repelled."

"No; but you are a poet—free of the corporation, and as little bound down to truth or probability as you may be. You may defeat the Romans in spite of Tacitus."

"And pitch Agricola's camp at the Kaims of—what do you call it," answered Lovel, "in defence of Edinburgh Castle."

"No more of that, an thou lovst me—And yet, I dare say, ye may unwarily speak most correct truth in both instances, in despite of the laws of the historical interest of the mendacity."

"Gallantly consoled.—Well, I will do my best—your kindness will assist me with local information."

"Will not I, man?—why will I write the critical and poetical notes on each canto, and draw out the plan of the story myself. I pretend to some poetical genius, Mr. Lovel, only I was never able to write tragedy."

"It is a pity, sir, that you should have failed in a qualification somewhat essential to the art."

"Essential?—not a whit—it is the mere mechanical department—A man may be a poet without measur- ing his arguments, and notes on each canto, and drawing out the plan of the story himself."

"In that case there should be two authors to each poem; one to think and plan, another to execute."

"Why, it would not be amiss; at any rate, we'll make the experiment—not that I would wish to give my name to the public—nay, there might be some one learned friend might be acknowledged in the preface after what flourish your nature will—I am a total stranger to antiquarian."

Lovel was not entertained by a declaration not very consistent with the eagerness whereby his friend seemed to catch at an opportunity of coming before the public, though in a manner which rather resembled his own, he being behind a certain point of learning into one. The Antiquary was, indeed, uncommonly delighted; for, like many other men who spend their lives in obscure literary research, he had a secret ambition to appear in print, which was checked by cold fits of diffidence, fear of criticism, and habits of in- dolence and procrastination. But, thought he, I may, like a second Trucer, discharry my shafts from behind the shield of my ally; and admit that he should not prove to be a first-rate poet, I am in no shape answerable for his deficiencies, and the good notes may very probably help off an indifferent text.

—but he is—he must be a good poet—he has the real Parnassian abstraction—seldom answers a question till it is twice repeated—drinks his tea scalding, and with his feet in his pockets, putting his hand into his mouth. This is the real Caxton, the queen of the Welsh bards, the divina ophitata that transports the poet beyond the limits of sublinary things. His visions, too, are with me; I remember him saying that he recollect to send Caxton to see what the he puts out his candle to-night—poets and visionaries are apt to be negli- gent in that respect. Then, turning to his com- panions, he expressed himself kind in continuance, by saying, "Yes, my dear Lovel, you shall have full notes; and, indeed, I think we may introduce the whole of the Essay on Castrametation into the appendix—It will give grace to the work, and revive the good old forms so disgracefully neglected in modern times. You shall invoke the Muse—and certainly she ought to be propitious to an author, who, in an apostatizing age, adores with the faith of Abel, the ancient form of adoration. Then we must have a vision—in which the genius of Ca- ledonia shall appear to Galgacus, and shew him a procession of the real Scythian monarchs—and in the notes I will have a hit at Boehms—no; I must not touch that topic, now that Sir Arthur is likely to have vexation enough besides. I'll annihilate Osian, MacAcherson, and MacCrae."

"But we must consider the expense of publication," said Lovel, willing to try whether that hint would fall like cold water on the blazing zeal of his self-elected editor."

"Expense!" said Mr. Oldbuck, pausing, and mecha- nically fumbling in his pocket—"that is true—I would wish to do something—but you would not like to publish by subscription?"

"By no means," answered Lovel.

"No, no! I gladly acquiesce the Antiquary. I'll pay the bills. I know a bookseller who has a value for my opinion, and will risk print and paper, and I will get as many copies sold for you as I can."}

"O, is it not the constant or the mendacious author," answered Lovel, smiling; "I only wish to be out of risk of loss."

"Hush! hush! we'll take care of that—throw it all on the publishers. I do long to see your labour rewarded."

This confused speech brought them to Monkshams, where the Antiquary had to undertake a editorial from his sister, who, though no philosopher, was waiting to deliver a lecture to him in the portico. Guide by Lieutenant Monksham's maps, or clashing the ends of lines into rhyme like the moderns, one may be an architect though unable to labour like a stone-mason—Don't think Palladio or Vitruvius ever cared for a hill.

In that case there should be two authors to each poem: one to think and plan, another to execute.
A fair bargain! when ye gied the limmer a full half o' what she seek't—An' ye will be a wife-carie, and lay fish at your ain hands, ye said never bid much more than a quarter. And the impudent queen had the assurance to come up and seek a dram — But I throw, Jenny and I sorted her her.

Truly, Mr. Oldback, (with a sly look to his companion,) "I think our estate was gracious that kept us out of hearing of that controversy.—Well, well, Grizel, I was wrong for once in my life—ultra cautious! I fear, however, that hand expense—killed a cow—we'll eat the fish, cost what it will.—And then, Lovel, you must know I pressed you to stay here to-day, the rather because our cheer will be better and our table more healthful this evening, having just a gaudé—" I love the reveries of a feast better than the feast itself. I delight in the analeps, the collectanea, as I may call them, of the preceding day's dinner, which appear on such occasions. And see, there is Jenny going to ring the dinner-bell."

CHAPTER XV.

"Be this letter delivered with haste—haste—post-haste! Ride, villain, ride,—for thy life— for thy life!"—

LEAVING Mr. Oldback and his friend to enjoy their hard bargain of fish, we beg leave to transport the reader to the back-parlour of the post-master's house at Fairopt, where his wife, he himself being absent, was employed in writing letters, and looking over the letters which had come by the Edinburgh post. This is very often in country towns the period of the day when gossip flits particularly agreeable to call on the man or woman at home, in order, from the outside of the epistles, or, if they are not belted, occasionally from the inside also, to amuse themselves with gleanings of information, or forming conjectures about the correspondence and affairs of their neighbours. Two females of this description were, at the time we mention, assisting, or impeding, Mrs. Mailsetter in her official duty. "En, preserve us, sir," said the butcher's wife, "there's ten, eleven—twall letters to Tennant & Co.—thee folk do mair business than a' the rest o' the burgh." "Ay, but see, lass," answered the baker's lady, "there's twa o' them laudened unco square, and sealed at the tae side—I doubt there will be protest bills in that." "Is there any letters come yet for Jenny Caxion?" inquired the woman of joints and giblets—the lieutenant's been awa three weeks." "W reconcly Tuesday was a week," answered the dame of letters. "Was't a ship-letter?" asked the Fornarina. "In troth it was." "May I have, so far the lieutenant then," replied the mistress of the rolls, somewhat disappointed—"I never thought he wad have lookit ower his shouter after her." "Odd, here's another," quoth Mr. Mailsetter. "A ship-letter—post-mark, Sunderland." All rushed to seize it.—"Na, na, leddies," said Mrs. Mailsetter, interfering, "I hae had enough o' that war—Ken ye that? Mr. Mailsetter got an unco rebuke from the secretary at Edinburgh, for a complaint that was made about the letter of Ally Bisset's that ye open'd, Mrs. Shortcake?" "Me opened!" answered the spouse of the chief baker of Fairport; "ye ken yourself, madam, it just came oan' free will in my hand.—What could I help it?—folk said seal wi' better wax." "Wew! I wot that true too," said Mrs. Mailsetter, who kept a shop of small wares, "And we have got some that I can honestly recommend, if ye ken any body wanting it. But the short and the lang o' it is, the state o' the things gin there's any uneasy complaints o' the kind."

"Hout, lass! the provost will take care o' that;" said lair, "na; I'll neither trust to provost nor bailie," said the woman of joints and giblets, and I'm no again your looking at the outside of a letter neither—See, the seal has an anchor on't—he's done't wi' ane o' his buttons, I'm thinking.

"Show me! show me!" quoth the wives of the chief butcher and chief baker; and threw themselves in the supposed love-letter, like the weird sisters in Macbeth upon the pilot's thumb, with curiosity as eager and scarcely less malignant. Mrs. Mailsetter was a tall woman, she held the precious couple between her eyes and the window. Mrs. Shortcake, a little squint personage, strained and stood on tip-toe to have a better view of the investigation. "Ay, it's frae him, sure enough," said the butcher's lady, "—I can read Richard Tuffiril on the corner, and it's written, like John Thomson's wallet, free end to end;"

"Haud it lower down, madam," exclaimed Mr. Shortcake, in a tone above the prudential whisper which their occupation required—"'t haud it lower down—Dy ye think naebody can read hand o' writ but yoursell?"

"Wishaht, wishah, sirs, for God's sake!" said Mrs. Mailsetter, "there's somebody in the shop,—that's loud—Look to the customers, Baby!" Babie answered from without in a shrill tone—"It's nobody but Jenny Caxon, ma'am, to see if there's any letter to her."

"Tell her," said the faithful postmistress, winking to her companion, "to come back the morn at six o'clock, and I'll let her ken—we ha' na ha' time to sort the mail letters yet—she's eke in a hurly, at the present moment; and the consequence is the best merchants o' the town.

Poor Jenny, a girl of uncommon beauty and poise, could only draw her cloak about her to hide the sigh of disappointment, and return meekly home to endure for another night the quickness of the hush, occasioned by hope delayed.

"There's something about a needle and a pole," said Mrs. Skipper. "Mrs. Skipper," she added, 'for I've got a strange suspicion that at length yielded a peep at the subject of their curiosity.

"Now, that's downright shamefu'," said Mr. Hekbline, "to acom the poor silly gait of a lass after he's kept company wi' her once, and baed his will o' her, as I make nae doubt he has.

"It's but ower muckle to be doubted," echoed Mrs. Shortcake,—"to cast up to her that her father's a banker, and has a pole at his door, and that she's but a manly-maider herself! Hout! fy for shame;"

"Hout, leddies," cried Mrs. Mailsetter, "ye's cleane wrong, ma'nds, it's a line out of a song that I have heard him sing, about being tied like the needle to the pole."

"Well, if that may be sae," said the charitable Dame Hekbline,—"but it dinae look well for a lassie like her to keep up a correspondence wi' one o' the king's officers."

"I'm nae certain that," said Mrs. Mailsetter, "but it's a great advantage to the revenue of the post-office these love letters—See, here's five or six letter to Sir Arthur Wardour—mayst o' them sealed with wafers, and no wa' x-wa' there will be a downous there, believe me."

"Ay! they will be business letters, and no free o' any of his grand friends, that scale wi' their coat o' arms, as they ca' them," said Mrs. Hekbline. "Aworld, my fule will have a fa'—he hamsa settled his account wi' ye, ye gudeman, the deeman, for this twalmonth—he's let dink, I doubt."

"Nor wa' x-wa' for six month," echoed Mrs. Shortcake,—"he's but a brunt craitur;"

"There's a letter," interrupted the trusty post-miss, "from his son, the captain, I think—the seal has a few things wi' the province, and it'll bear a proper postage. He'll be coming home to see what he can sae out o' the fire."

The Baronet, thus divested, they took up the required—patriot's letters for Monksteed, that had been some o' his learned friends now—See how close as they're written, down to the very seal, and a note ending a double-letter—that's just like Monksteeds himself. Well, I'm no going to be of familiarity and neighbourhood, and I'm no again your looking at the outside of a letter neither—See, the seal has an anchor on't—he's done't wi' ane o' his buttons, I'm thinking.
wot I wad be broken if I were to gie sic weight to the folk that come to buy our pepper and brimstone, and such like sweetmeats.

"He's a shabby body the laird o' Monkbarns," said Mrs. Heukbene. "He'll make as much muckle about buying a forequarter o' lamb in August as about a back sawy o' beef. Let's taste another dram o' the sinning—(perhaps she meant cinnamon)—washes, Mrs. MAILLESTER, his great ne'er. His Great NE'ER as I did—mony a time he wed waip in to me wi' a brace o' wild deuces in his pock, when my first gudeman was awa at the Falkirk tryit—wel, wel,—wel, wi' his gudeman.

"I winna say any ill o' this Monkbarns," said Mrs. Shortcake; "his brother ne'er brought me any wild deuces, and this is a douce honest man—we serve the family wi' bread, and he settles wi' his luck like we're only he was in an uncye kippage when we sent him a book o' the nick-stick, *whilk, he said, were the true ancient way o' counting between tradesmen and customers; and sae they are, nae doubt."

"But look here, lasses," interrupted Mrs. Maillester, "here's a sight for sair e'en! What wad ye gie to ken what's in the wuggle o' this letter?—this is new country I am to you. I hae wid Mr. Lovel, at Lovel, Esq., at Mrs. Hadlowsay's, High-street, Fairport, by Edinburgh, N. B. This is just the second letter he has had since he was here."

"It's o' Lord's sake, let's see!—that's the hale town kens mething about—and a weel-far'd lad is—he's let's see, let's see! Thus each and every weighty representatives who are awa—bide alee, I tell you—this is nane o' your four-penny cuts that we might make up the value to the postman. You're in your own respects. It's your chance before the post-office—when one's got to obey—but I'll need no your callant, mony thanks to ye—I'll send little Davie on your powny, and that will be just five-and-three-quarters to like a' our, ye see.

"Davie! the Lord help ye, the bairn's no ten year auld—and, to be plain wi' ye, our powny resta a bit, and it's dounest to the road, and naebody can manage him but our Jock."

"I'm sorry for that," answered the postmistress gravely, "it's we maun wait then till the gudeman comes hame, after a'—for I wadna like to be responsible in trusting the letter to sic a callant as Jock—our Davie belongs in a manner to the office."

"Aweel, awel, Mrs. Maillester, I see what ye wad be at—but an ye like to risk the bairn, I'll risk the heart."

Orders were accordingly given. The unwilling pony was brought out of his box of straw, and again equipped for service (a leather strap across his shoulders) was perched upon the saddle, with a tear in his eye, and a switch in his hand. Jock good-naturedly led the animal out of the town, and, by the crack o' the whip, made for the gate o' Fairport, while Davie, naebody kens what to make o' him."

"Weel, weel, leddies," said the postmistress, "we're sit down and crack about it—Baby, bring ben the tea-water—muckle obliged to ye for your cookies, Mrs. Shortcake—and we'll steek the shop, and cry ben Baby, and take a hand at the carties till the gudeman comes hame—and then we'll try your braw sweet-bread that ye were so kind as send me, Mrs. Heukbene."

"But winna ye first send awa Mr. Lovel's letter?" said Mrs. Heukbene.

"I wadna send awa till the gudeman comes hame, for auld Caxton tell'd me that Mr. Lovel stays a' the day at Monkbarns—he's in a high furor wi' the laird and Sir Arthur out o' the see."

"Silly auld doited caries," said Mrs. Shortcake; "what gar'd them gae to the dook in a night like yeestern?

A sort of tally generally used by bakers of the olden time in Scotland was, we are told, the stick, and for each loaf as delivered a notch was made on the stick. It is not improbable that the same kind of check, may have occasioned the Antiquary's partiality. In Prior's time the English bakers had the same sort of reckoning.

Have you not seen a baker's rod between two equal panners away? Her tally wears as lie and idle, placed exactly in the middle.
without stopping, except just to inquire the way to Macombars, and allow of extraordinary mission to a very peaceful and retired individual, was variously explained. Some said Lovel was an emigrant noble, summoned to head an insurrection that had broken forth, or was a real dragoon as could well be imagined, was carried onwards towards Macombars by the pony, so long as the animal had in his recollection the crack of his usual instrument of chastisement, and the shouts of the butcher's boy. But feeling how Davie, whose short legs were unequal to maintain his balance, swung to and fro upon his back, the pony began to dissemble further compliance with the intimations it had received. For then, he slackened his pace to a walk. This was no point of quarrel between him and his rider, who had been considerably decomposed by the rapidity of his former motion, and who now took the appearance of his child's pet to go as gingerbread, which had been thrust into his hand by his mother, in order to reconcile this youthful maimer of the post-office to the discharge of his duty. By and by, he was too stout to be carried on the back, and Davie's discipline to twitch the rein out of Davie's hands, and apply himself to browse on the grass by the side of the lane. Sorely astounded by these symptoms of self-willed rebellion, and afraid alike to sit or fall, poor Davie lifted up his voice and went aloud. The pony, hearing this pudder over his head, began apparently to think it would be best both for himself and Davie to proceed to Fairport. Accordingly, he commenced a retrograde movement towards Fairport. But, as all retreats are apt to end in utter rout, so the steed, alarmed by the boy's cries, and by the weight which was evidently thrown upon his enormous forefoot—finding also his nose turned homeward, began to set off at a rate which, if Davie kept the saddle, (a matter extremely dubious,) would soon have precipitated him into a state of that mangle, while the mist was raised, and Davie, at a turn of the road, an intervening auxiliary, in the shape of old Edie Ochiltree, caught hold of the rein, and stopped his farther proceeding. "What's aught ye callin'? what for a gate that's to ride?"

"I canna help it!" blubbered the express; "they canna me little Davie.'"

"And where are the gaun?"

"I'm gaun to Macombars wi' a letter."

"Stirra, this is no the road to Macombars."

But Davie could only answer the exposal with a sigh and a tear.

Old Edie was easily moved to compassion where childhood was in the case.—I wanna gaun that gate, he thought, but it's the best o' my way o' life that I canna be weel out o' my road. They'll get me quarter at Macombars ready enough, and I'll e'en hirrie awa there wi' the wean, for it will knock its harns out, pair thing, if there's no somebody to guide the poony. —Sae ye has a letter, hinnay? will you set me o'er?"

"I'm no gaun to let neebly see the letter," sobbed the boy, "till I get to Mr. Lovel, for I am a faithfu' kid, and a neebly." Very right, my little man," said Ochiltree, turning the reluctant pony's head towards Macombars, "but we'll guide him a'ween us, if he's no a' the sweer."
and she makes him tea in a morning, and he settles here among us.

"But does he never stir abroad?"

"He has clean gien up walking, and he sits a day in his room reading or writing; a hantle letters he has put aboard, and others he puts to the post-office our post-house, though Mrs. Hadoway offered to carry them herself, but sent them under seal to the sheriff, and it's Mrs. Mabellet's belief, that the sheriff sent his hantle to be give in in the post-office at Tannington; it's my poor thought, that he isolated their looking into his letters at Fairport; and well he need, for my poor daughter Jenny"—she sat down to your womankind, Caxon.

About this poor young lad—Does he write nothing but letters?"

"Ou, say—hale sheets o' other things, Mrs. Hadoway. Aye, she wishes me; he could be gotten to take a walk; she thinks he's but looking purily, and his appetit's clean gone; but he'll no hear o' ganging over the door-stane—him that used to walk and muckle too.

"That's wrong; I have a guess what he's busy about; but he must not work too hard neither. I'll go and see him this very day—he's deep, doubleous, in the Caledonian.

Having formed this manful resolution, Mr. Oldbeck equipped himself for the expedition with his thick walking-shoes and grained head-cane, muttering an inaudible prayer to the deities of war chosen for the motto of this chapter; for the Antiquary was himself rather surprised at the degree of attachment which he could not but acknowledge he entered into the matter. The thing was now standing easily solved. Lovel had many attractive qualities, but he won our Antiquary's heart by being on so many occasions an excellent listener.

A man to whom he had become somewhat of an adventure with Mr. Oldbeck, and one which he did not often care to undertake. He hated greetings in the market-place; and there were generally loiterers in the post-office who persisted in asking which he thought about the news of the day, or about some petty pieces of business. So on this occasion, he had no sooner entered the streets of Fairport, than it was "Good-morrow, Mr. Oldbeck—a sight o' your's guide for saer en—what d'ye think of the news in the Sun the day?—they say the great attempt will be made in a fortnight."

"I wish to the Lord it were made and over, that I might hear no more about it."

"Monkbars, your honour," said the nursery and webs-man, "I hope the plants gied satisfaction; and I wish you'd send the free Holland, and this in a lower key—an anker or two o' Colognes gin, an o' our brigs cam in yestreen."

"Thank ye, thank ye—no occasion at present, Mr. Youngmen," said the Antiquary, pushing resolutely onward.

"Mr. Oldbeck," said the town-clerk, (a more important person, who came in front and ventured to stop the old gentleman,) "the provost, understanding you were in town, begs on no account that you'll quit it without seeing him; he wants to speak to ye about bringing the water frae the Fairwell spring through the street, as he says an improvement."

"What the deuce have they nobdy's land but mine to cut and carve on?—I won't consent, tell him."

"And the provost," said the clerk, going on, without noticing the rebuff, "and the council, was agreeable that you have the said stanes at Donald's chapel, that ye was wusing to have.

"Ah, that?—Oo, that's another story—Well, well, I'll call upon the provost, and we'll talk about it.

"But ye maun speak your mind on't forthwith, Monkbars, if ye want the stanes; for Deacon Feach McManus, who is the carev, through-stanes might be put with advantage on the front of the new council-house—that is, the two cross-legged figures that the callians use to d'ra Robin and Bobbein, ane on the one hand, and the other that they call the Ailie Dailie, abune the door. It will be very tasteful, the deacon says, and just in the style of modern Gothic."

"Lord deliver me from this Gothic generation," exclaimed the Antiquary, "and from that monument of knight-templar on each side of a Grecian porch, and a Madonna on the top of it! O crimini!—Well, tell the provost I wish to have the stones, and we'll see about the carev. It's lucky I happened to come this way, to-day."

They parted mutually satisfied; but the wily clerk had most reason to exult in the dexterity he had displayed, as he contriv'd an exception in the way between the monuments, (which the council had determined to remove as a nuisance, because they encroached three feet upon the public road,) and the privy, hitherto the only inconvenience in the way through the estate of Monkbars, was an idea which had originated with himself upon the pressure of the moment.

Through these various entanglements, Monkbars (to use the phrase by which he was distinguished in the country) made his way at length to Mrs. Hadoway's. This good woman was the widow of a late clergyman at Fairport, who had been reduced, by her husband's untimely death, to that state of straitened and embarrassed circumstances in which the widows of the Scotch clergy are too often found. The tenement which she occupied, and the furniture of which she was possessed, gave her the means of letting a part of her house, and as Lovel had been a quiet, regular, and profitable lodger, and had qualified the necessity of which the house stood, from which it was a great deal of gentleness and courtesy, Mrs. Hadoway, not, perhaps, much used to such kindly treatment, had become greatly attached to her lodger; and for a time was revolted by the idea of the circumstances which permitted her to render him. To cook a dish somewhat better than ordinary for "the poor young gentleman's dinner," to exult his interest with those who remembered her husband, and to guard her own sake and his, in order to procure scarce vegetables, or something which her simplicity supposed might tempt her lodger's appetite, was a labour which she courageously and anxious concealed it from the person who was its object. She did not adopt this secrecy of benevolence to avoid the laugh of those who might suppose that an oval face and dark eyes, with a clear brown complexion, though belonging to a woman of five and forty, and enclosed within a widow's close-drawn pinners, might possibly still aim at making conquests; for, to say truth, such a ridiculous suspicion having never entered into her own head, she could not anticipate its having birth in that of any person else. She thought instead of the hope of delicacy to her guest, whose power of repaying them she doubted as much as she believed in his inclination to do so, and in his being likely to feel extreme pleasure in doing any kindness he had acquired. She now opened the door to Mr. Oldbeck, and her surprise at seeing him brought tears into her eyes, which she could hardly restrain.

"I am glad to see you, sir—"I am very glad to see you. My poor gentleman is, I am afraid, very unwell; and, O, Mr. Oldbeck, he'll see neither doctor, nor minister, nor writer! And think what it would be, if, as my poor Mr. Hadoway used to say, a man was made to die without advice of the three learned faculties!"

"Greatly better than with them," grumbled the cynical Antiquary. "I tell you, Mrs. Hadoway, the clergy live by our sufferings, the medical faculty by our diseases, and the law gentry by our misfortunes."

"O fie, Monkbars, to hear the like o' that free you!—But ye'll walk up and see the poor young lad!"

"Heigh, aye!—that lad! He's a muckle different man by day he has eat less and less, and now he hardly touches ony thing, only just pits a bit on the plate to make fashion, and his poor check has turned every day thinner she equipped, and the furniture which was said as me, that might be his mother—no that I might be just that neither, but something very near it."

"Why does he not take some exercise?" said Oldbeck.

"I think we have persuaded him to do that, for he has bought a horse from Gibbie Goliathy, the gallow gaiting groom. A gude judge o' horse-faen Ghobha.

Vol. X. N 27
could our lass that he was—for he offered him a beast he thought was answer him well enough, as he was, but Mr. Lovel, if he had known you, and bought any might err the Master o' Morpke—they keep it at the Greene's Arms, over the street—and he ruled yesterday morning and this morning before breakfast—but winna ye walk up to his room?"

"Presently, presently—"has he no visitors?"

"Oh dear, Mr. Oldbuck, not one; if he wadna recover, he might well and surely, what chance is there of any body in Fairport looking upon him now?"

"Ay, ay, very true—I should have been surprised had I not—Come, show me up stairs, Mrs. Hadoway, lest I make a blunder, and go where I should not."

The good landlady showed Mr. Oldbuck up her narrow staircase, warning him of every turn, and lamenting all the while that he was laid under the necessity of mounting up so high. At length, she gently tapped at the door of her guest's parlour. "Come in," said Lovel; and Mrs. Hadoway ushered in the Laird of Monkbarra.

The little apartment was neat and clean, and decently furnished—ornamented too by such relics of both sea and shore, and every sign, that Mrs. Hadoway had retained; but it was close, overheated, and, as it appeared to Oldbuck, an unwholesome situation for a young person in delicate health, an observation which quite regretted, though it had already occurred to him in Lovel's behalf. With a writing-table before him, on which lay a quantity of books and papers, Lovel was seated on a couch, in his dressing gown, and slippers. Oldbuck was shocked at the change which had taken place in his personal appearance. His cheek and brow had assumed a ghastly white, except where a round bright spot of hectic red formed a strong and painful contrast, totally different from the general cast of pale and haggard complexion which had formerly overspread and somewhat embrowned his features. Oldbuck observed, that the dress he wore belonged to a deep mourning suit, and a coat of the same colour lying on a chair near to him. As the Antiquary entered, Lovel arose and came forward to welcome him.

"This is very kind," he said, shaking him by the hand, and thanking him warmly for his visit; "this in the best kind, and has anticipated a visit of mine. I intended to trouble you—you must know I have become a horsemorlady."

"I understand as much from Mrs. Hadoway—I only hope to receive you in more fortunate a quiet house—I myself inadvertently bought one from the said Gibbie Golightly, which brute ran two miles on end with me after a pack of hounds, with which I had no more to do than the last year's snow, and after affording infinite amusement, I suppose, to the whole hunting field, he was so good as to deposit me in a dry ditch—I hope yours is a more peaceful beast?"

"I hope at least we shall make our excursions on a better plan of mutual understanding."

"That is to say, you think yourself a good horseman?"

"I would not willingly," answered Lovel, "confess myself a very bad one."

"No; all you young fellows think that would be easy to manage with more but lazier at once. But, have you had experience of, crade experto, a horse in a passion is no joker."

"Why, I should be sorry to boast myself as a great horseman; but when I acted as aid-de-camp to Sir — in the cavalry-action at — last year, I saw many better cavaliers than myself dismounted."

"Have you looked in the face of the grisly God of arms then—you are acquainted with the frowns of Mars armatومة? That experience fills up the measure of your qualifications for the campaign! The Britons, I dare say, will remember and be glad in their hearts, that in changing the sign—cognitari is the phrase of Tacitus—you recollect the fine description of their dashing among the Roman infantry—although the historian tells us how ill the rugged face of the ground was calculated for them, and that the rest behind the hill, of which sort of chariots could be driven in Scotland anywhere but on turnpike roads, has been to me always matter of amazement. And well now—has the Miss visto you?"

"Oh, yes; but if you are to be the only friend I could ever boast of possessing—"

"Indeed? well, young man," replied his visitor, in a tone of seriousness very different from his affected gravity, "there is nothing like a death while your mutual regard was warm and unchilled, while the tear can drop unembittered by any painful recollection of coldness or distrust or treachery, is perhaps an escape from more heavy dispensation. Look round you—how few do you see grow old in the affections of those with whom their early friendships were formed! our sources of common pleasure gradually dry up as we journey on through the vale of Bancha, and we hew out to ourselves other reservoirs, from which the first companions of our pilgrimage are excluded—jealousies of preferment, intrigues of rivalry, are like the sun's heat to a plant which has lived apart, until none remain but those who are connected with us, rather by habit than predilection, or who, allied more in blood than in disposition, only keep the old man real to each other in his life, that they may not be forgotten at his death—"

Hoc data pena du sic venturus—

Ahh! Mr. Lovel, if it be your lot to reach the chill, cloudy, and comfortless evening of life, you will remember the sorrows of your youth as the light shadowy clouds that intercepted for a moment the beams of the sun were not more—But I throw these words into your ears against the stomach of your sense."

"I am sensible of your kindness," answered the youth, "but the wound that is of recent infection must always smart severely, and I should be little comforted under my present calamity—forgive me for saying so—but by the conviction that life had nothing in reserve for me but a train of successive sorrows. And permit me to add, you, Mr. Oldbuck, have least recourse of many men to take so gloomy a view of life— you have been competent and easy fortunes—are generally respected—yes, in your own way, I mean music, indulge yourself in the researches to which your taste addicts you—you may form your own society without doors. It is true that your affectionate and sedulous attention of the nearest relatives."

"Why, yes; the woman-kind—for woman-kind are, thanks to my training, very civil and respectable—do not disturb me in my morning studies—creep across the floor with the stealthy pace of a cat, when it suits me to take a nap in my easy-chair after dinner or tea. All this is very well—but I want something to exchange ideas with—something to talk to."

"Then why do you invite your nephew, Captain M'try, who is mentioned by every one as a fine spiritual young fellow, to become a member of your family?"

"Who? exclaimed Monkbarra, "my nephew Hector?—the Hotspur of the North!—Why, Heaven love you!—you are in the situation in a fine fellow; for my grandson—he's an Almanzor, a Chantom—has a Highland pedigree as long as his chamois, and a chamois as long as the High-street of Fairport, which he rode upon the afternoon he was at Fairport—I expect him here one of these days, but I will keep him at staff's end, I promise you—He is an inmate of my house; I make my very chains as I go along, and some trouble at his return, none of Hector M'try. But hark ye, Lovel, you are a quiet, gentle-tempered lad; had not you better set up your staff at Monkbarra for a month or two, since I shall not return that in change? But—by the way, shall I leave this country? I will have a door opened out to the garden—it will cost but a trifle—there is the space—"
THE ANTIQUARY.

The morning of Friday was as serene and beautiful as if no pleasure party had been held at the Rectory that was a rare event, whether in novel-writing or real life. Love, who felt the genial influence of the weather, and rejoiced at the prospect of once more meeting with Miss Wardour, trotted forward to the place of rendezvous with better spirits than he had for some time enjoyed. His prospects seemed in many respects to open and brighten before him, and hope, although breaking like the morning sun through clouds and showers, appeared now about to illuminate the path before him. He was, as might have been expected from this state of spirits, first at the place of meeting, and, as might also have been anticipated, his looks were so intently directed towards the road from Knockwinnoch Castle, that he was only apprised of the arrival of the Monkbars division by the pre-humming of his steed, and the post-chaise lumbered up behind him. In this vehicle were sent up, first, the stately figure of Mr. Oldbuck himself; secondly, the scarcely less portly person of the Reverend Mr. Flett; thirdly Miss Brecon, the parish in which Monkbars and Knockwinnoch were both situated. The reverend gentleman was equipped in a box wig, upon the top of which was an equilateral cocked hat. This was the paragon of the three yet remaining wigs of the parish, which differed, as Monkbars used to remark, like the three degrees of comparison—Sir Arthur's ramifies being the positive, his own bob-wig the comparative, and the overwhelming grizzle of the worthy clergyman figuring as the superlative. The superintendent of these antique garnitures, deeming, or affecting to deem, that he could not well be absent on an occasion which assembled all three together, had stationed himself on the board behind the carriage, ‘just to be on the way in case they were gentlemen sat down to dinner.’ Between the two massive figures of Monkbars and the clergyman was stuck, by way of boodkin, the slim form of Mary M’Intyre, the aye and the nay, and the man and woman, and a social chat with Miss Beckie Blattergowl, to investigating the ruins of the priory of Saint Ruth.

As greetings passed between the members of the Monkbars party and Mr. Lovel, the Baronet's carriage, an open barouche, swept onward to the place of appointment, making, with its smoking bays, a smart drive, arms, blazoned panels, and a brace of out-riders, a strong contrast with the battered vehicles and broken-winded hack which had brought thither the Antiquary and his followers. The principal seat of the carriage was occupied by Sir Arthur and his daughter. At the first glance which passed betwixt Miss Wardour and Lovel, her colour rose considerably, but she had apparently made up her mind to receive him with kindness, and only as such, and there was equal composure and courtesy in the mode of her reply to his fluctuating salutation. Sir Arthur hailed the barouche to shake his presence kindly by the hand, and intimate the pleasure he had on this opportunity of returning him his personal thanks; then mentioned to him, in a tone of sligh: introduction, "Mr. Doust" and Mr. Lovel.

Lovel took the necessary notice of the German, adept, who occupied the front seat of the carriage, which is usually conferred upon dependants or inferiors. The ready grin and the Ingenious manner with which his salutation, though slight, was answered by the foreigner, increased the internal dislike which Lovel had already conceived towards him; and... was plain, from the tour of the Antiquary's shaggy eye-brow, that he too looked with displeasure on this addition to the company. Little more than distant glances passed among the members of the party until, having rolled on for about three miles beyond the place at which they met, the carriages at length stopped at the sign of the Four Horse-shoes, a small house in the hamlet of Caxon. Here the door was opened, and let down the step of the hack-chaise, while the inmates of the barouche were, by their more courtesy, assisted to leave their equipage.

Here was passing mention of young ladies shook hands; and Oldbuck, completely in his element, placed himself as guide and Cicerone at the head of the party, who were now altogether on foot towards the object of their curiosity. He took care to detain Lord close beside him as the best listener of the party, and occasionally glanced a word of explanation and instruction to Miss Wardour and Mary McIntyre, who followed next in order. The Baron and the clergyman he rather avoided, as he was aware both of them conceived they understood such matters as well, or better, than he did; and Doughters, swelled, besides that he looked on him as a confidant, was so nearly connected with his apprehended loss in the stock of the mining company, that he could not address him. These and other matters made therefore, attended upon the orb of Sir Arthur, to whom, moreover, as the most important person of the society, they were naturally induced to attach themselves.

It frequently happens that the most beautiful points of Scottish scenery lie hidden in some sequestered dell, and that you may travel through the country in complete ignorance of being aware of your vicinity to what is well worth seeing, unless intention or accident carry you to the very spot. This particularly the case in the country around Fairport, which is generally a low-lying, open, immeasurably and her less, but here and there the progress of rills, or small rivers, has formed dells, glens, or, as they are provincially termed, duns, on whose high and rocky banks trees and shrubs of all kinds find a shelter, and grow with a luxuriant profusion, which is more gratifying, as it forms an unexpected contrast with the general face of the country. This was eminently the case with the approach to the ruins of Stain Ruth, which was for some time merely a sheep-track, along the side of a steep and bare hill. By degrees, however, this path descended, and widened round the hill, for the purpose of giving at first singly, then two, then three, stunted, and blighted, with locks of wool upon their trunks, and their roots hollowed out into recesses, in which the sheep love to repose themselves,—a sight much more familiar to me than to any other writer of picturesque than to that of a planter or forester. By and by the trees formed groups, fringed on the edges, and filling up in the middle, by thorns and hazel bushes; and at length these groups closed so much together, that, although a broad glade opened here and there under their boughs, or a small patch of bog or heath occurred which had refused nourishment to the seed which they sprinkled round, and consequently remained open and waste, the scene might on the whole be termed decidually woodland. The sides of the valley began to approach each other more closely; the rush of a brook was heard below, and, between the intervals afforded by openings in the natural wood, its waters were seen hurrying clear and rapid with some fury.

Oldbuck now took upon himself the full authority of Cicerone, and anxiously directed the company not to go a foot-broad off the track which he pointed out, and which they were to enjoy in full perfection what they came to see. "You desire me in the name of guide, Miss Wardour," exclaimed the veteran, waving his hand and head in cadence as he repeated with emphasis.

"I know each lane, and every alley green, Doughters, on the face of the dell, of this wood,
And every peaky bower from side to side.

Ah, gentle take it—that spray of a Bramble has demolished all Caxon's labours, and nearly canted my wig into the stream—so much for recitations," etc.

"Now mind, my dear sir," said Miss Wardour, "you have your faithful attendant ready to repeat such a disaster when it happens, and when you appear as restored to its original splendour, I will carry on the quotation:

"So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
And charity in like manner repairs its drone,
And trims his beams, and with new spangled ore Flames on the forehead.""

"O enough, enough!" answered Oldbuck; "I ought to have known what it was to give you advantage over me, but her was what now becomes of foot towards the object of their curiosity. He took care to detain Lord close beside him as the best listener of the party, and occasionally glanced a word of explanation and instruction to Miss Wardour and Mary McIntyre, who followed next in order. There was the retreat of learning in the days of meass, Mr. Lovel," said Oldluck, around whom company had now grouped themselves while they enjoyed the unexpected opening of a prospect so scant; "there reposed those wights who were weary as world, and devoted either to that which was above or below, as well as it was all-powerful and all-good who should follow them in this. I will show you the library—see that stretch of wall with re-advanced window—there it existed, stored, as it were, with a thousand volumes. And here I might well take the mantle of the learned Leland, who, sitting in the car, the oratories, rooms, like Rachel weeping for her children, the papal laws, decrees, decreets, clementines, and such drugs of the devil, yes, if Heytesbury's had Porterbury's universal, Aristotle's logic, Duns's divinity, with such other loose legedere, (begging your pardon, Miss Wardour,) and of the bottomless pit, had kept out of our library the accomodation of grocers, candles, soap, others, and other worldy ones, we shall have therewith contented. But, to put ancient chronicles, our noble histories, our learned matronies, and all such posses of contempt and subjection, has greatly added our nation, and showed ourselves disbarred in the eyes of posterity to the utmost stretch of the gills. And, O John Knox," said the baronet, "through us influence, and under whose suspicions, the patriav task was accomplished."

The Antiquary, somewhat in the situation of a decock, caught in his own spigre, turned short and coulded, to excuse a slight blush as he raised his answer—As to the Apostle of Scottish reform, Miss Wardour broke in to interrupt a conversa so dangerous. "Pray, who was the author quoted, Mr. Oldluck?"

"Humph," said Miss Wardour, who lost his hes on witnessing the destruction of the conven libraries in England.

"Now I think," replied the young lady, "his mis take may have saved the rationality of some tern antiques, which would certainly have been wiped if so vast a lake of learning had not been finished by draining."

Unusual, the Barony, there is no danger now—have hardly left us a spoonful in which to per a diet, a lam."

"Saying, Mr. Oldluck led the way down the b path, but secure path, which soon placed on the verdant meadow where the ruins stood. Here they lived," continued the Antiquary, "with right to do and to spend their time in investigating the antiquities of the place, and, I think, as the inscription, composing new works for the information of the, perty."

"And," added the baronet, "in exercising the rite reception with a pomp and ceremonial worthy of office of the priesthood."

And if Sir Arthur's excellence will permit," said German, with a low bow, "the monk might need to vary curious experiment in her labors, both in chemistry and magia naturale."

"I think," said the clergyman, "they would have much to do in collecting the tenants of the parsonage concerned of these good planters."

"And all," added Miss Wardour, nodding to the Antiquary, "without interruption from womankind."

"I am fair for," said Oldluck, "this was a place where I was admitted, and we may order rather by what chance the good fathers be to lose it."

"In fact," he continued, "the criticisms on the occupations of those whom the ruins had been formerly possessed, they adored for some time from one moss-grown shrine another, under the guidance of Oldluck, who ex amples, and examples, indicating the cost, the toils, and expenses, and read and expounded to the company various moulder inscriptions which yet were traced upon the tombs of the dead, or under the vacant niches of the painted images. "What is the reason," at length Miss Wardour asked the Antiquary, "why this tradition has preserved to us such meager accounts of the innates of these stately edifices, raised with such expense of labour and taste, and whose owners were in their times so magnific?"

"The mostest tower of a freebooting baron, or squire, who lived by his lance and broadsword, is consecrated by its appropriate legend, and the shepherd will trace the names and facts of its inhabitants; but ask a countryman concerning these beautiful and extensive remains—these towers, these arches, and buttresses, these windows, remains these three words fill up his answer—"they were made by the monks lang syne."

The question was somewhat puzzling—Sir Arthur looked up ward, as if he was to be inspired with an answer—Oldluck shook his bag with the clergyman was of opinion that his parishioners were too deeply impressed with the true presbyterian doctrine to preserve any records concerning the papistical cumbiners of the land, offshoots as they were of the great overshadowing tree of iniquity, whose roots are in the bowels of the seven hills of abomination—Lovel thought otherwise, and began to consider what are the events which leave the deepest impression on the minds of the common people—"These," he confounded, "were not such as resemble the gradual progress of the world to its end and final destruction."

But the earl, by his patience, a world saved from the headlong and precipititious fury of some portentous flood. The ears, by which the vulgar compute time, have always reference to some period of fear and tribulation, and they date by a tempest, an earthquake, or burst of civil commotion. When such are the facts most alive in the memory of the common people, we cannot wonder," he concluded, "that the feroious warrior is remembered, and the meaner abbots are abandoned to forgetfulness and oblivion."

"If you please, gentlewomen and ladies, and asking pardon of Sir Arthur and Miss Wardour, and this worthy clergyman, and my noble host, Mr. Oldluck, who is my countryman, and of goot young Mr. Lofel also, I think it is all owing to the hand of glory."

"The hand of what?" exclaimed Oldluck.

"The hand of glory, my good master Oldluck, which is a very great and terrible secret—which the monks used to conceal their treasures when they were driven from their cloisters by what you call Reform."

"Ay, indeed! tell us about that," said Oldluck, "for these are secrets worth knowing."

"Why, my young master Oldluck! you will only laugh at me—but the hand of glory is very well known in the countries where your worthy progenitors did live—and it is hand cut off from a dead man, and in acid, and in cold, and in vinegar, as has been the practice, and burnt, not burnt but worn in de shome of juniper wood, and if you put a little of what you call wof your juniper, it will not be any better—that is, it will not be no worse—then you do take something of de fate of de hear, and of de badger, and of de great boar, and of de little suckling child as has not been christened, (for that is very essentials,) and you do make a candle, and put it into de hand of glory at de proper hour and minute, with de proper ceremonious, and he who seeks for treasures shall never find none at all."

"I dare take my corporal oath of that conclusion, said the Antiquary. "And was it the custom, Mr. Donsterschvil, in Wurthalia, to make use of this elegant candle?"

"Always, Mr. Oldluck, when I did not want nobody to talk of nothing you wash doing about. And de monk always did this when they wanted to make anything, to confound, to hide their doings, to surfide, to deceive, and do rings, vid very prattish stones and jewels."

"But, notwithstanding, you knights of the Roxy Crease have made a heap of nonsense of this idea, in the cost and discovering what the poor monks have put themselves to so much trouble to conceal?"

"Ah! goot Mr. Oldluck," replied the youth.

"Swine is believing indeed—but what was your

"Upham" quoted the Antiquary, "I have heard of to Spain or Portugal, and turn it to good account.

"Ah! my goot Master Oldenbuck, dere is de Inquisi- tion, and we must not do tell, or de turn me, who am but a simple philosopher, for one great congrunter."

"They would cast away their coals then," said Oldbuck; "but," continued he, in a whisper to Lovel,
"what sport is it for them to do? for these de delincents that ever wagged a tongue, they would square the punishment more accurately with his deserts. But let us see—I think he is about to show us some of his leg-der-mann.

In truth, the German was now got to a little cope-thecket at some distance from the ruins, where he affected busily to search for such a wand as should suit the purpose of his mystery; and after cutting, and examining, and rejecting several, he at length provided himself with a small twig of hazel terminating in a forked end, which he pronounced to possess the virtues which it was the aim of his experiment to be about to exhibit. Holding the forked ends of the wand each between a finger and thumb, and thus keeping the rod upright, he proceeded to pace the ruined walls and cloistered court, by the rest of the company in admiring procession. "I believe dere was no water here," said the adept, when he had made the round of several of the buildings, without perceiving any of those indications which he pretended to expect—"I believe these Scotch monkish did find de water too cool for de climate, and alwaayz drank de goot conforable Rhine wine—but, aha!—see there. Accordingly, the assistants observed the rod to turn in his fingers, although he pretended to hold it very tight.—
"Dere is water here about sure enough."—and, turning this way and that way, as the agitation of the divining rod seemed to increase or diminish, he at length advanced into the midst of a vacant and roof-less enclosure, which had been the kitchen of the priory, when the rod twisted itself so as to point almost straight downwards. "Here is de place," said the adept, "and if you do not find de water here, you will give all you leave to call me an impudent knave."

"I shall take that license," whispered the Antiquary to Love, "whether the water is discovered or no.

"Dere wan, who had come up with a basket of cool refreshments, was now dispatched to a neighbouring forester's hut for a mattock and pick-axe. The loose stones and rubbish being removed from the spot indicated by the German, they soon came to the side of a regularly basaltic wall, and when a few feet of rubbish were cleared out by the assistance of de forester and his sons, the water began to rise rapidly to the delight of the philosopher, the astonished a-dent, and the ladies in the Eleutherian, and the supprise of Lovel, and the confusion of the incredulous Antiquary. He did not fail, however, to enter his protest in Lovel's ear against the miracle. This is more trick," he said softly, "this is not intended as a more serious fraud; see how the rash man assumes consequence, and plumes himself upon the credit of his success, and how poor Sir Arthur takes in the tale of nonsense which he is delivering to us as principle of occult science?

"You do see, my goot patron, you do see, my goot ladies, you do see, worthy Dr. Blunderhury, and even Mr. Lofel, and Mr. Oldenbuck may see, if you do will to see, how art has no sway on me at all but igno-

"And a little money would be necessary also, would it not?" said the Antiquary.

"Bah! that is a thing about, might be necessary," answered the adept.

"I thought as much," rejoined the Antiquary dryly,
"and I, in the meanwhile, without any divining rod, will show you the way to most important and delicious rascals that ever wagged a tongue, they would square the punishment more accurately with his deserts. But let us see—I think he is about to show us
some of his leg-der-mann.

When their collusion was ended, Sir Arthur resumed the account of the mysteries of the divining rod, as a subject on which he had formerly conversed with Dousterswivel. "My friend Mr. Oldbuck will now be prepared, Mr. Dousterswivel, to listen with more respect to the stories you have told us of the late discoveries in Germany by the brethren of your association."

"Ah, Sir Arthur, that was not a thing to speak to those gentlemen, because it was want of creed—what you call faith—that spoile the great enterprise.""At least, however, let my daughter read the narrate she has taken down of the story of Martin Wi-lebrand.

"Ah, that was very true story—but Miss Wardour, she is so sly and so witty, that she has made it just like one romance—as well as Goethe or Wieland could have done it, by mine honest work."

"You are right, with, Mr. Dousterswivel," answered Miss Wardour, "the romantic predominated in the legend so much above the probable, that it was impossible for a lover of fairy-land like me to avoid lending a few touches to make it perfect in its kind. But here it is, and if you do not incline to leave this shade till the heat of the day has somewhat declined, and will have sympathy with my bad exposition, except Sir Arthur or Mr. Oldback will read it to us."

"Not I," said Sir Arthur; "I was never fond of reading aloud."

He declared Oldback, "for I have forgot my spectacles—but here is Lovel, with sharp ears, and a good voice; for Mr. Blattergowl, I know, never reads anything, lest he should be suspected of reading his own compositions!"

The task was therefore imposed upon Lovel, who, received, with some trepidation, as Miss Wardour delivered with a little embarrassment, a paper containing the whole of the passages that he considered the most exciting of the narrative, with a few reflections, the peasants from injurious circumstance bought themselves to stones, and having published the prayer very lambently, they drove him out of the paunch to press the stone upon his temple."

Three young men, who had been present and assisting on this occasion, were upon their return to the hut where they carried on the laborious and mean occupation of preparing charcoal for the smelting furnaces. On the way, their conversation naturally turned upon the demon of the Harz and the doctrine of the capuchin. Max and George Waldck, the two elder brothers, although they allowed the language of the capuchin to have been indecent and worthy of censure, as presuming to determine upon the precise character and abode of the spirit, yet contended he was not a spirit, but an old man of the place, who had no conception of the power or nature of the magic. Among the several stories that the peasants related, there is a favourite one, which supposes the Harz to be haunted by a sort of tutelar demon, in the shape of a wild man, of huge stature, his head wreathed with oak leaves, and his middle cinctured with the same, bearing in his hand a pine torn up by the roots. It is certain that many persons profess to have seen such a form traversing, with huge strides, in a line parallel to the bases of the great ridges of the mountain, when divided from it by a narrow glen; and indeed the fact of the apparition is so generally admitted, that modern scepticism has only found refuge by ascribing it to optical deception.

In earlier times, the intercourse of the demon with the inhabitants was more familiar, and, according to the traditions of the Harz, he was wont, with the capuchins usually ascribed to those earth-born powers, to interfere with the affairs of mortals, sometimes for their weal, sometimes for their wo. But it was observed, that even his gifts often turned out, in the long run, to the harm of his own workers, and it was no uncommon thing for the pastors, in their care of their flocks, to compose long sermons, the burden whereof was a warning against having thoughts of the demon. The Harz gives the demon in the story, which the fortune of Martin Waldck have been often quoted by the aged to their giddy children, when they were heard to scoff at a danger which appeared visionary.

A travelling capuchin had possessed himself of the point of a thatched church at a little hamlet called Jergenbrodt, lying in the Harz district, from which he was accused against the wickedness of the inhabitants, their communication with fiends, witches, and fiends, and, in particular, with the woodland goblin of the Harz. The doctrines of Luther had already begun their work at a distance; but in this region it was placed under the reign of Charles V., and they laughed to scorn the zeal with which the venerable man insisted upon his topic. At length, as his vehemence increased with opposition, so their opposition rose in proportion to his vehemence. The inhabitants did not like to hear an accurstomed quiet demon, who had been banished from the Brockenberg for so many ages, sanguinely confounded with a cloud of mist, like the image of the magic lantern upon a white sheet, supposed to have formed the apparition.

* The outline of this story is taken from the German, though the author is at present unable to say in which of the various relations of the popular legends in that language, the original was found.

Peelabub himself, and condemned without reprieve to the bottomless Tophet. The appellation of the spirit might avenged himself on them for listening to such an infamous sentence, added to their national interest in his behalf. A travelling friar, they said, that is here to take away to them, what he pleased: but it is we, the ancient and constant inhabitants of the country, that are let at the mercy of the insulted demon, and must, of course, pay for all. In their impetration by the words of God, and reflections, the peasants from injurious circumstance bought themselves to stones, and having published the prayer very lambently, they drove him out of the paunch to press the stone upon his temple."

leased their sister from attending upon the operation of charring the wood, which requires constant attention, and divided among themselves the duty of watching it by night, according to their custom, one at a time, until his brother's watch was finished. Max Waldeck, the eldest, watched during the two first hours of the night, and was considerably alarmed, by observing, upon the opposite bank of the river, what appeared to be some figure that appeared to wheel around it with antic gestures.

Max at first thought him of calling up his brothers; but recollecting the daring character of the youngest, and the difficulty he had to wake the elder brother, he also disturbing Martin—conceiving also what he saw to be an illusion of the demon, sent perhaps in consequence of the venetrous expressions used by Martin one of the previous night to be returned to him, he thought it best to take himself to the safeguard of such prayers as he could murmur over, and to watch in great terror and annoyance this strange and alarming apparition.

After blazoning for some time, the fire faded gradually away into darkness, and the rest of Max's watch was only disturbed by the remembrance of its terrors.

George now occupied the place of Max, who had retired to rest. The phenomenon of a huge blazing fire, upon the opposite bank of the glen, again presented itself to the eye of the watchman. It was surrounded as before by figures, which, distinguished by their discords, were introduced to the spectator as the red glowing light, moving and fluctuated around it as if engaged in some mystic ceremony. George, though equally cautious, was of a bolder character than his brother, and was more naturally attracted to the object of his wonder; and, accordingly, after crossing the rivulet which divided the glen, he climbed upon the opposite bank, and approached within an arrow's flight of the fire, which blazed apparently with the same fury as when he first witnessed it.

The appearance of the assistants who surrounded it, notes George, the peculiar and somber color which are seen in a troubled dream; and at once confirmed the idea he had entertained from the first, that they did not belong to the human world. Amongst these strange unearthly forms, George Waldeck distinguished that of a giant overgrown with hair, holding an uprooted fir in his hand, with which, from time to time, he seemed to stir the blazing fire, and having no other clothing than a wreath of oak leaves around his forehead and loins. George's heart sunk within him at recognizing the well-known apparition of the Hartz demon, as he had been often described to him by the aged and sagacious man who had seen it perform traversing the mountains. He turned, and was about to fly; but, upon second thoughts, blaming his own cowardice, he recited mentally the verse of the fourth Psalms upon his knees, praying that it was in that country supposed powerful as an exorcism, and turned himself once more towards the place where he had seen the fire. But it was no longer visible.

The pale moon alone enlightened the side of the valley; and when George, with trembling steps, a moist brow, and hair streaming upright under his collar's cap, came to the spot on which the fire had been so lately visible, marked as it was by a scattered oak-tree, there appeared not on the heath the slightest vestiges of what he had seen. The moss and wild flowers were unscorched, and the branches of the oak tree, so lately agitated and danced, their wreaths of flame and smoke were moist with the dew of midnight.

George returned to his hut with trembling steps, and reported to his elder brother, resolved to say nothing of what he had seen, lest he should awake in Martin that daring curiosity which he almost seemed to be sown in the soul with impunity.

It was now Martin's turn to watch. The household cock had given his first summons, and the night was well advanced. Upon examining the state of the furnace in which the wood was stored in order to have it the following morning, he was surprised to find it had not been sufficiently maintained; for in his excursions and its consequences, George had forgotten the principal object of his watch. Martin's first thought was to call up the lumberers; but observing that his brothers slept unwontedly deep and heavily, he respected their repose, and set himself to supply the furnace with fuel without requiring their aid. What he heaped upon it was apparently sufficient to sustain the blaze, and he seemed rather to decay than revive. Martin next went to collect some boughs from a stack which had been carefully cut and dried for this purpose; but when he returned to the furnace, he found the fire had not been increased. This was a serious evil, and threatened them with loss of their trade for more than one day.

The vexed and mortified watchman set about to put some wood into the fire; but when he threw in what he thought was a large piece of blazing wood, which he heaped up with some difficulty, and then turned round to regain his hut, the shouts of laughter being renewed behind him with treble violence, and ringing far down the narrow vale.
When Martin returned to the hut, his first care, however, much astonished with what he had seen, was to dispose the kindled coal among the fuel so as not to produce a general blaze. A proclamation that the summer's efforts and all exertions of bellows and fire-wood, the coal he had brought from the demon's fire would be totally extinct, without kindling any of the other firewood, and observe the fire still kept burning on the hill, although those who had been unused around it had disappeared. As he conceived the spectre had been jesting with him, he gave way to a sense of the most unconquerable determination, desiring to see the advent to an end, resumed the road to the fire, from which, unopposed by the demon, he was brought off in the same manner a blazing piece of wood had been by him. While he was thus occupied, a very bright flame lighting his fire. Impunity having increased his rashness, he resolved upon a third experiment, and was as successful as before in reaching the fire, but, when he had again appropriated a piece of burning coal, and had turned to depart, he heard the harsh and supernatural voice which had before accosted him, pronounce these words, "Dare not to return here again!

The attempt to kindle the fire with this last coal proved as ineffectual as on the former occasions. Martin relinquished the hopeless attempt, and in the resulting silence of his heart, he laid aside all the next morning the communication of his supernatural adventure to his brothers. He was awakened from a heavy sleep into which he had sunk, from his load of muslin, by the loud exclamations of surprise and joy. His brothers, astonished at finding the fire extinguished when they awoke, and proceeded to arrange the fuel in order to renew it, they found in it his hand, and meditated the causes which their skill (for most of the peasants in the Harz are practical materialists) immediately ascertained to be pure gold.

The peasants returned their joyful congratulations when they learned from Martin the mode in which he had obtained this treasure, to which their own experience of the nocturnal vision induced them to give full credit. But they were unable to resist the temptation of sharing in their brother's wealth.

Taking now upon him as head of the house, Martin Walddeck bought lands and forests, built a castle, obtained a patent of nobility, and, greatly to the indignation of the ancient aristocracy of the neighbourhood, was invested with all the privileges of a man of family.

His courage in public war, as well as in private feuds, and his personal conduct was characterized by him kept up a ray, sustained him for some time against the odium which was excited by his sudden elevation, and the abuse of his pretensions.

And now, in the instance of Martin Walddeck, as it has been in that of many others, how little mortals can foresee the effect of sudden prosperity on their own disposition. The evil propensity in his nature, which poverty had checked and suppressed, ripened and bore their unflavored fruit under the influence of temptation and the means of indulgence. As Deep calls unto Deep, one had perished, another the fiend of avarice incited that of pride, and pride was to be supported by cruelty and oppression. Walddeck's character, always bold and resolute in the measures of prosperity, soon made him odious, not to the nobles only, but likewise to the lower ranks, who saw, with double dislike, the oppressive rights of the feudal system being exercised by a man who had risen from the very dregs of the people.

His adventure, although carefully concealed, began likewise to be whispered abroad, and the clergy already disturbed by the spirit of the hermaphrodite, who, having acquired so huge a treasure in so strange a manner, had not sought to sanctify it by dedicating a considerable portion to the use of the poor. The affluence was accompanied by a thousand feuds, and threatened by the church with excommunication. Martin Walddeck, or, as we must now call him, the Baron Von Walddeck, now declined the labour and pursuit of his acquired poverty. But his course found him not under all these difficulties, and seemed rather to augment in proportion to the danger which darkened around him, until an accident precipitated his fall.

A proclamation, addressed to all German nobles of free and honourable descent, and Martin Walddeck, splendidly armed, accompanied by his two sons, brothers, and officers with the fire still burning on the hill, although those who had been unused around it had disappeared. As he conceived the spectre had been jesting with him, he gave way to a sense of the most unconquerable determination, desiring to see the advent to an end, resumed the road to the fire, from which, unopposed by the demon, he was brought off in the same manner a blazing piece of wood had been by him. as a lapeled file, and the ruins of the castle, which Waldeck had called by his own name, are still shunned by the majority of people as haunted by evil spirits. Thus were the miseries attendant upon wealth, hastily attained and ill-employed, exemplified in the fortune of Martin Waldeck.

CHAPTER XIX.

Here has been such a stormy encounter near the ruined castle; "About I know not what!—nothing, indeed; Competitions, degrees, and comparisons of soldiership!—"

A Fair Quarrel.

This attentive audience gave the fair transcriber of the foregoing legend the thanks which politeness required. Oldbuck alone curbed his nose, and observed, that Miss Wardour's skill was something like that of the alchemists, for she had contrived to extract a sound and valuable morsel out of a very trumpery and ridiculous legend. "It is the fashion, as I am given to understand, to admire those extravagant fictions—for me, I bear an English heart, Cursed at first, and raving before it starts."

"Under your favour, my good Mr. Oldbuck," said the German, "Miss Wardour has turned de story, as she does every thing as she touches, very pretty indeed; but all the history of de Hartz goblin, and how he was aëating de donelestone mountains wid a great fir-tree for his walking-cane, and wid de great green bush around his head and his waist—that is as true as I am an honest man."

"There is no disputing any proposition so well guaranteed," answered the Antiquary dryly. But at this moment the approach of a stranger cut short the conversation.

The new comer was a handsome young man, about five-and-twenty, in a military uniform, and bearing, in his look and manner, a good deal of the martial possession, perhaps a little more than is quite consistent with the ease of a man of perfect good breeding, in whom no professional habit ought to predominate. He was at once greeted by the greater part of the company. "My dear Hector!" said Miss McIntyre, as she rose to take his hand.

"Hector, son of Piam, whence comest thou?" asked the Antiquary.

"From Fide, my lord," answered the young soldier, and continued, when he had politely saluted the rest of the company, and particularly Sir Arthur and his daughter—"I learned from one of the servants, as I was in the means of paying my respects to you, that I should find the present company in this place, and I willingly embrace the opportunity to pay my respects to so many of my friends at once."

And to a new one also, my trusty Tranj," said Oldbuck. "Mr. Lovel, this is my nephew, Captain McIntyre—Hector, I recommend Mr. Lovel to your acquaintance.

The young soldier fixed his keen eye upon Lovel, and paid his compliment with more reserve than cordiability; and as our acquaintance thought his coldness almost supercilious, he was equally frigid and houctly in making the necessary return to it; and thus a prejudice seemed to arise between them at the very commencement of their acquaintance.

The observations which Lovel made during the remainder of the evening, and the manner of his deportment, and with irritated susceptibility at another, he now this handsome young soldier assume and exercise all the privileges of a cavalier servente. He limited himself to a single dance, and a few words, putting on her shawl, he attached himself to her in the walks had a hand ready to remove every impediment in her path, and an arm to support her where it was rugged or difficult; his conversation was addressed chiefly to the re-nowned enchantress of the present day to give them the signature of these works, for I particularly directed your attention to the prettiest woman in company, as if the other was unworthy of their notice. But he thought he observed in the conduct of Captain McIntyre something of the same peculiar tenderness, which was calculated to alarm the jealousy of a lover. Miss Wardour also received his attentions; and although his candour allowed them to be of a kind which could not be repaid, but some strange sense, yet it galled him to the heart to witness that she did so.

The heart-burning which these reflections occasioned proved very indifferent seasoning to the dry antiquarian discussions with which Oldbuck, who continued to demand his particular attention, was unremittingly persecuting him; and he underwent, with fits of impatience that amounted almost to loathing, a course of lectures upon monastic architecture, in all its styles, from the massive Saxon to the florid Gothic, and from that to the mixed and composite architecture of James I. First's time, when, according to Oldbuck, all orders were confounded, and columns of various descriptions arose side by side, or were piled above each other, as if symmetry had been forgotten, and the elemental principles of composition disregarded.

"What can be more cutting to the heart than the sight of evils," said Oldbuck, in rapturous enthusiasm, "which we are compelled to behold, while we do not possess the power of rectifying them?" Lovel answered by an involuntary groan. "I see, my dear young friend, and most congenial spirit, that you feel these enormities almost as much as I do. Have you ever approached them, or met them, without longing to tear, to deface, what is so honourable?"

"Dishonourable!" echoed Lovel, "in what respect dishonourable?"

"I mean disgraceful to the arts."

"Where? how?"

"Upon the porches, for example, of the schools of Oxford, where, at immense expense, the barbarous, fantastic, and ignorant architecture has chosen to represent the whole five orders of architecture on the front of one building."

By such attacks as these, Oldbuck, unconscious of the torture he was giving, compelled Lovel to give him a share of his attention,—as a skilful angler, by now often, in the course of that short walk, to tire over the most frantic movements of his agonized prey.

They were now on their return to the spot where they had left the carriages; and it is inconceivable how often, in the course of that short walk, they became exhausted by the unceasing pressing of his worthy companion, mentally bestowed on the devil, or any one else that would have rid him of hearing more of them, all the orders and disorders of architecture which had been invented or combined from the building of Solomon's temple downwards. A slight incident occurred, however, which sprinkled a little patience on the heat of his discontents. Miss Wardour, and her self-elected knight-companion, neither preceded the others in the narrow path, when the young lady apparently became desirous of remaining nearby, to divert him for a moment, to break off her tête-à-tête with the young officer, fairly made a pause until Mr. Oldbuck came up. "I wished to ask you a question, Mr. Oldbuck, concerning the date of that interdict," said she.

It would be doing injustice to Miss Wardour's savoir faire, to suppose she was not aware that such a question would lead to an answer of no limited length. "It was in the year on which the trumpet sound, plunged, at once into the various arguments for and against the date of 1273, which had been assigned to the priory of St. Ruth by a late antiquarian, or rather a semi-study, who raked up the names of all the priors who had ruled the institution of the nobles who had bestowed lands" reply, that he invites to his own house such company as he pleases; and if you mean to ask Sir Arthur, you must know that Mr. Lovel rendered Miss Wardour and him a service of the most important kind."

"What! that romantic story is true then?—And pray, does the valorous knight aspire as he is betting on such occasions, to the hand of the young lady whom he redeemed from peril?—It is quite in the rule of romance, I am aware; and I did think that she was uncommonly happy in his company to gether, and seemed from time to time as if she watched whether she was not giving offence to her gallant cavalier."

"Dear Hector," said his sister, "if you really continue to nourish any affection for Miss Wardour—"

"If, Mary?—what an if was there?"

"—I own I consider your perseverance as hopeless."

"And why hopeless, my aged sister?" asked Captain M'Intyre; "Miss Wardour, in the state of her father's affairs, cannot pretend to much fortune; and, as to family, I trust that of M'Intyre is not inferior."

"But, Hector," continued his sister, "Sir Arthur always considers us as members of the Monkbars family."

"Sir Arthur may consider what he pleases," answered the Highlander, scornfully; "but any one with common sense will consider that the wife takes her husband's rank from the hour of her marriage.

"Gree of fifteen unblemished descents must have enrolled my mother, if her veins had been filled with printer's ink."

"For God's sake, Hector," replied his anxious sister, "take care of yourself—a single expression of that kind, repeated to my uncle by an indiscreet and interested eaves-dropper, would lose you his favour for ever, and destroy all chance of your succeeding to his estate."

"Be it so," answered the heedless young man; "I am one of a profession which the world has never been able to do without, and will far less endure to waist for half a century to come; and my good uncle may tuck his good estate and his plebeian name to your apron-string if he pleases, Mary, and you may wed this new favourite of his if you please, and you may both of you live quiet, peaceable, well-regulated lives if it pleases Heaven. My part is ta-taken—I'll fawn on the man for an inheritance which should be mine by birth."

Miss M'Intyre laid her hand on her brother's arm, and entreated him to suppress his vehemence. "Who," she said, "inquires or cares to intrude on the own hasty temper?—what dangers are you defying, but those you have yourself conjured up?—Our uncle has hitherto been all that is kind and paternal in his conduct to us, and why should you suppose he will in future be otherwise than what he has ever been, since we were left as orphans to his care?"

"He is an excellent old gentleman, I must own," replied M'Intyre, "and I am enraged at myself when I chance to offend him; but then his eternal ha-ranges upon topics not worth the spark of a flint—his investigations about invalided pots and pans and tobacco-stoppers past-service—all these things put me out of patience—I have something of Hotspur in me, sister, I must confess."

"Too much, too much, my dear brother. Into how many ricks, and, forgive me for saying, some of them little credible, has this absolute and violent temper led you? Do not let such clouds darken the time you are now to pass in our neighbourhood, but let our old benefactor see his kinmen in a spoli-rous, kind, and lively, without being rude, headstrong, and impetuous."

"Well," answered Captain M'Intyre, "I am schooled—good manners be speed; I'll do the evil thing by your new friend—I'll have some talk with this Mr. Lovel."

"With this determination, in which he was for the time perfectly sincere, he joined the party who were walking before them. The trelle dispute was by this time ended; and Sir Arthur was" the subject of foreign news, and the political and military situation of the country, themes upon which every man thinks himself qualified to give an opinion where no gun of the arsenal is aimed; but you were not in England at the time, and Mr. Lovel was probably concerned in the affair."

"I am speaking to a military man, then," said M’Intyre, "I come to enquire to what regiment Mr. Lovel belongs?—Mr. Lovel gave him the number of the regiment.—'It happens strangely that we should never have met before, Mr. Lovel. I know your regiment very well, and have served along with them at different times.'"

A blush crossed Lovel’s countenance. "I have not lately been with my regiment," he replied; "I helped the late campaign on the staff of General Sir—"

"Indeed! that is more wonderful than the other circumstance; for, although I did not serve with General Sir,—I knew his name, knowing the names of the officers who held situations in his family, and I cannot recollect that of Lovel."

At this observation, Lovel again blushed so deeply, as to attract the attention of the whole company, while a scornful laugh seemed to indicate Captain M’Intyre’s triumph. There is something strange in a young soldier blushing to himself, but I will not readily give up my phœnix of post-chaise companions—all his actions, language, and bearing, are those of a gentleman."

While in the mean while, had taken out his pocketbook, and selecting a letter, from which he took off the envelope, he handed it to M’Intyre. "You know the general’s hand in all probability—I own I ought not to show these exaggerated expressions of his regard and esteem for me." The letter contained a very handsome compliment from the officer in question for some military service lately performed. Captain M’Intyre, as he glanced his eye over it, could not deny that it was written in the general’s hand, but dryly observed as he returned it, that the address was wanting. "The address, Captain M’Intyre," he said, "shall be at your service whenever you choose to enquire after it.

"I certainly shall not fail to do so," rejoined the soldier.

"Come, come," exclaimed Old buck, "what is the meaning of all this?—Have we got Hiren here?—We'll have no swaggering, youngsters. Are you come from the wars abroad, to stir up domestic strife in our peaceful land? Are you like bull-dog puppies, forsooth, that when the bull, poor fellow, is removed from the ring, fail to brawl among themselves, worry each other, and bite honest folk’s slams that are standing by?"

Sir Arthur trusted, he said, that the young gentlemen would not so far forget themselves as to give up such an trifling subject as the back of a letter.

Both the disputants disclaimed any such intention, and, with high colour and flashing eyes, protested they were never so cool in their lives. But an obvious damp was cast over the party; they talked in future too much by the rule to besocable, and Lovel, conceiving himself the object of coid and suspicious looks, began to redress his case, so that his indirect replies had given them permission to entertain strange opinions respecting him, made a gallant determination to sacrifice the pleasure he had derived from his companion in dinner days. He knew now.

He affected, therefore, to complain of a violent headache, occasioned by the heat of the day, to which he had not been exposed since his illness, and made a formal apology to Sir Arthur, who, lister more to recent suspicion than to the gratitude due for former services, did not press him to keep his engagement more than good-breeding exactly demanded.

When Lovel had finished andOld buck’s manner seemed more anxious than he had hitherto remarked it. She indicated by a glance of her eye towards Captain M’Intyre, perceiving of it by Lovel, the subject of her alarm, and hoped, by her voice greatly under her usual tone, was not a less pleasant engagement which deprived them of the pleasure of Mr. Lovel’s company. No engagement was had interviewed, he assured her; it was only the return of a complaint by which he had been for some time occasionally attacked.

"The best remedy in such a case is prudence, and I—I, my friend Mr. Lovel, will expect him to employ it.

Lovel bowed low and coloured deeply, and Miss Wardour, as if she felt that she had said too much, turned and went into the carriage. Lovel had next to part with Old buck, who, during this interval, had, with Caxton’s assistance, been arranging his disordered periwig, and brushing his coat, which exhibited some marks of the rude paste he had versed. "What, man?" said Old buck, "you are not going to leave us on account of that foolish Hector’s indiscreet curiosity and vehemence?—Why, he is a boy—questa memoria—mento nostro—friend Horace, I’ll school Hector by and by, and put it all to right."

But Lovel persisted in his design of returning to Fairport.

The Antiquary then assumed a grave tone. "Take heed, young man, to your present feelings. Your life has been given you for useful and valuable purposes, and should be reserved to illustrate the literature of your country; when you choose to expose it in her defence, or in the rescue of the innocent.

Private war, a practice unknown to the civilized ancients, is, of all the absurdities introduced by the Gothic times, the most gross, impious, and cruel. Let me hear no more of these absurd quarrels, and I will show you the treaty upon the duel, which I composed when the town-clerk and provost Mucklewombe found the privileges of gentleman, and challenged each other. I thought of printing my Essay, which is signed Poetarior; but there was no need, as the matter was taken up by the town-council."

"But I assure you, my dear sir, there is nothing between Captain M’Intyre and me that can render such respectable interference necessary."

"See it too, for otherwise, I will stand second to both parties."

So saying, the old gentleman got into the chaise, close to which Miss M’Intyre had detained her brother, upon the same principle that the owner of a quarrelsome dog keeps him by his side to prevent his disturbing another. But Hector contrived to give her preconcerted slip, for, as he was on horseback, he lingered behind the carriages until he fairly turned the corner in the road to Knockwinneck, and then wheeling his horse’s head round, gave him the spur in the opposite direction."

A very few minutes brought him up with Lovel, who, perhaps anticipating his intention, had not put his horse beyond a slow walk, when the clatter of hoofs behind him announced Captain M’Intyre."

The young soldier, his natural heat of temper excited by the rapidity of motion, reined his horse up suddenly and violently by Lovel’s side, and, touching his hat hastily, inquired, in a very haughty tone of voice, "Who are you telling me that your address was at my service?"

"Simply, sir," replied Lovel; "that my name is Lovel, and that my residence is here, the present, Fairport, as you see by this card."

"And this is all the information you are disposed to give me?"

"I see no right you have to require more."

"I find you, sir, in company with my sister," said
CHAPTER XX.

If you fall Honour,
Never presume to serve her any more;
But trust to the integrity of arms,
And the honourable name of soldier.

A False Quarrell.

Early the next morning, a gentleman came to it upon Mr. Lovel, who was up and ready to give him. He was a military gentleman, a friend of Captain M'Intyre's, at present in Fairport on recruiting service. Lovel and he were slightly own to each other. 'I presume, sir,' said Mr. Alexander, was the name of the visitor, 'that I guess the occasion of my troubling you so daily?'

'A message from Captain M'Intyre, I presume?'

'The same—hold himself injured by the manner which you declined yesterday to answer certain inquiries which he conceived himself entitled to receive—requiring a gentleman whom he found in immediate act with his family.'

'1 will ask, if you, Mr. Lesley, would have nothing to satisfy interrogatories so haughtily and ceremoniously put you?'

'Perhaps not; and therefore, as I know the name of my friend M'Intyre on such occasions, feel very desirous of acting as peace-maker. From t. Lovel's very gentleman-like manner to every one at last strongly wish to see him repel all that sort of bious calumny, which will attach itself to 1 eses situation is not fully explained. If he will come in friendly conciliation, to inform Captain M'Intyre of his real name, for we are led to conclude of Lovel is assumed.'

'I beg your pardon, sir, but I cannot admit that account.'

'Or at least,' said Lesley, proceeding, 'that it is the name by which Mr. Lovel has been at all times distinguished—if Mr. Lovel will have the goodness to explain in his own proper way, in which, as I suppose, he should do in justice to his own character, I will answer for the amicable arrangement of this pleasant business.'

'Yes, says to Mr. Lesley, that if I condescend answer questions which no man has a right to ask, I, which are now put to me under penalty of Cap- in M'Intyre's resentment, Captain M'Intyre will condescend to rest satisfied? Mr. Lesley, I have just one word to say on this subject—I have no doubt my secret, if I had been formed to be safe to it, and particularly if I might be expected to communicate, you, a more stranger, have no right to enquire her.'

Mr. Lovel, if you served as you say you have—"If I have served as I have?"—Yes, sir; such is my expression—if you have served, you must know that you owe me satisfaction er ever will.'

If that be your opinion, I shall be proud to give it you, Captain M'Intyre, in the way in which the ed is generally used among gentlemen.

Very well, sir,' rejoined Hector, and, turning his s round, galloped off to overtake his party. His absence had already alarmed them, and his er, having stopped the carriage, had her neck want into the window to see where he was.

'What is the matter with you now?' said the tuary, 'riding to and fro as your neck were at wager—why do you not keep up with the pace?'

'Forgotten my glove,' said Hector.

'Forgotten your glove!—I presume you meant to say your hat,' answered the old gentleman, 'and you, my young gentleman—you shall return with this afternoon to Monkbars.' So saying, he bid his postilion go on.
unjustifiable in a religious point of view, or he might be wandering about in the present like Cain, with the blood of his brother on his head. And all this might be saved by speaking a single word. Yet, pride whispered, that, to speak that word now, would be as to yield an ignominious right to a wretch. And Daniel was low enough to feel the fear to his silence. Every one, Miss Wardour included, must then, he thought, account him a mean man, and it was well for him to give way to the fear of being shamed. Captain M'Intyre, the explanation he had refused to the calm and handsome protestations of M'Intyre's insinuating behaviour to himself, personally, the air of pretension which he assumed towards Miss Wardour, and the extreme injustice, arrogance, and incivility, of his demands upon a person of his station, seemed to justly him in repelling his rude resolution. In short, he formed the resolution, which might have been expected from so young a man, to shut the eyes, namely, of his calmer reason, and follow the dictates of his offended pride. With this purpose he sought Lieutenant Taffrill.

The lieutenant received him with the good-breeding of a gentleman, and the frankness of a sailor, and listened with no small surprise to the detail which preceded his request, that he might be favoured with his company at his meeting with Captain M'Intyre. When he had finished, Taffrill rose up and wished him good night at least twice. "This is a most singular circumstance," he said, "and really, I am conscious, Mr. Taffrill, how little I am entitled to your request, but the urgency of circumstances hardly leaves me an alternative."

"Permit me to ask you one question," asked the sailor; "is there anything of which you are ashamed in the course of your services, which you have declined to communicate?"

"Upon my honour, no; there is nothing but what, in a very short time, I trust I may publish to the world."

"I hope the mystery arises from no false shame at the lowness of your friends perhaps, or connexions?"

"No, on my word," replied Lovel.

"I have little sympathy for that folly," said Taffrill; "indeed I cannot suppose to have any for speaking of my relations, I may be said to have come myself from before the mast, and I believe shall very soon form a connexion, which the world will think well enough, with a very amiable girl, to whom I have been attached since we were next-door neighbours, at a time when I little thought of the good fortune which has brought me forward in the service."

"I assure you, Mr. Taffrill," replied Lovel, "whatever talk of my parents, my lord, should never think of concealing it from a spirit of petty pride. But I am so situated at present, that I cannot enter on the subject of my family with any propriety."

"It is quite enough," said the honest sailor, "give me your hand; I'll see you as well through this business as I can, though it is but an unpleasant one after all—but what of that? Our own honour has the next call on us after our country—you are a lad of spirit, and I own I think Mr. Hector M'Intyre, with his long pedigree and his air of family, very much of a jackass. His father was a soldier of fortune as I am myself, I suppose, less just as his uncle pleases—and whether one pursues fortune by land, or sea, makes no great difference, I should fancy."

"Well," said his new ally, "we will dine together and arrange matters for this encounter. I hope you understand the use of the weapon?"

"Yes," answered Lovel.

"I am sorry for that—M'Intyre is said to be a marksman."

"I am sorry for it also," said Lovel; "both for his sake and mine—only I must then, in self-defence, take my aim as well as I can."

"Well," added Taffrill, "I will have our surgeon's mate on the field—a good clever young fellow as caulking a ship. I'll let Lesley, who is an honest fellow for a landsman, know, that he stands for the benefit of either party.—Is there any thing I can do for you in case of an accident?"

"I have but little occasion to trouble you," said Lovel; "this small billet contains the key of my curiosity; and there—there—there is one letter of the esoteror, (digesting a temporary swelling of the heart as he spoke) "which I beg the favour of you to deliver at your earliest convenience, and to my little surgeon's mate at the Gresme's arm, over the way, at four o'clock."

"Agreed," said Lovel.

"Agreed," said Taffrill; and the whole affair was arranged.

It was a beautiful summer evening, and the shadow of the solitary thorn-tree was lengthening upon the short green sword of the narrowway which was skirted by the woods that closed around the ruins of St. Ruth. Lovel, and Lieutenant Taffrill, with the surgeon, came up the lane, and exchanged every word of the very uncongenial to the soft, mild, and pacific character of the hour and scene. The sheep, which, during the ardent heat of the day, had sheltered in the trees, and in the brooks, now grazed lazily under the roots of the aged and stunted trees, had now spread themselves upon the face of the hill to enjoy the evening's pasture, and bleated to each other with that melancholy sound, which at once gives life to a landscape and marks its solitude. Taffrill and Lovel came on in deep conference, having, for fear of discovery, sent their horses back to the town by the lieutenants of the district. The opportunity had not yet appeared on the field. But, when they came upon the ground, there sat upon the roots of the old thorn, a figure, as glorious in his decay as the moss-grown but strong and contorted boughs which served him for a canopy. It was old Ochiltree. "This is embarrassing enough," said Lovel; "how shall we get rid of this old fellow?"

"Here, father Adam," cried Taffrill, who knew the mendicant of yore; "here's half-a-crown for you—you must go to the Four Horse-shoes yonder—the little inn you know, and inquire for a servant, and blue and yellow livery. If he is not there you'll wait for him, and tell him we shall be with his master in about an hour's time. At any rate wait till we are all together, and get off with you—come, weigh anchor."

"I thank you for your awfulness," said Ochiltree, pocketing the piece of money; "but I beg your pardon, Mr. Taffrill—I can't gang your errand now."

"Why not, man? what can hinder you?"

"I was speak a word wi' young Mr. Lovel."

"With me?" answered Lovel; "what would you say with me? come, say on, and be brief."

The mendicant led him a few paces aside. "Are ye indebted any thing to the Lord o' Monkbarns?"

"Indeed I can think of but one thing—I what of that? what makes you think so?"

"Ye maun ken I was at the shirra's day; fo' God help me, I gang about a' gates like the wife of the spriet, and wha said come whirring there in a genie, but Monkbarns in an unco carittle-now 'tis but a little thing that will make his honour take a chance and post-horse twa days rannal."

"What? say what is the matter about me?"

"Ou, ye'ere hear, ye'ere hear! Weel, Monkbarns' cloasted wi' the shirra whatever pleases folk may be the, without ye'ere medina doubt that the gentlemen in the castle, and the castle's ancient, was never a hang-tongue."

"For heaven's sake, my old friend—"

"Canna ye bid me gang to the shirra at all?—Lovel! it wad be man purpuris farand than a drop of heaven in that impatient gate."

[There was a pause for the reader to reflect upon the last sentence, and then the page was turned to the next.]}
"But I have private business with Lieutenant Tafffril here." "What is it, weel, a' in gude time," said the beggar—
"I can use a little was bit freedom wi'," said Daniel Tafffril—"mo'ny the perry and the tap I worked for him langeyme, for I was a worker in wood as weel as a man for to serve in the navy."

"You are either mad, Adam, or have a mind to drive me mad."

"Nane o' the twa," said Edie, suddenly changing his mood and the protected drone of the monicant to a brief and decided tone: "the sherra sent for his clerk, and, as the lad is rather light o' the tongue, I fand it was for drawing a warrant to apprehend yourself, having found the ichard in his pocket for a body's kens the laird likes nobod'y to put his hand in his pock—But now I may haud my tongue, for I see the M'Intyre lad and Mr. Lesley coming up, and I guess that Monkbar's purpose was very kind, and that yours is muckle waur than it should be."

The antagonists now approached, and saluted with the stern civility which besetted the occasion.
"What has this old fellow to do here?" said M'In-tyre.

"I am an auld fellow," said Edie, "but I am also an auld soldier o' your father's, for I served wi' him in the 42d."

"Serve where you please, you have no title to intrude on us," said M'Intyre, "and you lifted his old man's hand high about the idea of touching the old man. But Ochiltree's courage was roused by the insult. "Haul down your switch, Captain M'In-tyre! I am an auld soldier, as I said before, and I'll take my hand from your father's son: and touch the wand while my pike-staff will haul the other."

"Well, well, I was wrong—I was wrong," said M'Intyre, "here's a crown for you—go your ways—
what's the matter now?"

The old man drew himself up to the full advantage of his uncommon height, and in despite of his dress, which indeed had more of the prison than the ordinary beggar, looked, from height, manner, and emphasis of voice and gesture, rather like a gray palmer, or even a preacher, the ghostly counsellor of the young men who were around him, than the object of their charity. His speech, indeed, was as homely as his habit, but as bold and unceremonious as his eecrt and dignified demeanour. "What are ye come here for me, a man—and an auld one too—and with the em-spired audience; "are ye come amongst the most lovely works of God to break his laws? Have ye left the works of man, the houses and the cities that are built up high in the air and ye come here among the peaceful hills, and by the quiet waters, that will last whiles uaiting earthly shall endure, to destroy each other's lives, that will have but an unco short time, the course of nature to make up a lang account at the close of it? O airis! hae ye brothers, sisters, fathers, that hae tended ye, and mothers that hae travelled for ye, friends that hae o'ld ye, like a piece o' their ain heart? And is this the way ye tak to make them childless and brother-less and friendless? Ohoon! it's an ill feight whar he that wins has the worst o' it. Think on't, bairnia—
"I am a man—but I am an auld man too—and with my poverty takes away the weight of my counsel, grey hairs and a truthful heart should add it twenty times—Gang hame, gang hame, like gude lads, a' that. What can be better than to rest these days, and ye'll hae feaising enough, and maybe auld Edie will hirpie out himself if he can get a fealdike to lay his gun ower, and may live to tell you what he does the best where there's a good cause afore ye."

There was something in the unguarded and inde-dependent manner, landly sentiment, and manly rude expression of the old man, that had its weight upon the party, and particularly on the seconds, whose pride was uninterested in bringing the dispute to a bloody arbitration, and who, on the contrary, eagerly waited for an opportunity to recommend reconci-lia cion.

"Upon my word, Mr. Lesley," said Taffrill, "old Adam speaks like an oracle—Our friends here were very angry on the score of this ridiculous affair.
To-day they should be cool, or at least we must be so in their behalf—I think the word should be forgotten and forgiven on both sides, that we should all shake hands, fire with the English crimson, and then go clear of the ground.

"Gentlemen," said M'Intyre very coldly, "all this should have been thought of before. In my opinion, there are persons that cannot warrant the old man's doings, and I have done, and who should part without carrying it any farther, might go to supper at the Greemes'-arms very joyously, but would rise the next morning with reputations as ragged as our friend here, who has obliged us with a rather unnecessary display of his oratory. I speak for myself, that I find myself bound to call upon you to proceed without more delay."

"And I," said Lovel, "as I never desired any, also have to request these gentlemen to arrange preliminaries as far as possible."

"Bairns, bairns!" cried old Ochiltree; but, perceiving he was no longer attended to—Madmen, I should say—but your blood be on your heads!—
And the old man drew off from the ground, which was now red with his blood, and continued muttering and talking to himself in sullen indignation, mixed with anxiety, and with a strong feeling of the fatal curiosity. Without paying further attention to his father's son, and to the persons, Mr. Lesley and the Lieutenant made the necessary arrangements for the duel, and it was agreed that both parties should fire when Mr. Lesley dropped his handkerchief.

The fatal sign was given, and both fired almost in the same moment. Captain M'Intyre's ball grazed the side of his opponent, but did not draw blood.
That of Lovel was more true to the aim; M'Intyre reeled and fell. Raising himself on his arm, his first exclamation was, "It is nothing—it is nothing—give us the other pistol." But in an instant he said in a lower tone, "I believe I have enough, and what's worse, I fear I deserve it. Mr. Lovel, or whatever your name is, fly and save yourself—Beer all witnesses, I provoked this by my behaviour to his father to his father's son; and if he lives, let him put his hands up and while my pike-staff will haul the other."

"Well, well, I was wrong—I was wrong," said M'Intyre, "here's a crown for you—go your ways—
what's the matter now?"

The old man drew himself up to the full advanta-

CHAPTER XXI.

The Lord Abbots had a soul
Shaken by sudden pleasures and searching on the fire;
By magic stairs he went as deep as hell;
And if in devils' pavements gold he kept,
He kept his treasure in a place less sweet.

The Wonders of a Kingdom.

Love, almost mechanically followed the beggar who led the way with a hasty and steady pace, through bush and bramble, avoiding the beaten path, and often turning to listen whether there were any sounds of pursuit behind. He sometimes descended in the very bed of the torrent, sometimes kept a narrow and precariously path, that the sheep (which, with the sluttish negligence towards property of that vast university in Scotland, were allowed to stray in the copse) had made along the very verge of its overhanging banks. From time to time Lovel had a glance of the path which he had traversed the day before in company with Sir Arthur, the antiquary, and the young ladies. Dejected, embarrassed, and occupied by a thousand inquietudes, as he then was, what would he now have given to regain the sense of innocence which alone was counterbalances a thousand evils? "Yet, then," such was his hasty and involuntary reflection, "even then, guiltless and valued by all around me, I thought myself unhappy. Was it not my blood upon my hands—the feeling of pride which urged me to the deed has now deserted me, as the actual deed himself is said to do whose he has tempted to guilt?"

Every spectator for Magdalen said the time before the first pangs of remorse, and he thought he could have encountered every agony of slighted love to have had the conscious freedom from bloodguiltiness which by possession he had in the morning he went in the field of o' the light frea the door o' the cave, flaughiering against the hazzes on the other bank—and then sicken stories as Sanders had about the worry-cows and the gyre-cling, and the little hands of the youngest of them, and the lights that he had seen, and the cross that he had heard, when there was nane mortal ee open but his ain; and eh! as he went thrum them ower and ower to the like o' me aye yin the ain, and wad, wad, wad, when he wad seen rese o' the light frea the door o' the cave, that he would like to see has a light and evil life, and abused charity when they were young, sad sibilins come to lack it when they are said.

At length, as Lovel, exulted by his late indisposition, the harrowing feelings by which he was agitated, and the exertion necessary to keep up with his guide in a path so rugged, began to flag and fail behind him, he presently placed himself on the front of a precipice overhung with brushwood and copse. Here a cave, as narrow in its entrance as a fox-earth, was indicated by a small fissure in the bank, and a rock, one of those which, anchored by its thick and twisted roots in the upper part of the clift, flung its branches almost straight outward from the cliff, concealing it effectually from all observation. It might indeed have escaped the attention even of those who had stood at its very opening, so uninviting was the portal at which the beggar entered. But within, the cavern was higher and more roomy, cut into two separate branches, which, intersecting each other at right angles, formed an emblem of the cross, and indicated the abode of an anchorer of former times. There are many caves of the same kind in different parts of Scotland. I need only instance those of Gorton, near Roslyn, in a scene well known to the admirers of romantic nature.

The light within the cave was a dusky twilight at the entrance, which failed altogether in the inner recesses.

"Few folks ken o' this place," said the old man; "to the best o' my knowledge, there's just twa aye been, and that's right wick and dillin. Lord Linker. I have had mony a thought, that when I found myself auld and forlorn, and no able to enjoy God's blessed air any longer, I wad drag myself hame in this dark gable, and take away what ye canna restore, and that's the breath of man, whilk is in his nostrils— but I say it is a sin to be forgiven if it's repented of. Sinner me are we a' ; but if ye ken another sort of a cockade, and speak a foreign langage, I canna see but a man may have excuse for killing his ain mortal foe, that comes armed to the fair field to kill him. I dunn no what it's richt or wick and dillin, but I haf seen the evil o' his ways, there is as much promise a Uns the wan boarders o' the Testament a wad save the waret o' us, could we but think sau'.
is such scraps of comfort and of dignity as he used, the mendicant thus continued to solicit the attention of Lovel, until the twilight to fade into night. "Now," said Ochitree, "I carry ye to a more convenient place, where I rambled, and love to wander about, and see the sky, and to see the moonlight come through old windows of the runs. There can be no- some here after this time of night, and if they should there is a town, a hotel, a church, and other constables, it will have been over long ago. They are as great cowards as other folk, wi' a warrant and King's key. And has given some o' a game of our own to be played by night-time than by day. So I'll show you near me—But, laden be grace for it, they cannot now for any wear than an auld man and a; and my badge is a gude protection; and then Isabella Wardour is a tower o' strength, ye ken well sighed."—Aweel, dinna be cast down—bolts r' right yet—gibe the lassie time to ken her—she's the wale o' the country for beauty, and a friend o' mine—I gang by the by the kirk on a Sabbath—deil ony o' them wear a hair o' auld Edie's heid now—I keep the o' the carth when we ga to the borough, and others wi' a baillie wi' as little concern as an a reek."

Is the mendicant spoke thus, he was bustled in by the stones in one angle, so he obscured the entrance of the staircase he had spoken, and led the way into it, folk by Lovel in passive silence.

As his free out of the old man; the took care o' that, for they were a lang generation, I reckon—they has contrived ancle, wirile hole, that gang out to the open air, wi' the staircases as a cliff-blade.

There, in the shadow stood ever, loud narrow, it was neither ruinous nor long, easily admitted them into a narrow gallery called a recess. It was the wall of the chancel, which it received air and light through, among the fleur de lis, the Gothic architecture.

is secret passage anes gaed round great part o' ginge," said the beggar, "and through the wa' place I've heard Monkbars ca' the Refractory, not probably Refectory, and so awa to the house. If it'd be hard to use, five o' the monks were saying at meal-time, and then it come ben here and see that they were busy awa wi' the psalm in the dawn below there—en' longed but right of the aye and fetch in a bonnie lass at the cowl for they were queer hands the monks, unless we is made on them. But our folk were at in the passage, the passage in some ad pu' it down in others, for fear o' some unwise getting into it, and finding their way the cowl—it had been a fashionable job my curate, some o' our nocks had been

now came to a place where the gallery was a small circle, sufficient to contain a kit. It was mounted, cutted excellently before it, forward into the chancel, and as its sides were as it were, with perforated stone work, it ded a full view of the chancel which was directed. Edie was a convenient watch-tower, from which a priest, himself unseen, might watch the r' of his monks, and ascertain, by personal a', our punctured into the recess, the secret w' below, the secret station, screened as it was true figure of St. Michael and the dragon open transept around the space, which was composed of a wooden arch. The private place was, in law phrase, the crow-bar and hame for doors and locks, in execution of the king's confined to its pristine breadth, had originally continued beyond this point. The ideas of the vangebands who frequented the cave of St. Ruth had caused them to build it carefully up with stone from the ruin.

We shall be better, Edie, seeing himself on the stone bench, and stretching the lapet of his blue gown upon the spot, when he motioned Lovel to sit down beside him—We shall be better here than down below, the air's fresh and cool, and the savour of the wall flowers, and siccans shrubs as grow on those ruined wa's, is far more refreshing than the damp smell down below yonder. They smell sweetest by night-time than by day. We are not seen about ruined buildings—now, Master Lovel, can o'you your scholars give a gude reason for that?"

Lovel replied in the negative. "I am thinking," resumed the beggar, "that they'll be like many folk's gude gifts, that often seem moist gracious in adversity—or maybe it's a parable, to teach us no to slight them that are in the darkness of sin and the decay of tribulation, for they give us the greatest and most pleasant and quiet fragrances of moonlight, that are lying still on the floor o' this auld kirk, and glancing through the great pillars and stanchions the carvings of the angels, and the leaves and the leaves on the leaves of the dark ivy as the breath o' wind shakes it—I wonder whether this is a pleasing to Heaven than when they were lighted up with lamps, and candles nae doubt, and roughness? and wi' the sky and the frankness that they speak of in the Holy Scripture, and wi' organs assuredly, and men and women singers, and sackbuts, and clarsines, and a' instruments o' music—I wonder if that would be acceptable, or whether it is of these grand parable o' ceremonies that holy writ says 'it is an abomination to me'?

And I'm thinking, Master Lovel, twa pure contrite spirits like yours and mine find grace to make our petition"— Here Lovel laid his hand eagerly on the mendicant's arm, saying, "Hush! I heard some one speak.

"I am dull o' hearing," answered Edie in a whisper, "but we're surely safe here—where was the sound?"

Lovel pointed to the door of the chancel, which highly ornamented, occupied the west end of the building, surmounted by the carved window, which let in a flood of moonlight over it.

"They can be nae o'er," said Edie in the same low and cautious tone; "there's but twa o' them kens o' the place, and they're mony a mile off, if they are still bound on their weary pilgrimage. I'll ne'er think its the story o' here at this time o' night, I am nae believer in aunt wid's stories about ghosts, though this is gey like a place for them—But mortal, or of the other world, here they come—two men and a light."

And in very truth, while the mendicant spoke, two human figures darkened with their shadows the entrance of the chancel which had before opened to the moonlight, then moonlight meadow beyond, and the small lantern, which one of them displayed, glimmered pale in the clear and strong beams of the moon, as the evening star does among the lights of the departing day. The first and most obvious was, that, despite the secessions of Edie Ochitree, the persons who approached the runs at an hour so uncommon must be the officers of justice in quest of Lovel. But no sooner had the mendicant pointed with a touch and a whisper from the old man warned Lovel that his best course was to remain, yet, and watch their potions from their present place of concealment, than there should any thing more to render unnecessary it, they had behind them the private staircase and ca vern, by means of which they could escape into the wood long before any danger of close pursuit. They kept themselves, then, in the wood, and observed, with eager and anxious curiosity, every accent and motion of those nocturnal wanderers.

THE ANTIQUARY.

[Chap. XXI]

After conversing together some time in whispers, the two men proceeded to hold a consultation, and a voice, which Lovel at once recognised, from its tone and dialect, to be that of Dousterswivel, pronounced in a louder but still a muffled tone and a muffled voice, and I daresay in a sort of whisper, yet they should be quite as loud and clear as if they were intended for the ear only, on some particular occasion.

"We must not be over-cautious, or too anxious for the issue of the affair. You shall see, mine host, that he is in the company of a gentleman of distinction, and that his conversation is not to be doubted. I expect to get as rich as one Jew for his poor horse and dray, for so much is it worth.

"That other one," whispered Edie, "maun be—according to a likelihood, Sir Arthur Wadlour. I see nobody but himself had come here at this time at e'en wi' that German blackguard—Ane wad think he's bewitched him—he gars him e'en chaw that chaise is stuck—Let's see what they can be doing."

This interruption, and the low tone in which Sir Arthur spoke, made Lovel lose all Sir Arthur's answer to the adept, excepting the three last emphatic words: "Very great concern;"—whence Dousterswivel replied at once, "Expenses—to be sure—these must be great expenses—you do not expect to reap before you do sow seed. The expenses are of the seed—of the first season. Now we are in the middle of the season, and the expenses are great; but the harvest is still far in the future."

"You are quite right, my dear; I will not conceal your secret from you at all—you see this little plate of silver, which I have in my hand, measures exactly the same size as the first plate."

"But, Dousterswivel," said the simple Baronet, "does this not look like magic? I am a true enough unworthy son of the Episcopal church, and I will have nothing to do with the foul fiend."

"Bah! bah!—not a bit of magic in it at all—not a bit. It is all founded on the celestial influence, and it is not a matter of numbers—no, no, but I daresay you are much finer than I. I do not say that any man is not of the spirit in it, but because of the soundness; but if, you say you are of the spirit, and I shall not be surprised."

"I will be sure to see him at all," said the Baronet, whose courage seemed, from a certain quaver in his accent, to have taken a fit of the ague.

"Dat is great pity," said Dousterswivel; "I should have liked to have seen you a little more clear and distinct. I am like one of those dogs—"and I know how to manage him—"you would not care to see him?"

"Not at all," answered the Baronet, in a tone of perfect assurance; "I think we have been but little time."

"You shall ponder: me, my patron, it is not yet time, and twelve are just our planetary hours, now you show me a dozen, and I will make a show of them, and I will make my picture like a flying serpent with a turkeys-head—very well. Then upon this side I make a little plate of moom mesurin a whole goddam in the space of a day and nine nights."

Now, Sir Arthur, you have sowed this little seed of ten guineas like one pinch of scent, or powder, and if you do not reap the great harvest—dat is the great harvest for the little seed of the season, it must be proportions, you must know—then never call one honest man, Hermann Dousterswivel. Now you see, mine patron—"

"But, my lord, I will not conceal your secret from you at all—"Sir Arthur Wadlour, I have in my hand a little plate, which I am about to make a little plate of moom mesurin a whole goddam, and I have it in my hand, and I have it in my hand, and I have it in my hand."

"Well then, Dousterswivel, with every confidence in your courage and your skill, we will dispense with this apparition, and go on to the business of the night."

"With all mine heart—it is just one thing to me—and now it is the time—hold you do sword and I will take little what you call chip."

Dousterswivel accordingly set fire to a little pile of chips, touched and prepared with some bituminous substance to make them burn fiercely; and when the flame was at the highest, and lightened, with its shrill, shrill, shrill, every sound around, the German finding a handful of perfumes, which produced a strong and pungent odour, the exorcist and his pupil both were so much affected as they sneezed hideously, and, as the vapour floated around the pillars of the building, and penetrated every crevice, it produced the same effect on the beggar and Lovel."

"Was that an echo?" said the Baronet, astonished at the scrutinum which resounded from above; "or—drawing close to the adept, "can it be the spirit you talked of, ridiculing our attempt upon his hidden treasures?"

"No, no," muttered the German, who began to partake of his pupil's terror, "I hope not."

Here a sudden knocking at the door, which the mendicant was unable to suppress, and which could not be considered by any means as the dying fall of an echo, accompanied by a grunting half-smothered laugh, though, of course, not without a few tickles.

"Lord have mercy on us!" said the Baronet.

"All guten Griottern, loben den Herrn" ejaculated the terrified adept. "I was begun to think."

He continued, after a moment's silence, "that this would be de bestmost done in de day-light—we was bestmost to go away just now."

"You juggling villain," said the Baronet, in whom these expressions awakened a suspicion that overcame his terror, connected as it was with the sense of desperation arising from the apprehension of impending ruin,—"you juggling mountebank, this is some legendary trick of yours to get off from the performance of your promise, as you have so often done before. But, before Heaven, I will this night know what I have trusted to when I suffered you to..."

A great deal of stuff in the same purpose with that placed in the mouth of the hero, in whom you may adopt, was the fourth page of Scott's Discovery of Witchcraft. Third Edition. Linnaeus, London, 1865. The appendix is entitled, "An Excellent Description of the Nature and Virtues of Devils and Supernatural Beings," compiled by the First and the Second Editions, and containing the compendium of the whole work."

This second Book, though stated to be according to the first, is, in fact, practically a bulkier work, and contains the republication of the operations of the first Book, and the compendium of the absurd and superstitious ideas concerning witches so far as they were contained in the first, and the conclusion is a serious treatise on the various means of combating spiritual astral spirits.
fool me on to my ruin!—Go on, then, fiance, certainly you don't wish to make a fool of, or confess yourself a knave and an impostor, or, by the faith of a desperate and ruined man, I'll send you where you shall see spirits enough.

'You will find no trembling between his terror for the supernatural beings by whom he supposed himself to be surrounded, and for his life, which seemed to be at the mercy of a desperate man, could only be saved if the man were replaced by the airless being in the house, and an exaltation and a prolongation of the most deplorable whine in which he was accustomed to solicit charity—Dousterswelv flung himself on his knees, 'Dear Sir Arthur, let us go, or let me die.'

'No, you cheating scoundre,' said the knight, unshathing the sword which he had brought for the purpose of the exorcism, 'that shift shall not serve you—Monkbarns warned me long since of your juggling pranks—I will see this treasure before you leave this place, or I will have you confess yourself an impostor, or, by Heaven, I'll run this sword through you and all the spirits of the dead should rise around us!'

'For de lobe of Heaven be patient, mine honoured patron, and you shall have all de treasure as I know of,' said the old man. 'I do not speak about de spirits—it makes them angry.'

'Edie Ochillite here prepared himself to throw in a token of good grace, was restrained by his master, who began to take more serious interest, as he observed the earnest and almost desperate demeanour of Sir Arthur. Dousterswelv, having at once before his eyes the fear of the foul fiend, and the violence of Sir Arthur, played his part of a conjurer extremely ill-habited to assume the degree of confidence necessary to deceive the latter, lest it should give offence to the invisible cause of all his woe, and allow his rolling eyes, muttering, and sputtering German exorcisms, with contortions of his face and person, rather flowing from the impulse of terror than of meditation, fraud, he at length proceeded to a corner of the building where a flat stone lay upon the ground, bearing upon its surface the effigy of an armed warrior in a recumbent posture carved in bas-relief. He muttered to Sir Arthur, 'Miss patrons—it is here—Got save us all!'

Sir Arthur, who, after the first moment of his superstitious fear was over, seemed to have bent up and flung back his gnar'd head, and was in the process of making ready to carry on the adventure, lent the adept his assistance to turn over the stone, which, by means of a lever that the adept had provided, their joint force with much labor with a success sufficient to carry the portmanteau forth below to indicate the subterranean treasure, nor was there any apparition of spirits, earthly or infernal. But when Dousterswelv had, with great trepidation, struck a few strokes with a mattock, and hastily thrown out a shovelled or two of earth, (for they came provided with the tools necessary for digging,) something was heard to ring like a fragment of a falling piece of metal, and Dousterswelv, hastily catching up the substance which produced it, and which his shovel had thrown out along with the earth, exclaimed, 'On mine dear weather—if it is indeed—I mean all we can do to-night,'—and he gazed round him with a crowing and fearful glance, as if to see from what corner the avenger of his imposture was to spring on him.

'Let me see it,' said Sir Arthur; and then repeated still more sternly, 'I will be satisfied—I wish to see—but I wish to see—' and he pointed the object to the light of the lantern. It was a small case, or casket—for Lovey could not at the distance exactly discern its shape, which, from the Baronet's excitement, she did not know—was filled with coin. 'Ay,' said the Baronet, 'this is being indeed in good luck! and if it omens proportional success upon a larger venture, the venture shall be made. That six hundred of Goldsworl's, added to the other incumbrant claims, must have been ruin indeed. If you think we can part with it by repeating this experience, suppose what new changes—I will hazard the necessary advance, come by it how I may.'

'O mine dear patrons, do not speak about all dat,' said Dousterswelv, 'as just now, but help me to put de shone to de rights, and let us begin our own ways.' And accordingly, so soon as the stone was replaced, Sir Arthur was resigned more to his guidance, away from a spot, where the German's guilty conscience and superstitious fears represented ghoulines as lurking behind each pillar with the purpose of punishing his treachery.

'Saw any body e'er the like o' that?' said Mrs. Fugg, when they had disappeared like shadows through the gate by which they had entered—'Saw any creature living e'er the like o' that!—But what can we do for that pur doihted devil of a knight-baronet?—Oh, he showed muckle hair spunk, too much. I thought I thought he was sent could iron through the vagabond—Sir Arthur wannas half see build at Bessie's-apron yon night—but then his blood was up even now, and that that makes an unco difference. I has seen many a wad has fallen another an angler him, that wadna muckle he has liked a clink against Crummie's-borne yon time. But what's to be done?—I supposes.'

'See, the poor folk in this fayth is entirely restored by this deception, whick, unques- tionably, he has arranged beforehand.'

'What the affer?'—Ay, ask him for that—they that hide the best here to find—he wants to wise him out o' his last guinea, and then escape to his ain country, the land-loper. I was likel weel just to hare come in at the clipping-time, and gien him a loander wi' my pike-staff—he wad lie there ten it for a bensian free some o' the auld deid abobbes—But it's best no to be rash—stickin' diana gang by strength, out by the guiding o' the guly—I'd be upsides wi' him a day.'

'What if you should inform Mr. Oldbuck?' said Lovey.

'Oh, I dinna ken—Monkbarns and Sir Arthur are like, and yet they're no like neither—Monkbarns has whiles influence wi' him, and while Sir Arthur cares as little about him as about the like o' me. Monkbarns is no that ower wise himself, in some things—he wad believe a body to be an aulin Roman coin, as he ca's it, or a ditch to be a camp, upon any leasing that idle folk made about it. I hae seen it a's well. He's an auld man, and maybe do mair ill nor gude—he's done that twice or thrice about these mineworks—ye wad think the truth—Sir Arthur had a pleasure in gaun on them—they the mar he was war'd against it by Monkbarns.'

'Say what ye then,' said Lovey, 'to letting Miss Wardour ken the circumstance.'

'Oh, purr think how could she stop her father doing his pleasure—and, besides, what wad it help?—There's a sooth in the country about that the bubbles o' Flushing are auld men. But Edinburgh has been driving the purr-rovel's o' the law up to the head into Sir Arthur's sides to gar him pay it, and if he canna, he maun gang to jail.'

'Oh, for the love o' me,' cried Mrs. Fugg, 'he was fill'd wi' coin, and just catches at this chance as a he's has left, to escape utter perdition; so what signifies plaguing the purr ladies about what canna be helped?—And besides, to say the truth, I wadna like to vik.
secret this place. It’s unco convenient, ye say yourself, to have a hiding-hole an’ one’s ain, and though I be out o’ the line o’ needing ane e’en now, and trust in the power o’ grace that I’ll never do any thing to make you better, and no body kens whether temptation ane may be gien ower to—and, to be brief, I donna bide the thought of any body ken rum about the place—they say, keep a thing seven days a’ ay and find a use for’—and, maybe I may need the cove, either for myself, or for some other body.”

This argument, in which Edie Ochiltree, noting the general moral tone of the place, seemed to take, perhaps from old habit, a personal interest, could not be hindersomely controverted by Lovel, who was at that moment reaping the benefit of the secret of which the old man appeared to be so jealous.

This incident, however, was of great service to Lovel, as diverting his mind from the unhappy occurrence of the evening, and considerablyrouning the energies which had been stupefied by the first view of his calamity. He reflected, that it by no means necessarily followed that a dangerous wound must be a fatal one—that he had escaped from the reach of the surgeon had expressed any opinion of Captain M’Intyre’s situation—and that he had duties on earth to perform, even should the worst be true. He did not respect his peace of mind or sense of innocence, would furnish a motive for enduring existence, and at the same time render it a course of active benevolence.

Ambrose retold Seale’s feelings when the hour arrived, when, according to Edie’s calculation, who, by some train or process of his own in observing the heavenly bodies, stood independent of the assistance of a watch or timekeeper, it was fitting they should leave their hiding-place, and betake themselves to the sea-shore, in order to meet Lieutenant Taffiti’s boat according to arrangement.

They retraced by the same passage which had admitted them to the prior’s secret seat of observation, and when they issued from the grotto into the wood, the beams, which began to clear, and even to sing, announced that the dawn was advanced. This was confirmed by the light and amber clouds that appeared over the sea as soon as their exit from the copse permitted them to view the horizon. Morning, said to be friendly to the muse, had probably obtained this character from its effect upon the fancy and feelings of mankind. Even to those who, like Lovel, were engrossed in the various night and morning duties, the first break of the dawn brings strength and quickening both of mind and body. It was therefore with renewed health and vigour that Lovel, guided by the truant light, left the beach of the grotto and crossed the downs which divided the Dean of St. Ruth, as the woods surrounding the ruins were popularly called, from the sea-shore.

The first level beam of the sun, as his brilliant disk began to emerge from the ocean, shot full upon the little gun-boat which was lying-to in the offing—close to the shore the boat was already waiting. Taffiti himself, with his naval cloak wrapped about him, seated in the stern. He jumped ashore when he saw the mendicant and Lovel approach, and, shaking the latter heartily by the hand, he said, “ex not to cast down.” “M’Intyre’s wound,” he said, “was doubtful, but far from desperate.” His attention had got Lovel’s baggage privately sent on board the brig; and, “I trust that, if Lovel chose to go on with the vessel, the penalty of a short cruise would be the only disagreeable consequence of his rencontre. As for himself, his time and motions were a good deal at his own disposal, and beggared his captain’s necessary obligation of remaining on his station.”

“We will talk of our farther motions,” said Lovel, “as we go on board.” Then, turning to Edie, he endeavoured to put money into his hand. “I think,” said Edie, as he tendered it back again, “the hale folk here have been a great deal on their hands have made a vow to ruin my trade, as they say ower muckle water drown the miller. I have had fair goods offered me with this twa or three weeks than I ever saw in my life. Keep the Miller, lad, ye’ll have need o’ it, iver warrant ye, and I have none—my class is nae goods. Keep the Miller, ye, I mean, you’ll never need for’t, but I’ll sell it, and send a message to the mony seller gracie as the king. God bless him, years auld—ye and I serve the same master, ye. Captain Taffiti—there’s rigging provided for—and we may meet the ship by the sending to her at o’r time. I can gang a day without it, may make it a rule never to pay for—So that a seller I need is just to buy tobacco and snuff, and maybe a dram-drinker to be a gaberlunzie—aye take your own, and just give me a lily-white shilling.”

Upon these whims, which he imagined involved a connection with the honour of his vagabond profession, Edie was stiff and adamant, not to be moved by rhetoric or entreaty; and therefore Lovel under the necessity of again pocketing his interest, and taking a friendly leave of the mendicant by shaking him by the hand, and assuring him of cordial gratitude for the very important service which he had rendered him, recommending him to the same paths of making the captive’s condition witnessed.—“Ye needn’t that,” said Ochiltree, “I never tell tales out o’ your cove in my though mony a queer thing I have seen in’t.”

The old man reminiscing looking after it as it made rapidly towards the under the impulse of six stout rowers, and Ochiltree had him again wave his blue bonnet as a farewell salute, then turned from the shore, and began to move slowly along the sands as if his customary perambulations.

CHAPTER XXI.

Wiser Raymond, as in his closet pent,

Lamenting such danger and adventure,

When half his lands are spent in golden smoke,

And now his second hopeful glass is broke;

But, yet, if only his third furnace shone,

Devoteth all his pots and pans to gold.

After a week after the adventure commented in our last chapter, Mr. Oldbuck, descending to breakfast-parlour, found that his womankind was still on duty, his toast not made, and the silver in which went to receive his libations of mum, not aired for its reception.

“Thou confounded hot-brained boy,” he said; “himself, he is at last got to begin to get out of danger, and can tolerate this life no longer—All goes to naught—sevens—a universal Saturnalia seem to be claimed in my peaceful and orderly family. It is an affair of my own doing—I involve my inmates by more names than the Romans gave their deities—At length, Jenny, whose shawl we have heard his last half hour lived in, the regions of the kitchen, condescends to hear me reply, but without coming up stairs, so the conversation must be continued at the top of my lungs.”

Here he again began to hollow aloud, “To where Miss Oldbuck?”

“Aye, Miss Grizzy’s in the captain’s room.”

“Mrs. Umph, I thought so—and where’s my niece?”

“She’s in the captain’s tent.”

“Umph, I supposed as much again—and where’s Caxton?”

“Aye to the town about the captain’s fouling—and his setting-dog—”

“And who the devil’s to dress my periwig, young jade?—when you know that Miss Wardour and Arthur were coming here early after breakfast, he could let Caxton go on such a Tom-fool’s errand?”

“Me! what could I hinder him—your young wanda nae us contradict the captain e’en now, will he maybe deign?”

“Now board the alarmed Antiquary,—ah! what’s he been worse?”

“Na, he’s no waur than I ken of.”

* The author cannot remember where these lines are to be found.

[It is, I believe, a piece of true-masonry, on a point of o s a subject— with notes illustrative of all that is clear, and all that is not— and all that is neither dark nor clear, but dawry in dusky twilight in the region of Caledonian antiquities. I would have made the Celtic panegyrist look about them—Fingal, as they contained a body of knowledge. At last, but a few minutes before the search, rolling himself in his cloud like the spirit of Leda. Such an opportunity can hardly again occur to a ancient and gray-haired man—and to see it lost by the bungling of an unskilled boy—
But I submit—Heaven's will be done.

Thus continued the Antiquary to maunder, as his sister expressed it, during the whole time of breakfast, while he was busily engaged in getting the comforts of a Scottish morning tea-table; his reflections rendered the meal bitter to all who heard them.
But they knew the nature of the man. "Monkarn's bark," said Miss Griselda Oldbuck, in confidential intercourse with Miss Rebecca Blattsgough, "is muscle wœur than his bite.

In fact, Mr. Oldbuck had suffered in mind extremely while his nephew was in actual danger, and now felt himself at liberty, upon his returning health, to indulge in complaints respecting the trouble he had been put to, and the interruption of his antiquarian labours. To young Lord Lovel, by his niece and sister, he unloaded his discontent in such grumblings as we have heard of, venting many a sarcasm against womankind, soldiers, dogs, and guns, all with no indictment of Mr.
M'Lamont's tumult, as he called them, he professed to hold in utter abomination.

This expectoration of spleen was suddenly interrupted by the noise of a carriage without, when the shaking off all sullenness at the sound, Oldbuck ran minutely up stairs and down stairs, for both operations were necessary, ere he could receive Miss Wardour and her father at the door of his magnificent interior—That is all. Lovel, Sir Arthur, knows how to choose his confidants better—at, Miss Wardour, you may look. But it is very true—was in my bosom that he deposited the secret cause of his residence at Fairport, and no stone should have been left unturned on my part to assist him in the pursuit to which he had dedicated himself.

On hearing this magnanimous declaration on the part of the old Antiquary, Miss Wardour changed colour more than once, and could hardly trust her own ears. For of all confidents to be selected as the depository of love affairs,—and such she naturally supposed must have been the subject of communication, next to Edie Crichton,—Oldbuck seemed the most unconscious. Mr. Diamond did not sufficiently admire or fret at the extraordinary combination of circumstances which thus threw a secret of a delicate nature into the possession of permie hostile and unwholesome, and the only sympathy which they can be brought to allow, is, that the party inquired after is "No worse."
THE ANTIQUARY.

Monkbarns, but with the distracted feelings of Macbeth, when compelled to disguise his evil conscience, he was listening and replying to the observations of the attendants, as he had been doing for the preceding night, while his whole soul was upon the stretch to listen for the alarm of murder, which he knew must be raised by those who had entered the sleeping apartment of Duncan. But the conversation of the two virtuous persons upon a subject very different from that which Miss Wardour apprehended.

"Sir Arthur," said Miss Wardour, "when they had, after a due exchange of ceremonies, fairly seated themselves in the sanctum sanctorum of the Antiquary,—you, who know so much of my family matters, were hardly surprised at the question I am about to put to you."

"Why, Sir Arthur, if it relates to money, I am very sorry, but it does not.

"It relates to money matters, Mr. Oldbuck."

"Really then, Sir Arthur," continued the Antiquary, "in the present state of the money-market—and stocks being so low—"

"You mistake my meaning, Mr. Oldbuck," said the Baronet; "I wished to ask your advice about laying out a large sum of money to advantage."

"The devil!" exclaimed the Antiquary; "and, sensibly, the anticipation of a wonderful wonder was not over and above civil, he proceeded to qualify it by expressing his joy that Sir Arthur should have a sum of money to lay out when the commodity was so scarce. A very respectable mode of employ ing it, he said, pausing, "the funds are low at present, as I said before, and there are good bargains of land to be had. But it may not be good to begin by clearing of encumbrances, Sir Arthur?—There is the sum in the personal bond—and the three notes of hand,—continued he, taking out of the right-hand drawer of his cabinet a certain red memorandum-book, of which Sir Arthur, from the experience of former frequent appeals to it, abhorred the very sight—"with the interest thereon, amounting altogether to—let me see—it makes about a thousand pounds, said Sir Arthur, hastily; "you told me the amount the other day."

"But there's another term's interest due since that, Sir Arthur, and it amounts (errors excepted) to eleven hundred and thirteen pounds, seven shillings, five pence, and three-fourths of a penny sterling—but look over the summation yourself."

"I dare say you are quite right, my dear sir," said the Baronet, putting away the book with his hand, as one rejects the old-fashioned civility that presses food upon you after you have eaten till you nauseate,—"I dare say,—to say it directly, I should say the course of three days or less—you shall have the full value—that is, if you choose to accept it in bullion."

"By bullion," said the Baronet, "I mean the precious metals,—gold and silver."

"Ay, indeed, and from what Eldorado this treasure to be imported?"

"Not far from hence," said Sir Arthur, significantly; "and now I think of it, you shall see the whole process on one small condition."

"And what is that?" craved the Antiquary.

"Why, it will be necessary for you to give me your friendly assistance by advancing one hundred pounds or thereabouts."

Mr. Oldbuck, who had already been guessing in the sum, principal and interest, of a debt which he had long regarded as wellnigh desperate, was so much interested by the truth, I think, that he expected to have turned upon him, that he could only re-echo, in an accent of wo and surprise, the words, "Advance one hundred pounds!"

"But upon the most certain positive security of being repaid in the course of two or three days,"

There was a pause—either Oldbuck's nature-law had not recovered its position, so as to enable him to utter a negative, or his curiosity kept him silent.

"I would not propose to you, continued Sir Arthur, "to: undergo such a risk. If I did, I should give you actual proofs of the reality of those expectations which I now hold out to you. And, I assure you, Mr. Oldbuck, that, if I were to let you in with this topic, it is my purpose to show my confidence in you, and my sense of your kindness on many former occasions." Mr. Oldbuck professed his sense of obligation, but carefully omitting himself by any promise of farther assistance.

"Mr. Doustareswivel, said Sir Arthur, "having discovered his mistake." Here Oldbuck broke in, his eyes sparkling with indignation.

"Sir Arthur, I have so often warned you of the knavery of that rascally quack, that I really wonder you should quote him to me."

"But listen,—listen," interrupted Sir Arthur in his turn, "it will do you no harm. In short, Doustareswivel persuaded me to witness an experiment which he had made in the ruins of St. Ruth—and what do you think we found?"

"Another spring of water, I suppose, of which the rogue had beforehand taken care to ascertain the situation and source."

"No, sir,—a casket of gold and silver coins in some of them variés variés—acquinnans! Here is the bonnet-piece of James V.,—the unicorn of James II.—say, and the gold testoon of Queen Mary, with her head and the Dauphin's.—And there was really found in the ruins of St. Ruth?"

"Most certainly,—say even my own eyes witnessed it."

"Well," replied Oldbuck, "but you must tell me when—the where—the how."

"The when," answered Sir Arthur, "was at midnight the last full moon—the where, as I have told you, in the ruins of St. Ruth's priory—the how, was by a nocturnal experiment of Doustareswivel, accompanied only by myself."

"Indeed, said Oldbuck, "and what means of discovery did you employ?"

"Only a simple suffumigation," said the Baronet, "accompanied by availing ourselves of the suitable planets and the proper day."

"Simple suffumigation? simple nonsensification—planetary hour? planetary fiddlestuck? Specios dominabitur avis!—My dear Sir Arthur, that fellow must have made a gull of you about churchyard ground, and he would have made a gull of you in the air too, if he had been by when you were cuffed up by the devil's sunbeam at Halketh backward—to be sure, the transformation would have been then peculiar apropos."

"Well, Mr. Oldbuck, I am obliged to you for your different opinion of my dissertation; but I think you will give me credit for having seen what I saw."

"Certainly, Sir Arthur," said the Antiquary, "at this extent at least, that I know Sir Arthur Wardour will not say he saw any thing but what he thought he saw."

"Well then," replied the Baronet, "as there is heaven above us, Mr. Oldbuck, I saw, with my own eyes, these coins dug out of the chancel of St. Ruth at midnight.—And as to Doustareswivel, although the discovery be owing to his science, yet, to tell the truth, I think I was not himself, and the former mind to have gone through with it if I had not been beside him."

"Ay! indeed!" said Oldbuck, in the tone used when one wishes to hear the end of a story before making any comment.

"Yes, truly," continued Sir Arthur, "I assure you I was upon my guard—we did bear some very common sounds, that is certain, proceeding from among the ruins.

"Oh! you did," said Oldbuck; "an accomplice hid among them, I suppose?"

"Not a jot," said the Baronet; "the sounds, though of a hideous and preternatural character, rather reminded him of the noise of the wind in a dense grove; but after the manner of men, when they talk apart—men of the deep grove, I certainly heard besides—Mr. Oldbuck, I think, the inhabitants of the grove, report the story of the sound-making, and the story of the sound-hearing."

"Dousterswivel assures me, that he beheld the spirit of the man, the Great Hunter of the North, (look for him in you, Oldbuck,) whom Mr. Oldbuck, whom I mimicked the motion of snuff-taking and its effects.

"These indications, however singular as proceeding from the dead, might not be altogether without some use to the matter," said the Antiquary; "for you see the case, which includes these coins, has all the appearance of being a well-equipped Scottish small-sword. But you persevered, in spite of the terrors of that sneaking goblin?"

"Why, I think it probably that a man of inferior sense or consequence might have given way; but I was jealous of an imposture, conscious of the duty I owed to my family in maintaining my courage under every contingency, and therefore I compelled Dousterswivel, by actual and violent threats, to proceed with his researches."

"But," rejoined Oldbuck, "you mean, I suppose, by his skill and honesty this parcel of gold and silver pieces, out of which I beg you to select such coins or medals as will best suit your collection."

"That was drawing a long bow, on the part of Sir Arthur, and he could not say that the skill and honesty of the gentleman was as good, and on condition you will permit me to mark the value according to Pinkerton's catalogue and appreciation, against your account in my red book, I will with pleasure select them."

"Nay," said Sir Arthur Wardour, "I do not mean you should consider them as any thing but a gift of friendship, and least of all would I stand by the rejection of any offering from you."

"Ay, ay," rejoined Oldbuck, "you mean, I suppose, Mr. and Bosco, the Jachin and Boaz, not of his friend Pinkerton, who has impressed the ancient and trust-worthy authorities, on which, as upon venerable and moss-covered pillars, the credit of Scottish antiquities is reposed."

"Why, then, Mr. Oldbuck," said Sir Arthur, "not to weaken old disputes, I suppose you think, because I believe in the ancient history of my country, I have neither eyes nor ears to ascertain what modern events pass before me?"

"On me, Sir Arthur," rejoined the Antiquary, "but I cannot understand the justification of terror which this worthy gentleman, your ceuxa, would not to be involved in this terrible story of his, and especially your having brought the gold away."

"Ay, I suppose," said Sir Arthur, "but then I have the same misgivings in country and date, that I cannot suppose they could be any genuine hoard, and rather suppose them to be, like the purses upon the table of Hudibras's lawyer—"

"Money placed for show."

"Like next-door, to make clients lay, and for his false opinions pay."

"It is the trick all professions, my dear Sir Arthur. Pray, may I ask you how much this discovery cost you?"

"About ten guineas."

"Ah, you have gained what is equivalent to twenty in actual bullion, and what may be perhaps worth as much more to such fools as ourselves, who are willing to pay for curiosity. This was allowing you a great deal, Sir Arthur, for the finest art, I must needs admit. And what is the next venture he proposes?"

"A hundred and fifty pounds; I have given him one part of the money, and I thought it likely you might assist me with the balance."

"I should think that this cannot be meant as a parting blow— it is not of weight and importance enough. You have written the story of the channel, the history of the Caledonian, and are about to add the history of the feud."

"Certainly, Mr. Oldbuck; I think my confidence in you on these occasions leaves no room to doubt that.

"Well, then, allow me to speak to Dousterswivel. If the money can be advanced usefully and advantageously for you, why, for old neighbourhood's sake, make the best of the matter, I think, we can recover the treasure for you without making such an advance, you will, I presume, have no objection?"

"Inconsequently, I can have none whatsoever."

"Then where in Dousterswivel?" continued the Antiquary.

"To tell you the truth, he is in my carriage below; but knowing his agreeable company, I suppose you have not seen him."

"I thank Heaven, I am not prejudiced against any man, Sir Arthur; it is systems, not individuals, that incur my repugnance. He rang the bell."

"Jenny, Sir Arthur and I offer our compliments to Mr. Dousterswivel, the gentleman in Sir Arthur's carriage, and beg to have the pleasure of speaking with him here."

Jenny departed and delivered her message. It had been by no means a part of the project of Dousterswivel to let Mr. Oldbuck into his supposed mystery. He had relied upon Sir Arthur's obtaining the necessary information, as to the nature of the application, and only waited below for the purpose of possessing himself of the deposit as soon as possible, for he foresaw that his career was drawing to a close. But when informed of the presence of Sir Arthur and Mr. Oldbuck, he resolved gallantly to put confidence in his powers of impudence of which, the reader may have observed, his natural share was very liberal.

CHAPTER XXIII.

And this Doctor, your worthy friend, who has followed you, will close you so much gold in a bolt's head, and, on a turn, convey in the stead another."

With subdued mercury, that shall baste it the heat, and all fly out in a flame—

The Alchemist.

"How do you do, goot Mr. Oldbuck? and I do hope your young gentleman, Captain M'Intyre, is getting better again?—Ach! it is a bat business when young gentlemen will put lead balls into each other's body."

"Lead adventures of all kinds are very precarious, Mr. Dousterswivel; but I am happy to learn," continued the Antiquary, "from my friend Sir Arthur, that you have taken up a better trade, and become a discoverer of gold and silver mines."

"Ach, Mr. Oldbuck, mine goot and honoured patron should not have told a word about that little matter for, though I have all reliance of eyes, indeed, on goot Mr. Oldbuck's prudence and discretion, and his great friendship for Sir Arthur Wardour—yet, my heavens! it is an great ponderous secret."

"More ponderous than any of the metal we shall make by it, I fear," answered Oldbuck.

"Dast is just as you shall have de fait and de patience for de grand experiment—If you join wid Sir Arthur, as he is put one hundred and fifty—see, here is one fifty in your dirty Fairport bank-note—you put one other hundred and fifty in de dirty notes, and you shall have de pure-gold and silver, I cannot toll how much, you know?"

"Nor any one for you, I believe," said the Antiquary. "But hark you, Mr. Dousterswivel; suppose, without troubling this same sneaking spirit with any farther fumigations, we should go in a body, and having fair day-light and our good consciences to befriend us, using no other conjuring implements than good substantial pick-axes and shovels, fairly digge the areas of the channel in the ruins of St. Ruth, from one end to the other, and so ascertain the existence of this supposed treasure, without putting ourselves to any farther expense: the ruins belong to Sir Arthur however, this has been all at his own expense. Do you think we shall succeed in this way of managing the matter?"
THE ANTIQUARY. [Chap. XXIII.

"Bah!—you will not find one copper thimble—but Sir Arthur will do his pleasure—I have shown him how it is possible—very possible—to have de great sum of money for his occasions—I have shown him de real experiment—if he likes not to believe, goot Mr. Oldenburg! Doubters—Doubters—Doubters—Doubters!—to the Duke, he only loses de money and de gold and de silver—dat is all."

"Sir Arthur's favor cast an intimated glance at Oldenburg, who, especially when present, held, notwithstanding their frequent difference of opinion, no ordinary influence over his sentiments. In truth, the Duke would not easily have relinquished, nor would Sir Arthur have acknowledged, that his genius stood rebuked before that of the Antiquary. He respected him as a shrewd, penetrating, sarcastic character, feared his satire, and had some confidence in the general soundness of his opinions. He therefore looked at him as if desiring his leave before indulging his credulity. Doubterswivel saw he was in danger of losing his duke, unless he could make some favourable impression on the adviser."

"I know, my good Mr. Oldenburg, it is one vanity to speak to you about de spirit and de goblin. But look a little, now, you know de majority of all de countries, and how de great Oldenburg horn, as they keep still in the Museum at Copenhagen, was given to de Duke of Oldenburg by one de goblin. Now you could not put a trick on you if I were willing, you know all de curiosity so well, and dere it is de horn full of coins—if it had been a box or case, I would have said nothing."

"Being a horn," said Oldenburg, "does indeed strengthen your argument. It was an implement of nature's fashioning, and therefore much used among rude nations, although it may be the metaphorical horn is more frequent in proportion to the progress of civilization. And this present horn," he continued, "rubbing it upon his sleeve, "is a curious and valuable horn, not desired to prove a cornucopia, or horn of plenty, to some one or other; but whether to the adept or his patron may be justly doubted."

"Well, Mr. Oldenburg, I find you still hard of belief—but let me assure you, de monshah understood de magistrat."

Let us leave talking of the magistrat, Mr. Doubterswivel, and think a little about the magistrate. Are you aware that this occupation of yours is against the law of Scotland, and that both Sir Arthur and myself are in the commission of the peace?"

"I don't mind that at all, it serves the purpose when I am doing you all de good I can!"

"Why, you must know, that when the legislature abolished the cruel laws against witchcraft, they had no idea of such a consequence. Aggrees with human nature, I don't know. They found it, I don't know, among the poor; but to the adept or his patron may be justly doubted."

"And is dat de laws?" asked Doubterswivel, with some concern.

"Thyself shall see the act," replied the Antiquary.

"Den, gentlemen, I shall take my leave of you, dat is all; I do not like to stand on your word you call it—it is very bad way to take dear, I think; and I do not like your prisons no more, where I cannot take de air at all."

"If such be your taste, Mr. Doubterswivel," said the Antiquary, "I know you know you too, and I cannot let you go, unless it be in the society of a constable, and, moreover, I expect you will attend us just now to the ruins of St. Ruth, and point out the place of some treasure."

"Mine heaven, Mr. Oldenburg! what usage is this to your old friend, when I tell you so plain as I can speak, dat if you go now, you will get not so much treasure as one poor shabby suspense!"

"I will try the experiment, however, and you shall be dealt with according to its success,—always with Sir Arthur's permission."

Sir Arthur, during this investigation, had looked extremely embarrassed, and, to use a vulgar but expressive phrase, chop-fallen. Oldenburg's obstinate, and perhaps, by disobey led him strongly to suspect the imposture of Doubterswivel, and the adept's mode of keeping his ground was less resolute than he had expected. Yet he did not know, precisely, what he would say."

"Mr. Oldenburg," said the Baronet, "you do Mr. Doubterswivel less than justice. He has undertaken a new horn to make a new purse, and has used the, as applying characters descriptive of the Intelligences residing over the planetary hour in which the experiment is to be made; and you require him to proceed, under pain of punishment, without allowing him the use of any of the preliminaries which he considers as the means of procuring success."

"I did not say that exactly—I only required him to be present when we make the search, and not to leave us during the interval. I fear he may have some intelligence with the Intelligence you talk of, and that whatever may be now hidden at St. Ruth may disclose itself at once."

"Well, gentlemen," said Doubterswivel sullenly, "I will make no objections to go along with you; but I tell you beforehand, you shall not find so much of any value on the half acre worth your young twenty yard from your own gate."

"We will put that to a fair trial," said the Antiquary; and the Baronet's equipage being ordered, Miss Withsop was sent with an intimation to the lady that she was to remain at Monkbarns until his return from an airing. The young lady was somewhat at a loss to reconcile this direction with the communication which she had received between Sir Arthur and the Antiquary; but she was compelled, for the present, to remain in a most unpleasant state of suspense.

The journey of the treasure-seekers was melancholy enough. Doubterswivel maintained a sulky silence, brooding at once over disappointed expectations and the risk of punishment; Sir Arthur, whose golden dreams had been gradually fading away, surveyed, in gloomy prospect, the impending difficulties of his situation; and Oldenburg, who perceived that his having so far interfered in his neighbour's affairs gave the Baronet a right to expect some actual and efficient assistance, sadly pondered to what extent it would be necessary to draw open the strings of his purse. Thus each being wrapped in his own unpleasing reflections, there was but little conversation on either side, until they reached the Four Horse-shoes, by which sign the little inn was distinguished. They procured at this place the necessary assistance and implement of their search, and the preparations about these preparations, were suddenly joined by the old beggar, Edie Ochillire.

"The Lord bless your honour," began the Blue-Gown, with the genuine mendicant whine, "and long life to you—weel pleased am I to hear that young Captain M'Intyre is like to be on his legs again soon—Think on your poor beseechin' the day."

"Aha, old true-penny!" replied the Antiquary, "Why, thou hast never come to Monkbarns since thy pens by rock and flood—here's something for thee to take with thee;—and, fumbling for his purse, he pulled out at the same time the horn which enclosed the coins."

"Ay, and there's something to pit it in," said the mendicant, "it is very bad way to take dear, I think; and, fumbling for his purse, he took a fancy till't down at Glen-Withsop's yonder."

"Ay! indeed?" said Oldenburg. — "you exchanged it with a miner? but I presume you never saw it so well filled before?—and opening it, he showed the gold.

"Throstle, ye may swear that, Monkbarns—when it was mine it ne'er had abone the like o' sappery worth o' black rappee in't ances; but I know ye'ld be gaun to make an antic o' ye as ye hae done wi' mony an o' th' airts besides. Odd, I wish ony body wad make an antic o' me; but mony ane will find wi' me, as I find wi' others, that care uch a litlle about an auld carle o' thair ain country and kind.

You may now guess," said Oldbuck, turning to Sir Arthur; "the good offices you were indebted the other night. To trace this cercumvols of yours to a miner is bringing it pretty near a friend of ours—or hope we shall be as successful this morning without some slighter sort of service.

"And where is your honours gann the day," said the mendicant, "wi' a' your picks and shukes?—Odd, this will be some o' your tricks, Monkbars; ye'll be for having a gless o' that gude old Hallow, by pulling out o' thair graves afore they hear the last call—but, wi' your leave, I'll see follow ye at any rate, and see what ye make o' it."

The party soon arrived at the ruins of the priory, and, having gained the chancel, stood still to consider what course they were to pursue next. The Antiquary, meantime, addressed the adopt.

"Mr. Doubtersworth, what is your advice in this matter?—Shall we have most likelihood of success if we dig from east to west, or from west to east?—Or will you assist us with your triangular view of Mayday?—If we dig, wi' your leave, they may have induction o' witchcraft at hazard? Will or will you have the goodness to supply us with a few thumping blistering terms of art, which, if they fail in our present service, may, at least, be of some use to others for whom ye have been the guides to the new school of archeologists, to still their brawling children whilant?"

Mr. Oldbuck, said Doubtersworth doughtily,

"I have told you already, you will make no good work at all, and I will find some way of mine own to thank you for your civilities to me—yes, indeed."

"If your honours are thinking of tifting the floor," said Oldbuck, "and wait but a poor body's advice. I would be bold by that much sooner than that has the man there stick out upon his back in the midst o' it.

"I have some reason for thinking favourably of that plan myself," said the Baronet.

"And I have nothing to say against it," said Oldbuck; "it was unusual to hide treasure in the tombs of the deceased—many instances might be quoted of that from Bartholomius and others."

The tombstone, the same beneath which the coins had been found by Sir Arthur and the German, was untouched by force or axe, and the earth gave easy way to the spade.

"It's travell'd earth then," said Edie, "it hovks eather—I ken it weel, for once I wrought a sam-tail diggin' in th' park, and hovk it away gravies than o' me in my day; but I left him in winter, for it was unco cold work; and then it car a green Yule, and the folk died thick and fast—for ye ken a green Yule makes a fat kilch-yard—and I never gloved to hide a hard turn o' work in my life—see aU I tread and left. Will to delive his last dwellings by himself for Edie."

The diggers were now so far advanced in their labours as to discover that the sides of the grave upon which they were clearing out had been originally secured by four walls of freestone, forming a parallelogram, forming the floor of the chamber.

"It is worth while proceeding in our labours," said the Antiquary to Sir Arthur, "were it but for curiosity's sake. I wonder on whose sepulchre they have been built of common pains.

"The arms on the shield," said Sir Arthur, and sighed as he spoke it; "are the same with those on Missiroc's tower, supposed to have been built by M. Fray. I supposed, in former years, where he was burnt, and there is an old prophecy in our family, that bodies o' us good when his grave shall be discovered."

"Strangly," said the beggar. "I have often heard that when I was a bairn, if Macdonald the Missiroc's grave were fun." "If Malcolm the Missiroc's grave were fun," said Edie. "Then the lanse of Knockinnchrist are lost and won.

Oldbuck. "At first sight he fancied his own grave had already knelt down on the monument, and was tracing, partly with his eye, partly with his finger, the moulded devices upon the effigy of the deceased warrior. "It is the Knockinnchrist arms sure enough," he exclaimed, "quarterly with the coat of Walous.

"Richard, called the Red-handed Walous, married Sybil Knockinnchrist, the heiress of the Saxon family; and built the present mansion of Walous, which with the castle and estate into the name of Walous, in the year of God 1150."

"Very true, Sir Arthur, and here is the bawon-minister, the mark of illegitimacy, extending diagonally through both coats upon the shield. Where can our eyes have been that they did not see this curious monument before?"

"Na, what is the through-stane that it didna come before our een till e'now?" said Ochilrose; "for I hae kend this auld Kirk, man and barn, for sexty lang years, and I ne'er noticed it afore, and it's nae soner mair but what one might see it in their parrich."

All were now induced to tax their memory as to the former state of the ruins in that corner of the chancel, and all agreed in recollecting a considerable pile of rubbish which must have been removed and spread abroad in order to make the tomb visible. Sir Arthur might, indeed, have remembered, seeing the monument in its former occasion, but his mind was too much agitated to attend to the circumstance as a novelty.

While the assistants were engaged in these recollections and discussions, the workmen proceeded with their labour. They had already dug to the depth of nearly five feet, and as the flinging out of the old became more and more difficult, they began at the bottom, so as to the first of the flakes, which they started to the till now," said one of them, "and the air a coffin or any thing else is here—some cunning chiel's been afore us, I reckon;" and the labourer below him cried out that he had seen no such thing as a coffin.

"Haut, lad," said Edie getting down in his room, "let me try my hand for an auld bedral—you're gude suckers but you finders."

So soon as he got into the grave, he struck his pick-staff forcibly down—it encountered resistance in its descent, and the beggar exclaimed, like a Scotch schoolboy when he finds anything, "Nae haillers and quarters—hael o' mine ain and name o' my neighbours."

Every body from the deserted Baronet to the sullen adopt, now that they were quite round the grave and would have jumped into it could its space have contained them. The labourers, who had begun to flag in their monotonous and apparently endless work, did not however think the chance a bad one to make them with all the ardour of expectation. Their shovels soon grated upon a hard wooden surface, which, as the earth was cleared away, assumed the distinct form of a chest, but greatly smaller than that of a coffin. Now all hands were at work to heave it out of the grave, and all voices, as it was raised, proclaimed its weight, and acquired its value. They were not mistaken.

When the chest or box was placed on the surface, and the lid forced up by a pick-axe, there was displayed first a canvas cover, then a quantity of oskum, and then the silver. A general exclamation hailed a discovery so surprising and unexpected. The Baronet threw his hands and eyes up to heaven, with the silent rupture of one who is delirious from excessive dread of mind. Oldbuck, almost unable to credit his eyes, lifted one piece of silver after another. There was neither inscription nor stamp upon them, excepting one, which seemed to be Hab. 2 Q. 29, without any relation to the purity and great value of the treasure before him. Still, however, removing piece by piece, he examined row by row, expecting to discover that the lower layers were less precious, but could find no difference in this respect, and found himself compelled to admit, that Sir Arthur had possessed himself of bullion to the value perhaps of a thousand round pounds sterling. Sir Arthur now promised the workman handsome recompenses for their work, and the bury himself about the mode of conveying this rich windfall to the Castle of Knockwinnoch, when the adept, recovering from his surprise, which had equalled that exhibited by any other individual of the party, blundered his aloof manners and having offered his humble congratulations, turned next to Oldbuck, with an air of triumph. I did tell you, my good friend Mr. Oldbuck, that I was too obscured to thank you for your civility; now do you not think I have found out very good way to return thank you?

Why, Mr. Doustewartiw, do you pretend to have had the hand of the gentleman you should see—I forgot you refused us all aid of your science, man. And you are here without your weapons that should have fought the battle, which you pretend to have gained in our behalf. You have used neither charm, lamen, agul, talisman, spell, crystal, pentacle, magic mirror, nor geomantic figure. Where be your periaptas, and your abracadabras, man? I your May-fair, your vervain, your toad, your crow, your dragon, and your panther, your fire, your quill, Your Lato, Azoth, Zermich, Chibrit, Heautatis, your brooch, your emeralds, your materials, would bear a man to cause?

Ah! rare Ben Jonson! long peace to thy ashes for a season, our bards of the day who expected to see them revive in our own? —

The answer of the adept to the Antiquary's tirade we must defer to our next chapter.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The German, determined, it seemed, to assert the vantage-ground on which the discovery placed him, replied with great pomp and stateliness to the attack of the Antiquary:

Mr. Oldbuck, all day may be very witty and comical, but I have nothing to say—nothing at all—people dat will not believe dear own eyesights. It is very true dat I ate not any of de things of de art, and it makes de more wonder what I has done dis day. But I would ask of you, mine honoured and good and generous patron, to put your hand into your right-hand waistcoat pocket, and show me what you shall find there.

So they obeyed his directions, and pulled out the small plate of silver which he had used under the adept's suspicion upon the former occasion. "It is very true," said Sir Arthur, looking gravely at the Antiquary, "but you are a great, and calculated sight by which Mr. Doustewartiw and I regulated our first discovery.

"Fah! fah! my dear friend," said Oldbuck, "you are too wise to believe in the influence of a trumpery crown-piece, beat out thin, and a parcel of scratches upon it. I tell thee, Sir Arthur, that if Doustewartiw had known where to get this treasure himself, he would not have been Lord of the least share of it.

"In truth, please your honour," said Edgar, who put in his word on all occasions, "I think, since Mr. Dostsweteriw mus' been in the dark for or over his muckle in the talkin' or the gear, the least ye can do is to gie him that o't left behind for his labour, for doubleness he that kent where to find say muckle will ha' nae difficulty to find mant.

Doustewartiw's brow grew very dark at this proposal of leaving him to his "ain purchase," as Ochtertree expressed it; but the beggar, drawing him aside, whatever twa was worded or said to him, or said behind his ear, to which he seemed to give serious attention.

Meanwhile, Sir Arthur's heart warm with his good fortune, was aloud, "Never mind our friend Monkbarres, Mr. Doustewartiw, and leave the Castle de-morrow, and I'll convince you that I am not ungrateful for the hints you have given me about this matter, and the fifty Fairport dirty notes, as you call them, are heartily at your service. Come, my lad, get the cover of this precious chest fastened up again."

But the cover had in the confusion fallen aside among the rubbish, or the loose earth which had been removed from the grave—in short, it was not to be seen.

"Never mind, my good lad, tie the tarpaulin over it, and get it away to the carriage.

Monkbarres will you walk— I must go back your way to take up Miss Wardour." And, I hope, to take up your dinner also Sir Arthur, and drink a glass of wine for joy of our happy adventure, then get your carriages. And this the Antiquary, in case of any interference on the part of the crowd. As you are lord of the manor, it will be easy to get a deed of gift to make any claim—we must talk about it thence.

And I particularly recommend silence to all who are present," said Sir Arthur, looking round. All bowed and professed themselves dumb.

"Why, as to that," said Monkbarres, "recommend secrecy where a dozen of people are acquainted with the circumstance to be concealed, is only putting the truth in masquerade; for the story is actuated under twenty different shapes. But never mind; we will state the true one to the Baronet, and that's all that is necessary.

"I incline to send off an express to-night," said the Baronet.

"I can recommend your honour to a sure hand," said Ochtertree; "little Davie Mailsetter and the butcher's resisting pony."

"We will talk over the matter as we go to Monkbarres," said Sir Arthur. "My lads, (to the people,) come with me to the Four Horse-shoes, that I may take some news of your master. Roustewartiw, I won't ask you to go down to Monkbarres, as he heard and you differ so widely in opinion; but do not fail to come to see me to-morrow.

"Doustewartiw, in answer, in which the words, "duty," "mine honoured patron," "wait upon Sir Arthurs were alone distinguishable; and after the Baronet and his friend had left the place, followed by the servants and workmen, who in hope of reward and whistle, joyfully attended their leader, the adept remained in a brown study by the side of the open grave.

"Who was it as could have thought this to be executed unconsciously? Minoitiglich! I have heard of such things, and often spoken of such things—but, suppert! I never thought to see them."

And if one man, but two or three, in the earth—moan him! It had been all mine own so much more as I have been muddling about to go from this fool's man.

Here the Antiquary ceased his soliloquy, for, raise his eyes, he encountered those of Edie Ochtertree, who had not followed the rest of the company, but, resting as usual on his pike-staff, had placed himself on the other side of the grave. The features of the old man, naturally shrewd and expressive almost to an appearance of knavery, seemed in this instance so keenly knowing, that even the assurance of the Antiquary, though a professional adventurer, smiled on his countenance.

"Edie Ochtertree, nae master—your purr bedes—and the king's," answered the Blue-Gown.

"A well den, goot Edie, what do you think o' din' t?"

"I was just thinking it was very kind (for I dun say very simple) o' your honour to see gae the tart's gentiles, wha ha' lands and lairdships, and aiters, as the time returns, or ends in the two moons of the month, and then times tried in the fire, as the Scripture expresseth, that might has made yousell and oot twa or threes honest bodies besides, as happy and content as the day was long.

"Indeed, Edie, mine honest friends, dat is true; only I din' not know, dat is, I was not sure where to find thae folk myself.

"What's what, say your honour's wish?
counsel that Monkburns and the Knight of Knockwinnow came here then?"

Doustie had been at another circumstance; I did not know dat day would have found de treasures mine friend; though I did guess, by such a tink-tumarr, and cough, and sneeze, and groan, among dem. But, for the night, there, already might a three million in treasure and bullion hereabout.
Ach, mein himmel! the spirit will hone and groan over his goll, as if he were a Dutch burgomaster counting his dollars after a Cabin Studier war.

"And do you really believe the like o' that, Mr.
Dusterdevel?—a sleekful man like you—hout fie!"

"Mein friend," answered the adept, forced by circumstances to ye, warnin' up on the truth, more than he generally used to do, "I believed it no more than you and no man at all, till I did hear them hone and moan and groan myself on de odor night, and till I did this day see o' cause, which was an great feast all full of the pure silver from Mexico—and what would you ave me think den?"

"And what yad ye gie to any ame," said Edie,
"that wad help ye to see another knots o' silver?"

"Give?—mein himmel!—one great big quarter of it."

"Now, if the secrets were mine," said the merchant, "I wad stand out for a half; for you see, though I am but a pur raped body, and couldn’ carry silver or gold to sell for fear o’ being turned up, yet I could find many folks would pass it awa for less than unco muckle easier profit than ye’re thinking on."

"Ach, himmel!—Mein goot friend, what was it I said?—I did mean to say you should have de tree quarters for your half, and de one quarter to be my fair half."

"No, no, Mr. Dusterdevel, we will divide equally what we find, like brother and brother. Now look at this board that I just flung into the dark aisle out of the way, while Monkburns was glowing ower a the silver yonder. He’s a sharp chiel Monkburns.
I was glad to keep the like o’ this out of his sight.
Ye’ll maybe can read the character better than me—
I am no that book-learned, at least I’m no that muckle in practice."

With this modest declaration of ignorance, Orclit-tree brought forth from behind a pillar the cover of
